Resolved, &c., That the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, respectively, shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College.

Did any American statesman or legislator ever before assume so monstrous and so unsound a principle? This resolution recognizes that they are States, and yet it says that the States shall not, except on particular conditions, be entitled to choose electors whose votes shall be received and counted. Whence does the honorable Senator from Vermont derive that power to the Senate or to Congress or to himself? There is this important difference between the honorable Senator and myself: he thinks that Congress have sole, sovereign, and absolute power over the subject; I, on the contrary, believe that they have not a particle of power over the subject. But, to proceed with this resolution:

That the States of Virginia, &c., shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from any such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors, the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government, &c.

I ask the honorable Senator where does he derive the power to assume the position that Congress shall or shall not receive electoral votes? I put that question pointedly and with emphasis to the honorable Senator or any of his coadjutors.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the question?

Mr. DAVIS. Where do gentlemen derive the power that authorizes Congress to pass a law saying that an electoral vote for President shall be received or shall not be received?

Mr. HOWARD. As the honorable Senator from Vermont, to whom the interrogatory was more particularly addressed, has been obliged to leave the Chamber for a moment, and as the Senator has included others who hold with him in his interrogatory, he will pardon me for making a very brief answer.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not ask the honorable Senator for an argument. I just ask him to refer me to the power.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; I will immediately, without circumlocution; the power to suppress rebellion and to subdue insurrection.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the most universal and illimitable power that was ever contended for on this earth, but instead of meaning anything and everything, it comprehends but a single, simple point; and that is to suppress insurrection, and when that is done the power is as dead as a door-nail. It exists no longer.

Mr. DRAKE. If the honorable Senator will consider me included among those to whom he appeals for a designation of the power, I would give it a little different direction from that of the honorable Senator from Michigan. The Constitution says:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

I presume that in that clause of the Constitution is the power of Congress to determine what States are entitled to representation in Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. I am much obliged to the honorable Senator for his remark; and I will answer him by this conclusive quotation from the Constitution, which says positively, explicitly, and unconditionally, that every State shall be entitled to two Senators in Congress, and to Representatives in proportion to her population under the ratio, and then that every State shall be entitled to as many electoral votes as she is entitled to Senators and Representatives in Congress. There is the whole of it. Every State is entitled to two Senators. My State is entitled to nine Representatives in Congress. Consequently, my State is entitled to eleven electoral votes. That is the plain language of the Constitution; that is its permanent and immutable meaning until it is altered in the mode prescribed for the amendment of the instrument itself; and this Congress has no power to impinge the right of my State or any other State to her representation in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, or in the Electoral College.

But I will proceed. I was denying the position assumed by the honorable Senator from Vermont in this resolution, that Congress had the right to say whether a presidential electoral vote shall be received or counted from any State. I say there is no power in Congress to deny the receipt of an electoral vote, or to receive it at all. With the matter of accepting a vote Congress has nothing to do. The two Houses are authorized to count the votes. It is not Congress; it is not the two branches acting legislatively; it is the two Houses of Congress acting in a convention, and acting ministerially. They are then performing no legislative duty; they are performing no duty whatever except a mere simple ministerial duty which they could be commanded by a court of competent jurisdiction by mandamus to execute; and if they refused to execute it, their non-execution would not affect the question of the election of a President at all. It would be as good without the count, if Congress was to refuse to count, as with the count.

But this resolution goes on to declare:

And no electoral votes shall be received or counted from any of such States.

That is the provision of the proposed law of Congress; that is its mandate; and I say for that command and that provision there is not a shred of authority anywhere. It is a simple, unconditional usurpation of power for which Congress has not a color of authority. The Constitution declares that the electors, after they have voted:

"Shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

Now, sir, after the next presidential election there will be but that single, plain, simple duty to be performed by the two Houses. They do not receive the votes; they cannot accept the votes; they cannot reject the votes. That matter is provided for specifically by the Constitution itself. After the votes shall have been cast and sealed up the requisition of the Constitution is that they shall be transmitted to the President of the Senate, and they shall be kept by him until a certain day, and on that certain day the two Houses shall get together and perform the simple ministerial duty, not of adjudging between the candidates at all, but of counting the votes for the respective candidates for whom the electors had voted.

Suppose when the business reaches that stage that Congress should make a false count, that they should decide that a candidate who had received the majority of the votes had not received that majority, and that another candidate who had received a minority of the votes had received a majority, would that make the election? Would that decide the election? No, sir. A false and fraudulent count cannot unmake a presidential election. The election is a different matter. It takes place from another power, on another theater. It takes place when the Electoral College of each State gets together and casts its electoral vote for a particular candidate, and seals that vote and sends it on to the President of the Senate. When that is done the election is complete; it is consummate; it can never be reversed nor set aside nor nullified.

Suppose the two Houses were not together to count the presidential vote at all; suppose they did not get together to make a count, but the fact was that the electoral vote of each State college had been cast, and had been cast so as to give one of the candidates a majority; would the failure of the two Houses to meet in convention to count the electoral vote annul the election, set it aside, and introduce chaos and confusion, and leave this country without a President? No such nonsense. That is not the principle; that is not the meaning of the Constitution. The President is not elected by the two Houses of Congress in convention. Where one of the candidates does not get a majority of the electoral vote the House, acting by States, makes an election; and that is the only condition or state of case in which the House or either branch of Congress can interfere in the presidential vote at all.

The honorable Senator from Vermont has strange notions of the Constitution and of the constitutional powers of Congress, or I have. There is so much not only of discrepancy but of actual and positive contradiction between that honorable Senator's ideas and my own in relation to such matters, that he or myself is totally at fault. His measure—and the substitute proposed by the honorable Senator from New York adopts the same principle—by language proposes to invest Congress with the power to accept or to reject the electoral votes for a candidate for President. Sir, a power more destitute of foundation, with less color, not only of reality, but with less color of existence, never was attempted to be exercised even by this Congress.

The first proposition that I set out was this: an electoral vote can only be cast under the authority and direction of the Legislature of a State. That Legislature can only be created and organized by its constitution, its form of government. That constitution or form of government can only be created by the people of the State; and all devices of constitutions, laws, rights of suffrage, electoral colleges, in derogation of that general principle are in flagrant conflict with the Constitution and utterly null and void. They are not only usurpations of power, but they are revolutionary, and dangerously revolutionary. They subvert our free, representative, constitutional form of government, and bring the whole under the indefinite and absolute power of a usurping and aggressive Congress.

These observations lead me to adopt the conclusion that there is not a government in the southern States set up under the reconstruction acts that has one particle of constitutional obligation. Those governments are all made in derogation of the Constitution. They are all made in derogation and in dethronement of the political power in those States as it had been organized and recognized by the Constitution of the United States and by the constitutions of the several States. I can put an apposite case, I think. There was a Dorr government in Rhode Island at one time. Two governments occupied the territory of that small State at one time, and both were struggling for existence and for ultimate supremacy. Before the first or charter government was deposed and set aside legitimately, suppose the Dorr government had had authority and power enough there to have chosen electors for that State for the Presidency; suppose the votes of those electors had been counted by Congress, would the counting of these spurious and unconstitutional votes by Congress have made them valid, and, under a particular division between the candidates, have controlled the election and decided who should be elected President of the United States? No, sir; no, sir.

Mr. President, my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] yesterday stated the issue which had now been formed for the decision of the American people, frankly and candidly, when he said that the question now was to be decided whether this should be the white man's Government or the negro's Government, I accept the definition of the issue. I meet that definition, and I meet it in full and proud confidence that the great mass of the American white people will decide it against the negro and in favor of the white man. Gentlemen, I have no doubt, are looking to the possibility, yea, the probability of the presidential election being decided by the negro vote. It was for that purpose that they made Grant, the General of the Army, their candidate. It is for that purpose that they refuse to disband the enormous standing Army. It is to use that Army for the purpose of subjugating the white people of the United States, if it shall become advisable and practicable to do so. Here we have had the Committee on Finance with its honorable chairman racking their brains to find out resources for revenues to meet the vast expenditures of the Government; but when you say to them, "Abolish the Freedmen's Bureau; diminish the Army from sixty thousand, with a capacity to be raised to one hundred and six thousand to twenty thousand, and in that way you will be able to save fifty or seventy millions," you cannot get the ear or the attention of the majority of this Chamber to any such proposition.

Sir, if they were devoted friends to freedom, the representative rights of the people, to their liberties, to economy in the expenditures of the Government; if they had an ardent desire to establish an equilibrium between the expenditures and the receipts of the Treasury, here are the plainest modes in the world that would secure it to them. Why do they not adopt them? They are looking to the General-in-Chief, a military dictator, some of his minions say greater than Alexander or Cæsar, Napoleon or Cromwell, and to enable him to trample with his iron military heel upon the necks of the white men of this country, and to elevate above them the four or five millions of negroes, he and you hold on to a standing army of sixty thousand. Not only that, you are proposing now to give him the power of distributing two thousand arms into every congressional district in the southern States. Not only that, you have organized your "Grand Army of the Republic," negroes and white renegades, carpet-baggers, minions of power and spoils, and they are to be marched forward under your dictator, your military chieftain, to rivet the chains and add immeasurably to their weight upon the people not only of the southern States, but of all the States.

Mr. President, no people can live half free and half slave. When the southern people are reduced to hopeless, irremediable servitude to negroes, the fate of the white men of the North will soon follow. The one will be a rapid precursor of the other. Do gentlemen expect that the General of the armies or the Grand Army of the Republic, white and black, or the minions who are now in the regular Army, and who will be willing to enlist in such a cause, to enslave the white man to the negro, can ever effect it? No, gentlemen, no. You are aiming at impossibilities. I will tell you when you will elect your President, and when he will take his seat, and never before: when he gets a majority of the electoral votes cast by the white people of the United States, under the governments of States which governments have been formed by the white people. When you do that, if you bring him here with a majority of that vote, there will be no obstacle to his inauguration; there will be no obstacle to his installation into office; and the men who would and will oppose him in the canvass would then strike with as much boldness and fidelity in favor of his right to the Presidency, and to serve out his term in it, as his own friends. But when you present the case in this form: here is Seymour, who has twenty, thirty, or forty more of the white electoral vote than Grant, and Grant's election is decided by the negro vote, the question then presents itself to the American mind, to its heart and soul, will you permit these negroes to appoint a President for you? No; no; not even the General of the Army, backed with all of his military power. One day of virtuous liberty in resistance to such a system of tyranny would be worth whole ages of such slavery.

Sir, these are my sentiments. I am no party man. I am no Democrat. I never was. I am for my country, for the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws; and I will go under any man's standard who strikes in that glorious cause; and I oppose every man who takes up arms against it to the extent of my feeble ability. I am not responsible for the nominations or for the platform at New York. I believe in the platform. I hug it to my heart, to my reason, to my soul; and I have no doubt that under its banner the free white men of America will march on in November next to a glorious victory—peacefully. There will be no blood. You will be beaten so fairly that you will not have ground to stand upon. You will have the votes of some six or eight States. The storm of 1840 will rise and will sweep with more fury than it did then. It will be the best day for you and your posterity, for your country and the whole country that this people has known since the Revolutionary war.

But my friend from Indiana received this platform as a sound and tocsin of war. Sir, there will be no war. A reckless band of revolutionists and all the hosts of the negroes of the South, with all their carpet-baggers and leaders and adventurers cannot make any stand against the hosts of the white freemen of America that will on that day rally for the Constitution which Washington made, and for the liberties which it secures, and which were fought for during the revolutionary war. The time will come when you yourselves will sound your praises and your peans for the mighty, free, white host that will perform this great work.

My honorable friend [Mr. MORTON] a few days ago said that it was a vulgar prejudice to approve negro equality. My honorable friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILLEY] made a most passionate and eloquent appeal in favor of the negro and negro suffrage, the equality of the negro; in the language of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] the equality of the negro before the law. That is an equality that wiser men than you have been seeking to establish for the last six thousand years. You have never made anything but a negro out of the curly-headed African, and you never will be able to make anything but that out of him. He has no fitness for self-government. But Senators said that it was the debasing effects, the demoralization, the degradation, the ignorance, the brutality that have been brought upon this race by slavery that rendered them unfit to take part in the Government. They admitted their unfitness. Now, let us see what is the truth of the case. I will read a passage from Malte Brun. He says:

"The slave coast of Africa consists of several petty States, which are all under the despotic sway of the king of Dahomey. This barbarian monarch chooses to have women for his body-guard, and his palace is surrounded by one thousand of these Amazons, armed with javalins and muskets, from whom he selects his special military aids and messengers. His ministers, when they come into the royal presence, are obliged to leave their silk gowns at the gates of the palace, and approach the throne walking on all fours, and rolling their hands in the dust. The ferocity of this African despot almost surpasses conception. The road to his residence is strewed with human skulls, and the walls are adorned and almost covered with jaw-bones. On public occasions the sable monarch walks in solemn pomp over the bloody heads of vanquished princes or disgraced ministers. At the festival of the tribes, to which all the people bring presents for the king, he drenches the tomb of his father with human blood. Fifty dead bodies are thrown around the royal sepulchre, and fifty heads displayed on poles. The blood of these victims is presented to the king, who dips his fingers in it and licks them. Human blood is mixed with clay to build temples in honor of deceased monarchs. The royal widows kill one another till it pleases the new sovereign to put an end to the slaughter; and the crowd assembled at these most joyous festivals applaud such scenes of horror, and delight in tearing the unhappy victims to pieces."

There is the start from which you say the debasing and unhumanizing and degrading influences of slavery have redeemed their posterity and given them self-government! It is not necessary to read more.

Senators, abler men, truer philanthropists than you are, or can possibly be, have undertaken in the past ages of the world this thing of elevating the negro race and bringing him up to an equality and a level with the white man. It is impossible. Why do not you, who are so fond of it and want to see it tested, go to Jamaica or to Saint Domingo? It has there received a test within the past generation, and yet every day it is more demoralizing and barbarizing. The negro population of Saint Domingo is now much more degraded, ignorant, debased, ferocious, immoral, incapable of self-government and all the duties of social life than it was when their insurrection commenced under Ogé in 1790.

Gentlemen, we will beat you. We are for the Constitution. We are for peaceful force, and peaceful remedies. You march along like the king of Dahomey, and all along your path are the skeletons and blood of the Constitution. You perpetrate your orgies as he did. We want to rescue the Constitution. We want to rescue law and order from your violence, your misrule, your revolutionary gambols. We expect to do it without any bayonets. We expect to do it by the united and omnipotent voice of the great mass of the American white men; and when you shall be beaten, as I have the fullest faith that you will be beaten, three or four electoral votes to one by the November election, if there is any war you will make it. If there is any clash of arms, any drenching of the land in blood, any crossing of bayonets, any wail of misery and woe from the widow and the orphan, you will be the cause of it—you and your Grant, your General of the Army, your armed military dictator who, I have heard some of the men who served with him in the Army say, would march as cold and with as little twinge of nerve over such scenes as he smoked his cigar when tens of thousands of his men were falling around him in battle.

But I care not what hero you bring up to maintain a cause against the Constitution, against the liberties of this country, in favor of negro governments, to subjugate the white men's Government, in favor of the bayonet against the Constitution and constitutional and representative liberty, you will find a host who will encounter you, and who will scatter you like chaff before the whirlwind. There will be no war. I have had enough war in my day. I never saw much of it, but I do not want to see any more. I have a great and instinctive and immovable mistrust of military men. Standing armies are the natural foes of constitutional government and popular liberty. The two things cannot continue and live and flourish together. One or the other must yield. The military, from the days of Washington up to the commencement of this war, was always subservient to the civil power. You have reversed the order of things, and you have made the military power omnipotent. You bring the Constitution of the United States and all its civil authority, and the constitutions of the States and all their civil authority, and all the majesty and rights of the people, to the feet of the military power, and ride over them rough-shod.

Sir, it is time this thing was coming to an end. You have performed your mission. The Republican party, in its first days, when it was pure compared with what it is at present, performed a noble service to the country in suppressing the rebellion. When the rebellion was quelled your mission was executed. You became then legitimately and properly under the Constitution and the laws of humanity functus officio. It is time that you should die, and you will die upon the ides of March, without any more ensanguined plains and without any further clash of arms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I care but little whether the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is adopted or not. It amounts to about the same thing as the original proposition. But I am not willing to let go unchallenged the things that have come from the honorable Senator from Kentucky. While he has been speaking I have thought whether there would not be a change in the form of the Lord's Prayer in Kentucky: "Give us this day our daily bread, if consistent with the Constitution; but be sure, O Lord, to give us white bread made for white men." That form, I think, would be adapted to the creed which the honorable Senator has just proposed.

In the course of an existence as long as that of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, there is hardly a phase of political life that he has not seen. I was forcibly impressed with that in his allusion to 1840. Where, then, was the honorable Senator's heart?

Mr. DAVIS. Exactly where it is now, for the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the law.

Mr. NYE. I recollect very distinctly that very year hearing the distinguished Senator denounce the Democracy in more unmeasured terms than he is capable of denouncing the Republican party. They had beaten his pet, Mr. Clay, and he never has forgiven them. He came here at the commencement of this rebellion a strong Union man; and he says now that he hugs to his very soul a platform that disunionists have made. I merely suggest these things to show that where next he may be found, the Lord only knows, in the new catechism which Kentucky may put forth.

He has spoken of the barbarities of some negro chieftain, whose name I did not understand, of whom he read. And yet those barbarities pale into insignificance in comparison with the butchery of Forrest at Fort Pillow; and he was one of the men who made the platform that my honorable friend loves so well. Above all men living, the honorable Senator is the last one, if he can hug such a thing to his bosom, to be shocked at the barbarities of barbarism, untutored as it is.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator says that the Republican party will die. So it will. So will the honorable Senator die. So will all the parties to which he has belonged die. But, sir, the fruits that this Republican party has brought forth will never die. They have not expended their strength, like the honorable Senator, in trying to depress a race numbering four millions in our midst. They have not taxed their ingenuity to find arguments by which they could make the bonds with which the slaves were bound strong. Their boast is, and will be when the honorable Senator's memory will be forgotten, that they felt for those who were in bonds as though they were bound with them, and broke the shackles that made man a slave. Let the honorable Senator and his colleagues and his coadjutors glory in their oppression, and glory in the fact that they have trampled the oppressed deeper in the mire of oppression where they found them. But, sir, let it be my boast and the boast of the party to which I belong, that there is not a man so low but what they would elevate him to the pure, highest heavens where angels dwell. Sir, that seems to me to be more in accordance with the spirit of our Master; that is more in accordance with the spirit of republican institutions; and that sentiment will grow. Let not the honorable Senator think that that sentiment will die. No, sir; it is now having its second birth amid the troubles and conflicts and toils of arms and civil strife.

Sir, I witnessed the gathering from which salvation is to come, which the honorable Senator perches upon and proclaims to be his roost during the campaign. I witnessed this organization. I looked in upon it. What did I see? I wish I had a Hogarth's pencil to sketch it, or words in which I could convey the faintest idea of that group of indescribable animals. Who was there? Wade Hampton; and at the mention of his name the Democracy shouted by order. That is what they call "fraternal love." Who else was there? Rhett, of South Carolina; it ought to be spelled with a ch. Who else was there? Hammond, who pronounced the people of the color of my honorable friend "mud-sills." Oh, what a source to look to for salvation! Who else was there? Forrest, the butcher. No milder name is fit to use as descriptive of him—a man who coldly murdered by order defenseless men who stacked their arms and surrendered. Tell me, sir, what kind of salvation you will get from that source? And where were they? In the largest city upon this continent. With whom were they associated? With men of the North. There sat Forrest and Seymour, the latter presiding over the deliberations, as they were called, of this convocation of unclean things. Whose voices were heard first? Men whose hands were red with loyal blood. Oh, the spirit of fraternity there exhibited! They always agreed. One was a traitor with a sword, and the other a traitor without a sword; that was all the difference. But how my honorable friend from Kentucky hugs their progeny! A sweet thing to hug! May your embrace be long and enduring!

Mr. President, what is this thing that the honorable Senator hugs so fondly? A greenback platform with an anti-greenback candidate.

Mr. SHERMAN. A grayback.

Mr. NYE. A grayback candidate.

Mr. SUMNER. On a greenback platform.

Mr. NYE. That is what I say. It is a platform for peace and a general for lieutenant on it, second in command, and a general who was nominated by rebels. I think, if my recollection tion is correct, an honorable gentleman from Kentucky nominated Frank Blair. I do not wonder that my honorable friend loves the platform. It is a platform whose every line and lineament is marked with repudiation. Is it for that that the distinguished Senator hugs it? It is a platform whose every line is a fraud and almost every word a lie; a platform of professions in which they do not believe, of hope to the head to be broken to the heart. That is the platform on which my honorable friend expects to ride into that happy haven where he is going to look with so much complacency, much as he describes Grant looking upon the battle-field, upon the destruction of the hosts of the Republican party. Perched away up on that uncertain roost he is going to have his vision satisfied by looking upon the ruins of those below. In 1864 I read a speech at quite a distance from here in which the honorable Senator was fully as sanguine in expression at least as now, that in 1864 the Republican party were to be demolished; but the Republican party survived both the prediction of the honorable Senator and the power of his opposition.

Sir, to these saviours we are to look. These are the men to whom in these troublous times my honorable friend from Kentucky and those who act with him turn for protection. Who are they? Men who are yet counting the notches upon their swords that they wore gallantly by their sides for four or five years in an earnest, terrible struggle to overthrow this country. They are the saviours now who are going to uphold them! How are they going to uphold them? By overturning all that has been done to build up the waste places they made. When a man is sick he seeks a physician the most skillful he can find. When a nation is troubled the people seek the friends of the nation to uphold it. They feel its pulsations. They want men loyal to the country, loyal to our institutions. There is where I look for help, for aid in this struggle. But my honorable friend and the Democratic host with which he is surrounded look to the rebels. They will give you such protection as vultures give to lambs. They will give you the protection that Forrest gave at Fort Pillow, and the thousand bloody fields upon which we met. What, sir, trust a man with a ballot to uphold this country who has been for five years with the bullet trying to overthrow it! It is an insult to the intelligence of the world; and I assure the honorable Senator from Kentucky the world will not swallow the hook as greedily as he has, nor hug a platform so full of dead men's bones.

Sir, I am sick, my very soul is sick with this struggle through which we have been passing. I thought we had reached the quiet haven of repose. The country needs it, the world needs it; and just as we get to the very goal in comes this firebrand of distraction to say that they are to wrest, and to wrest by force of arms, the governments that we have given these States, and it is done because we have provided that black men may vote.

Mr. President, on earth or in heaven I would rather be found by the side of the blackest man in the country than with Forrest. How will stand the account of the loyal black man that has been led by the uncertain glimpses of his vision to follow that flag which had heretofore only been a symbol of oppression to him, and followed it faithfully to the end; how will his account stand in the day of judgment with the God that loves liberty and of whom liberty was born, beside the man who did all in his power to tear down the fairest fabric that liberty ever reared? and such is Forrest; such is Wade Hampton; such is all the Democratic party in the southern States. There are not enough men in the Democratic party in the southern States who were not rebels to count as "scattering;" and therefore I shall not hereafter in what I have to say of them draw any distinction.

I want this resolution introduced by the honorable Senator from Vermont to guard against the very catastrophe that the honorable Senator from Kentucky threatens us with. Sir, is Congress to inquire, and who is to keep register whether the votes cast for General Grant are cast by colored men or white men? Who is going to see in the books when the ballot is deposited, which class of man it was who deposited it? Are the honorable Senators and his conferees going to have censors upon the box? Are they going to stamp the ballot of the white man and not stamp the ballot of the black man? If not, what does the honorable Senator mean when he defiantly tells us that no matter what Congress may do, the vote that the white man casts will be the vote that is counted. Sir, I repudiate all such nonsense as that, as it appears to me to be.

I have nothing against white men, sir. My complexion is not far different from that of the honorable Senator from Kentucky; but I never was educated to think that a difference in the hue of the skin made any particular difference in manhood. Hannibal, whose history has been the study of modern generals, was blacker than any negro in Kentucky. He led his armies to victory; and modern generalship is copied after his measures. I suppose the honorable Senator, from his prejudice on that score, would hardly accept the boon of liberty itself if it was won by a skin darker than his own.

But, sir, the honorable Senator has spoken very confidently of what the Democracy are going to do. I want to mention to the honorable Senator one or two things which the Republicans have done that will stay done. We have given the loyal men of the southern States the ballot. Now, take it away, if you can, and show us the process by which you will do it. Let us see what you will do it with. They have availed themselves of that ballot. They have deposited it; they have put on the garment of citizenship, and I challenge the Democracy to touch one thread of that garment. It is stamped, it is sealed with the insignia of freedom, and I charge you lay not your hands upon it. Sir, it is the decree of a mighty people as irrevocable as the decrees of God, and the honorable Senator may satisfy himself on that point. And the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] last night seemed to be waiting for the voice of the people. Sir, you have had it twice; and the same voice that emanated from heaven is echoed back by man, Vox populi vox Dei. Touch not that seal; it is the freeman's power. The ballot is his shield. He has got it. I defy you to take it from him. Attempt that and bloodier scenes will be reenacted upon the already fresh bloody fields. Sir, men fight for freedom. They will not lay it down. They have fought for freedom upon the battle-field; they won their quit-claim to liberty; they have got it; and let not the Democratic party dream of taking it away. And yet, sir, the honorable Senator, or those who act with him, find no sort of awakening, enlivening sentiment from this great fact, but the contrary.

Sir, there has not been a transaction on earth since the crucifixion that thrilled the world with such ecstatic joy as when the last shackle of the slave was broken and fell at his feet. Music never reached its perfection until they sang the song of universal freedom; and if I was at all accustomed to deal in fancy I could fancy now that I hear the angel chorus catching up the sound "Peace on earth and good will to man; the last slave is free; liberty is triumphant." But over this my Democratic friends feel no jubilee. It is a source of mourning to them. Weep on, weep on; the seal is set; the Democratic party will never again have power in this nation until it changes its principles, until it ceases to be oppressive and learns to glory in freedom.

I am strengthened in this conviction by the proceedings of the last Democratic convention. Whoever saw two such elements of weakness combined? If there was any folly in the Republican party, the wisdom of God has come in. Who could have conceived that two such men would have been born of that Democratic convention. Blair, (to begin with the last and most unimportant first,) who, as restless as the spirit that fomented rebellion in heaven, who acknowledges no discipline to man or law, "a law unto himself;" who throws on defiantly to such patriots as Hampton and Forrest that the only way to put these States into their original status is for the President to take the helm and drive this Senate out. No wonder that it woke an echo in Wade Hampton's bosom and in Forrest's and in Hammond's; it was the old signal for rebellion again. They were going to get a Blair to lead them in that rebellion. The world knows that the health of the gentleman they have nominated for President is very precarious, and he refused, as many times as Cæsar did the crown, to take it on account of his health. They have put forward this ticket in point of physical strength like the hyena, the strength in the hind legs to endure disease, its weak man ahead to be shoved off as Lincoln was, or in some other way, and then they will have got not only old rebels, but a new one with the whole machinery of government. It was well planned, and no wonder it awoke echoes of ecstasy in Forrest's and Hampton's bosom when they heard the name of Blair and his letter; and that is the platform and that the candidate that my friend from Kentucky loves so well.

Sir, who is nominated for President? A man that I have known all my life; and a gentlemanly man he is undoubtedly, but no unsound man, politically, walks than he. I listened last night to a little running debate between my colleague and my honored friend from Pennsylvania, in which the latter bore testimony to the patriotism and fidelity of the then Governor of New York. I took occasion to reread last night the speech made by that distinguished gentleman on the 4th of July, 1863, just ten days before the bloodiest riot in the world. It was a terrible day, that 4th of July, for the rebels; there came up a wall of woe from the rebels at Vicksburg and at Gettysburg.

Mr. STEWART. Will my colleague allow me to read a sentence of that speech?

"Remember this, that the bloody and treasonable and revolutionary doctrine of public necessity can be proclaimed by a mob as well as by a government."

Mr. NYE. Yes; I remember that sentence well. That was to this country a most important day. The cause for which my distinguished friend from Kentucky is laboring so hard today was in peril then. It was suffering from the blows of cool, quiet Grant, who smoked his cigar amid the confusion of the battle, as my friend from Kentucky says, which may be so. Abiding in that faith which patriotism always bears within itself in the result, he looked coolly, perhaps, upon the exciting moment, knowing that substantially peace was to follow. On that day thirty and five thousand Democrats laid down their arms within the intrenchments of Vicksburg. On that same day our noble soldiers gained a victory which paralyzed rebellion and gave freedom new life upon the bloody fields of Gettysburg. There was a great loss to the Democratic party; but true to their instincts, as soon as paroled from Vicksburg they took up their arms and stole to other fields.

On that day, after a draft had been ordered by the President of the United States to fill up the ranks, the head of this ticket was addressing a Democratic meeting in a hall in the city of New York, and he said that the law of necessity was never to be invoked by a nation, and said, not in the precise words, and they are here, that the mob could invoke the law of necessity as well as a nation. Sir, quick as the lightning's flash and as electric in its influence the mob did arise, caught up the idea that had been slumbering, touched the torch which engulfed a city in blood, and fatal were the consequences of that riot. I think eleven thousand—I am not quite certain as to the number—troops had to be taken from the army of the Potomac; a large number of troops had to be taken to the city of New York, the chief magistrate of which State is now the head of the Democratic ticket, to do what? To keep the peace in that city and to enforce the drafting of men and to put down the spirit of rebellion which was as rife there as at Charleston. The world will not forget the correspondence between Governor Seymour and General Dix, and I remember how my blood jumped a little quicker, old as I am, when the General informed the Governor at a certain time that he had troops enough there then to preserve the city and take care of him, too. Oh, such a patriot! Sir, if you look for salvation from that mob engendered by him go look at the ashes of the colored orphan asylum in New York. Would it have done the heart of the Senator from Kentucky good to have seen demons in human shape beating out the brains of black infancy? Look at the lurid light of the hospital reared by the best charity in the world. Look at the murder of O'Brien, who was brutally hanged and his form mutilated worse than would have been done by the barbarians whom the honorable Senator described this morning. This Governor addressed these bloody-handed scoundrels, and called them "friends." They were his friends; they are to-day; it is no misnomer. They caught up the torch which he lighted; they had performed the work; he was congratulating them upon it, and he addressed them as "friends." They received him as such. He is.

Mr. President, it is this ticket with this platform which my honorable friend loves so well. Sir, I know something of the Democratic party. I have been there. It is a party that never was beaten, and never could be so long as it fought the battle of freedom. In its vigor and its purity it was always as potent as my honorable friend thinks it is now in its decrepit, broken-down, rickety old age. Then, sir, it was a power. We quoted the founders of that party with profound love and respect. We repeated with admiration their principles everywhere. The mission upon which the Democrats then went out was to fight the battles of the oppressed wherever and whenever an opportunity occurred. Never till they trailed their honor in the dirty waters of slavery and took up the war of caste, which the honorable Senator from Kentucky now takes up, did they lose their power. Since they have taken that course they never have had the confidence of the country, and they never will till they cease to do evil and learn to do well.

Sir, I want the rule proposed by this joint resolution prescribed by legislation. I want no more trouble in this matter. We have wooed these States as a mother woos her first-born. We have given them milk in their weakness and meat in their strength. We have invited them back time after time to the mansion where there is bread enough and to spare, but they would not come. Now, sir, I do not propose that they shall come under the fiery and erratic lead of Blair or Seymour, and break into the mansion, the door of which they have heretofore refused to enter. To do that they shall, at least so far as my vote is concerned, break over the forms of law.

But, sir, we are gravely told by the honorable Senator and everybody that talks on that side, that all these laws of ours are unconstitutional. It is reserved, perhaps, for the historian to write that the only true constitutional lawyers are the honorable Senator from Kentucky and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, and that my friend from Vermont, my friend from Illinois, and my friend from Maine know nothing of the Constitution. It is reserved for Kentucky alone to save the Constitution, to save the white man, to curse the black man, and to wind up things generally in that way. Be it so. That is a point on which I shall not comment.

Mr. President, indulge me in a word more. It is said that in union there is strength. We have a platform made with entire unanimity.

But recently, for four or five sweltering hot days in the city of New York, in that new-born Babel of Tammany, did hundreds of Democrats sweat, voting for this man and that man, with no result, and all the time there was a deep laid plan, which the mass of them did not comprehend, to get the very man they have got. I cannot help contrasting in my mind that convention with the one at Chicago. The convention at Chicago had just twice as many delegates as the one at New York. The first thing done there was to make a platform on which they all agreed, and the next thing was to nominate a President, and each State was called and each State answered until six hundred and three delegates had spoken, and every vote was for one man right off, without any caucus, without any consultation. They looked to him as the child looks to its father for protection. They remembered the thousand victories to which he had led them, and their eyes as involuntarily turned upon him as a leader in the civil strife as in the strife of arms. To me that was a noble and inspiring sight. Let not the honorable Senator from Kentucky believe that such unity of sentiment is to be overborne by this fragmentary party called Democratic.

Let me refer to another difference. We have a warrior at the head and a man of peace emphatically as the second nominee, a man whose name is written as firmly and as broadly on the civil page of his country's history as General Grant's is on the military page. When Grant was leading our armies against the hosts of the rebellion it was prophesied that Lee would never surrender. Now, the Senator from Kentucky, bolder, braver, and less considerate than Lee, says that this platform with its backers will never surrender. Let him that casteth off his armor boast; not he that putteth it on. Sir, there will not be enough of it for formal surrender. They will be suffered to go home without terms. Their arms are worthless, for they are the arms of error; their weapons are powerless, because they are untruthful. No, sir; my gallant friend from Kentucky will have to seek affiliation with another party before he gets in a majority. He will have to join the army of progress and freedom, hitching to no snub-post of the past, but marching on to that haven of destiny of man where all men shall be equal before the law.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have been very much interested by the speech of my honorable friend from Nevada. It has been very various and very rich, but not much to the point, and there was not much logic in it, either. My honorable friend reminds me very much of the exclamation of an old lady who went to hear a preacher who was said to be a very eloquent pulpit orator. After she had listened to him for some time she exclaimed, "Oh Lord, what a good preacher he would make if he only had grace," and I think grace is all that my honorable friend needs to make his oratory effective. [Laughter.]

He is not always accurate in his information. A little while ago he spoke of the ticket at New York as a hyena ticket, for the reason, as he said, its strongest part was behind. I have heard such a thing called before a kangaroo ticket, but never a hyena ticket, [laughter;] and what similitude my honorable friend can make out between that ticket and a hyena I do not know. Again, he spoke of the presence of Hammond of South Carolina at that convention, and how he exulted in its work. According to my recollection, Governor Hammond has been dead about six years. I believe he was the author of the celebrated phrase in regard to the mud-sills; but I think in his lifetime it was his boast either that he was born in the North or that his father was a Massachusetts man. I believe in olden times when there were slave owners and slave drivers, the Massachusetts men who strayed off to the South were worse than the southern men.

My honorable friend speaks of what has been done by the Radical party to win for itself immortality, and among his first boasts was that it had broken the shackles of all the slaves in the land. I do not think in justice that party could have done much less. I have read that about three hundred and thirty thousand negroes were brought from Africa to the colonies; and that the northern shippers brought about three hundred thousand others, and according to my recollection when the law of Congress abolishing the slave trade went into operation, the State of my honorable friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, had about fifty-seven ships engaged in the slave-trade. I think the northern people and their posterity who did so much to plant slavery on the Continent of North America, owed it to the injured race at least to give this evidence of the great change which had come over them. I do not object to it.

The honorable Senator from Nevada has spoken of the Chicago convention and of the New York convention, and of the Chicago platform and the New York platform. Well, sir, the platform at New York repudiates forever slavery. Has my honorable friend any exception to that plank? It repudiates forever the principle of secession. Has my honorable friend any exception to that plank? I have none. But his convention of Chicago spoke of negro suffrage to be imposed by the northern States upon the South; and they themselves to be exempted from it. What sort of a plank is that? What sort of statesmanship and philanthropy is there in any such nonsense as that? My honorable friend spoke of nonsense and he spoke of the decrees of God. I should think that the latter at least was a matter about which he knew very little. It may be because he is deficient in that article of grace which the old lady thought so necessary to constitute a good preacher.

My honorable friend spoke of Forrest being at the New York convention. Who was at his Chicago convention from Georgia? Was there not one Joe Brown; and was not Joe Brown the first man to pull down the flag of the Union from Fort Pulaski at the beginning of the rebellion? The honorable Senator spoke of men who were in the convention at New York reeking with blood of Union soldiers. That was very bad; but I care not what rebel comes up from the South, how red his hand may be with the gore of slaughtered Union soldiers, if he chooses to abjure his position and makes a declaration, and especially an oath in favor of Radicalism, the honorable Senator and his compeers are willing to hug him to their bosom, and they do it constantly. I suppose they have this advantage of the honorable Senator, in the estimation of the old lady at least, that they have received grace. Now, sir, I have not much confidence in a traitor, and I have no confidence in a double traitor. A man who has betrayed his country, his Government, the stars and stripes, and with impious hand has drawn the sword to murder his country, ought to be satisfied with that one act of perfidy and perjury, without seeking to get into the ranks of an ascendant party that he may be tempted to commit another treason. Where repentance is sincere and reaches the soul it is modest, and shrinks back from the gaze of the public, and especially from imputed allurements of office.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator is a popular orator. I will not say that he is a demagogue, but I will say that he is a powerful and a most dexterous, popular orator. He understands the game of waving the hand and putting aside the main issue. There was a time when there was a main issue in this land, formed in this and the other House of Congress. It was when the resolution was passed a few days after the battle of Bull Run, declaring the objects and purposes for which the war should be prosecuted, and under what circumstances it should be terminated. That was a wise, patriotic, and statesman-like platform; it won the hearts and confidence and hopes of the nation; and if the party in the majority here had fought their battles upon it constantly with fidelity from that time to this, they would, I think, be impregnable. It is because they yielded that platform with its great and patriotic principles that they have become weak.

The honorable Senator spoke of my reference to Grant and his indifference in battle. I believe that General Grant is a patriotic and honest man; he is unquestionably a man of courage and of will; but I do not think he has one other single quality of a great military man. When you speak of intellect that can plan a great campaign and that can take intuitively and comprehensively into its conception of the movements of a great army, he is as unequal to that work as he is to make a world. He has had success. What was the secret of it? He fought the battle of Belmont, in which he was badly used up. He went to Pittsburg Landing and there he encountered sore defeat, and even the Union officers who followed Buell's lead there and regained the lost day say that if Johnston had reformed he would have destroyed Grant and the Army under him; and I doubt it not. It was the gunboats in the river that saved him then. The siege and capture of Fort Donelson was the work of Smith, a much abler man naturally and as a soldier and as a scientific warrior than ever Grant was or ever could be, if he should live to the age of Methuselah. If Buell had not reached the field of Pittsburg Landing, Grant and his army would have been destroyed and we should not have heard of this candidate for the Presidency.

When he came here to the Wilderness and moved upon that line, as he said he would fight it out on that line if it took him all summer, he did not fight it out on that line; he deployed from it every day until he reached the point where McClellan struck for Richmond, and in this bloody enfilade upon the enemy he lost fifty per cent. more of soldiers than that enemy commanded. He lost in killed, wounded, and missing from eighty to one hundred thousand men. Look at the correspondence between McClellan and Stanton when McClellan was before the same point two years before. You recollect the story, not of McClellan's disastrous campaign, but of the base and infamous manner in which he and his army were abandoned by the authorities here. He was promised the corps of McDowell, forty-five or fifty thousand, a division of ten thousand in the upper valley, and ten thousand more from Fortress Monroe. If he had received these reinforcements then and there, in thirty days Richmond would have fallen; the rebels would have yielded; half a million of slaughtered men would have been saved to their country and their families, and a thousand or fifteen hundred millions of treasure would have been saved to the nation. We all knew that the object was not to suppress the rebellion; it was not war to put down the insurgents; it was war upon slavery and slaveholders, and the war was to be prosecuted until slavery was abolished and until the slaveholders were subjugated. All who were here at the time knew it to be so. This man Stanton was in the War Office.

After McClellan met with his reverses in the seven days' battles and he and the Government began to feel apprehensive for the safety of the Army, he wrote to McClellan exhorting him to bring it off safely. What did McClellan say? "If I am enabled to effect that work, I shall owe its success neither to you nor to any man in Washington." He had said before, "Give me fifty thousand men of reinforcements; give me the men you promised me, and I will bring this war to a close." He called for fifty thousand troops to reinforce his Army that then was not more than equal, if it was equal, to the enemy behind his intrenchments. That was refused. Then he asked successively for thirty thousand and twenty thousand, and the invariable answer was, "No; a man cannot be spared," but when the present candidate for the Presidency was appointed to command that Army he could meet the enemy and suffer his bloody slaughter of ten thousand a day and each day more than replenish the places of those slaughtered in his ranks. He received in the way of reinforcements thousands and tens of thousands more of men than McClellan had when he beleaguered Richmond.

Mr. President, it is not because he is a military hero. It is not because he has great capacity in war. He has no such capacity. It is because he is an uninformed man, a stranger to statesmanship and policy. He comes a novice into the hands of his keepers; they will manipulate him as they please; and because he holds the command of the Army, and you have made him by your unconstitutional laws to supersede the Constitution itself, and to supplant the President in the command of the armies in the ten States and to a limited extent in the whole United States, you have nominated General Grant.

Sir, I told the honorable Senator from Nevada that we had two great issues here. The first is, Shall the bayonet or the Constitution be the law? and the other is, Shall the negroes appoint the President of the United States, and shall this be a negro Government or a white man's Government? These are the issues, simple, comprehensive; and we care not where men stand on other and immaterial issues if they are right here. If the men who voted for the resolution proposed by Andrew Johnson after the battle of Bull Run had adhered faithfully to that resolution, I would always have been their supporter as I was then. Now, I do not care who battles against the bayonet for the Constitution, who battles for the white man's Government against negro Government, I am with him. If the honorable Senator from Nevada would come I would hail him as an ally in that cause if I believed him faithfully and truly enlisted in it. Talk not of "greenbacks!"

What are greenbacks when put in contrast with popular liberty and constitutional government? Nothing; but that platform says that the obligations of the Government are to be met according to the bond. If the honorable gentleman excepts to that let him except to it; but that is nothing, not the dust in the balance compared with the great, controlling, grand issues that address themselves to the American mind with resistless force. Are you for maintaining the supremacy of the bayonet and martial law, or are you for sustaining the Constitution? Are you for the white man's Government or are you for negro Government? Are you for eight million white slaves under the mastery of four million negroes in the South, or are you for enlarging the white men of the South and restoring to them that political power and that right of government which the Constitution secures to them? These are the issues. They are important issues. They are the issues on which I enter into this contest and upon which I intend to wage and maintain it.

The honorable Senator seemed to suppose that I contemplated there being double sets of electoral votes from the southern States. I expect no such thing. I do not believe the majority of Congress and the Army will permit any free election in those States. Whenever the Army is withdrawn those States, white men and negroes, will vote against the Radicals. Any of those States which may be allowed to vote at the ensuing election will vote under their reorganized constitutions. I have no dream that there will be any attempt to set up any previous governments and to cast a vote under them. If it should be so, they will be stifled, suppressed, they will not be allowed; but if you will allow a free election there under your own laws, you will lose more than half the votes of those States. I have no hope nor dream of a free election under your own laws. You back up your laws by military compulsion and by the presence of the bureau, and you will not allow anything like a free election even under your own laws.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have no defense to make for General Grant; he needs none. I simply rise to call the Senator from Kentucky back to the great issue presented by the New York convention, and that issue is the issue of peace or war. General Blair wrote a letter to a member of that convention less than one week ago, in which he said, "If we elect our President"—that is the substance of it—"it will be his duty to use the Army of the United States to overturn and to disperse the State governments that have been erected in the South under the action of Congress." That is rebellion; that is war. He says, "If I go before the convention I want to go before it upon these principles." He says, "The question of greenbacks, of finance, of taxing bonds and all that are unimportant compared with this." And he went before the convention on that letter, and he was nominated almost unanimously on the first ballot. That is the great and broad issue presented to this country, and is not to be obscured by attacks on General Grant or by anything that may be said of the past. It will now be more important to talk of the future rebellion that is threatened and promised by the Democratic party than even to talk of the past.

Mr. President, this is the issue, and I should have been glad to have heard the Senator on that issue. He supports General Blair, he supports Mr. Seymour. The Senator from Pennsylvania last night said that they had laid down a platform. Yes, sir; the logical result of the platform laid down by the convention is the same thing as General Blair's letter. They declare that the reorganized State governments in the South are unconstitutional, null, and void. The logical result of that is what General Blair has said. General Blair has made his utterance. He says, "I go before the convention upon this declaration of war against these State governments," and the convention takes him; the Senator takes him; the convention has affirmed the declaration of General Blair and there is no escape from it. I call upon Senators, therefore, to meet the issue boldly and frankly and not attempt to obscure it as the cuttle-fish does in which he makes his escape. Sir, this, then, is the issue: shall there be acquiescence in and submission to the action of Congress; shall we again have peace in this country; shall we again resume our progress, growth, and prosperity; or shall war become the normal condition of the United States as it has been of other countries? The Democratic party has declared for war, continuous, unending war except upon the condition of the success of the principles of the rebellion.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, a word in reply to my honorable friend. The convention at New York formed their platform before they nominated their candidates. They do not square their platform according to their candidates, but they make their candidates square their opinions and purposes according to the platform. As I understand the platform, it does not present any issue of war which has occurred to the imagination of the honorable Senator from Indiana. They do not allow their candidates, if I understand the principle upon which they act, to make platforms for the party. I am not of the party; I was not represented in it; I had no voice in making the platform; I am speaking of it simply as I understand it. They make a platform upon which their candidates must take position, and by which they must square their principles and their purposes in the canvass if they should be elected.

Now, sir, I am not for any war at the termination of this election for the Presidency; nor for war for the inauguration of the President who is elected, whoever he may be; but I believe, as I said before, that the numbers in favor of the Constitution over the bayonet, and of the white man's President over the President of the negroes will be a majority of three fourths of all the electoral votes.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to ask the Senator a question, with his permission. I ask if there is any repugnance or disagreement between the platform adopted, in the shape of resolutions, and the letter of Francis P. Blair, and if so to point it out?

Mr. DAVIS. I have not read Mr. Blair's letter with any particularity, but I think that it speaks wider, broader, than the platform speaks or intended to speak.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, my idea is that the issue of reconstruction is dependent upon popular votes in the States represented in Congress. I went over the grounds of that opinion last night, and attempted to vindicate it. Of course I shall not repeat the argument on this occasion, but I refer to it as constituting, in the main, my answer to the present remarks of the Senator from Indiana.

I have an idea that when the people in their sovereign capacity—I mean in the States about whose organization there is no doubt—shall have pronounced their judgment, there will be an acquiescence in it and no necessity for any party to resort to force. I have an idea that the currents of human action, particularly in our country, are governed by moral causes; that this country is under the dominion of moral power, and that the force of popular judgment, as expressed in the presidential election of the present year, will be potential and efficacious in itself and in its direct and necessary consequences to terminate this protracted dispute over reconstruction. That is my view.

Now, let me tell the Senator that in the case supposed, the case of a majority given in the adhering and regularly-organized States, I undertake to say that the Supreme Court will have its mouth opened; there will be no longer any attempt to muzzle that court; we shall get its honest judgment of the legality of the system, at least of the military part of it which was involved in a case pending before it, when the present Congress undertook to withdraw jurisdiction by a particular bill. I undertake to say that when the freemen of this country in their sovereign capacity, upon this very subject of reconstruction, have pronounced their voice, in these very ten States concerned there will be acquiescence, there will be no popular turbulence, there will be no necessity to resort to force in order to carry into execution the judgment of the people.

I do not agree with General Blair that it would be necessary to overturn everything and remit society back into a state of complete disorganization. It may be thought provident and politic to use existing forms, to give them such modification as the Constitution and the principles of justice may require; and I have no doubt that there will be concurrence and assistance, as well as acquiescence in these very States themselves. They understand that a majority of the adhering people of the United States, who went to war with them and by whose patriotism and whose sacrifices the result was achieved have a moral power to determine this very question of reconstruction; and they will acquiesce, I venture to say, promptly and thoroughly in any judgment which these northern and western populations may pronounce.

However this may be, sir, the whole point made by the Senator from Indiana is answered by the platform itself, made before candidates were selected, in which the judgment of the convention was pronounced upon this question of reconstruction, and it was handed over to the people for their judgment. There is no threat of war, of violence, of revolution, of unlawful action. These men are freemen, loving the institutions of our Government and desirous to maintain them; and in an orderly and legal and patriotic manner they submit this subject of reconstruction which Congress has controlled to the decision of the masters of Congress, the decision of the people themselves. That is all they have done in their platform; that is all they have asked of the people, a judgment upon the merits of this question, and a judgment upon it for the first time. The people have never had an opportunity yet to pronounce upon it, because there has been no election of members of Congress since 1860, and all these reconstruction laws have been passed since. What the convention did was to send down to the people for their sovereign judgment this question. It was an appeal from the political majority in the two Houses of Congress that they framed there, and they have sent it to those who are competent to pass judgment upon it and whose judgment will carry such moral power and strength that it will be felt throughout our country and it will repress all elements of turbulence and disorder. It will not be necessary to levy armies, to gather munitions of war, to awake the passions of the people of this country, to array them in hostile camps against each other. The institutions of our fathers give us means for a peaceable solution of this question of reconstruction.

We ask no more; we expect nothing else. If we are beaten in this issue, we submit because it is the decision of the highest authority and of the highest power in this country. If the decision is with us, justly and of right, and of necessity also, the contrivances of the political majority in Congress must go down before the judgment of the people, and they will go down. I attempted last night to state the grounds for this judgment and to vindicate it by reasons which must be most apparent to every intelligent observer.

The Senator from Indiana would raise a specter of war to fright us from our propriety; to prevent a just popular judgment upon the real question in controversy between the great parties of this country. Sir, he will fail. They were not alarmed in former years when the specter of war was shaken before them. They went forward and they executed their purpose. Whether it was right or wrong they had courage and will to pursue their own course and to pronounce their own judgment; and just so it will be in the elections of the present year. The Senator from Indiana is to go to his people upon the merits of this controversy and get their judgment as freemen upon it from beginning to end. All these laws are to be passed in review, and for the first time, as I said before, judgment is to be pronounced upon them; and nobody is to be frightened, nobody is to be alarmed. This people are sovereign; and their will is the fundamental law, higher and behind even the written forms of the Constitution itself. They are not to be alarmed by this cry which comes up to us from the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the original resolution and the amendment both read.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask that all three propositions that are lying on the Clerk's desk be now read, the original resolution, the amendment I proposed, and that offered by the Senator from New York.

The resolution and amendments were read.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if there be any one here who has not listened with pleasure to the very eloquent speeches of which this measure has been the occasion it is he who remembers, that this is the 10th of July, and that abundant opportunity will be afforded on the platform and at the hustings for the discussion of all those questions which have been so earnestly presented to-day. The proposition before us is an eminently practical one; it is a proposal to do that which, properly understood, it seems to us, will be the subject of universal accord, if we can only hit upon the mode of bringing it about. The law as it is now, by the Constitution, is precisely the law as each one of these three propositions attempts to declare it. By the Constitution, without referring to any part of it except a single clause of the second article, it is clearly for Congress, or for the Senate sitting in the presence of the House of Representatives and counting the votes, to see to it that no State is represented unless the condition of things concurs provided in each of these propositions. The language of the Constitution is that—

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

"In such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," thus presupposing, thus having as an indispensable prerequisite to the proceeding here ordained, the existence of a constitution in the State and a Legislature operating under that constitution. The pending proposition, therefore, is merely declaratory, declaratory of the law, which, I submit, would be administered without objection and without agitation on any ordinary occasion; but we stand in the presence of events, and we are waited upon by contingencies which admonish us that a declaration should be made in advance so plain and specific that no political party, that no political faction, maddened by disappointment or ambition, may plausibly insist that action has been taken by the national Legislature in either of its branches for the purpose of accomplishing the success or the overthrow of a party ticket or a party measure.

Article twelve of the amendments to the Constitution—I need not stop to quote it—proceeds upon this same theory. And therefore, as I have said once before, the simple question is in what form we shall declare the law so as to make the declaration certain and ample for the occasion.

Now, beyond all question, three communities known in the history of our country as States, are not at this time entitled to have their votes counted in the choice of a President. I refer to Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia. Whatever may be the theory of gentlemen as to the status, politically, of these States, the historical fact is patent that the forms of government as they once existed have been prostrated, and, in the language of the acting President of the United States, "all civil government has become extinct," unless the provisional governments which were set up afterward are for this purpose to obtain; and upon that I believe nobody insists. We have presented to these States, in common with all the other States—and I make this remark now in answer to an observation which fell from my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] yesterday—the plan which, for the time being, at least, must be accepted by all concerned as the only road leading to restoration. Neither Texas, nor Mississippi, nor Virginia has qualified itself in this the only recognized mode of representation in the Electoral College. Unless they shall be qualified hereafter in season, beyond all question, accepting what is fixed now as legislation, however we may differ as to its propriety, these three States must be excluded from representation in the Electoral College. This follows, let me stop to observe, and I will devote a moment to it, according to the law as announced by the Supreme Court in the case which has been quoted here many times, and as the law has been accepted always by all departments of the Government. It follows from the theory that to Congress as the law-making power, or the political power of the country, belongs the recognition or the refusal to recognize a State government in any particular State as the legitimate government there, because, although the Rhode Island case did say that to the President belonged the power to determine which government he should aid by ordering troops in that instance, as I heard the honorable Senator from Kentucky argue at great length some time ago, the court said that that was the result because the act of 1795 committed to the President the determination of that question, that Congress might have committed its determination to a court or to any other body known to our organism, and then the prerogative of recognizing which government was regular would have been located as Congress had located it; but the action of the Legislature was that the act of 1795 had reposed that power in the President, and therefore the court said that to him and to nobody else at that time appertained the administration of that power.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator, I think, has misrecalled the point that was decided. The court did not decide that Congress could have conferred on the President or any other power the right to recognize the government; but the court decided that Congress might have conferred on the President or any other power the authority to determine the fact of an insurrection in a State.

Mr. CONKLING. I should not have referred to that case if I had supposed it would lead to any controversy; but, without sending for the book, the point of that case, I undertake to say—and I submit to be tried by the honorable Senator for my error if I commit any—was this: The Governor of the State of Rhode Island had a right to make a requisition for troops in order to quell insurrection; and the original question in the case was which of the two governments was the true one. By the act of 1795 Congress had reposed in the President the power of responding to a call for troops; the President had responded; and the court held that in so responding, by that act he had determined for himself and for the Government of the United States which was the true government in Rhode Island. Why? Because there resided inherently in the Executive the power to determine that question? Not at all; but because Congress had invested him with the power; and the court say in so many words that Congress might have invested a judge or a court with the same power, and had Congress done so the determination of the question by the court or judge so invested would have had the same virtue and the same effect as they held attached to the determination of the President of the United States. But I beg my honorable friend not to draw me into a discussion of the particular point of that case any further, as he will see that the question between him and me is not important to the purpose for which I introduced it. I say that it has been held universally by bench, bar, Government, and people, that to Congress pertained the power of saying which government in a State was regular, as an elementary proposition; and when you add to that the fact that the Senate, in the presence of the House of Representatives, is to count the votes which represent a State organization, I think I need not argue or split hairs with the honorable Senator in order to come to the conclusion that in this instance, at all events, the determination of that question is reposed either with Congress or with the Senate sitting to count the votes in the presence of the House of Representatives.

Now, the question arises as to the mode of making this declaration and making it most effectual. The honorable Senator from Vermont advances a proposition which he speaks of as coming from the Judiciary Committee, and in a certain sense it does come from the Judiciary Committee. It does not, however, I violate no propriety in saying, come from any portion of that committee, majority or minority, as a proposition without amendment to be supported in the Senate. The honorable Senator had permission, by the votes of a majority of the committee, to report that proposition, those who composed that very majority saying at the time that they reserved the right to perfect it, and expected it to be perfected and changed in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not so understand, though it is not a matter of any very great consequence. We want to get it in the best form, and if my friend's form is the best we shall all say "amen." The only difficulty is that a great many of us do not see it. In committee the measure was considered in the usual way, if it is proper to state what occurred there, and the honorable Senator himself moved an amendment in committee which, after discussion, was agreed to, and the measure was directed to be reported, as I understood, in the ordinary way. I do not mean by that that any member of the committee is not at liberty to move to amend it further and make it as perfect as it can be; but I certainly do not understand it as stated by my friend. However, he may be correct.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope we shall not get into any controversy over so small a point. In committee I voted that the Senator be permitted to report this joint resolution, but I accompanied with it the statement that I would not support it in the Senate as it stood. The honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] did the same thing, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. TRUMBULL] did the same thing. This point is of no importance except that I do not want the Senate (this discussion having run very wide, so that Senators cannot be expected to follow it all the way through and give close attention to it all) to take it for granted that either of these forms has the approbation of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body. On the contrary, we shall all agree that the committee decided that the measure should be reported, and that we should perfect it in the Senate.

The joint resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Vermont proposes, naming certain States, to make a special act applicable to them and applicable to this one single case. Why should we do that? If we are going to declare, not to bind our successors, but simply to bind ourselves in February next, what we will do in counting votes from certain States, we do not need any law for that, we do not need to wait here ten days for a veto and struggle to pass by a two-thirds vote over a veto such a law; we only need a concurrent resolution. Why? Because it would not be designed to apply to any case except one now before us, or to bind anybody except ourselves. The resolution which was passed in 1865, although it took the form of a joint resolution, and not a concurrent resolution, was special and temporary. It was sent to President Lincoln, and he signed it, and what did he say in doing it? He was criticised with some harshness at the time for saying that, although he signed it, he thought it did not pertain to him at all; that it was a mere concurrent resolution. I have here the message which he sent to the two Houses, and I beg to read it, as it is very brief:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College," has been signed by the Executive, in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes, and he also disclaims that by signing said resolution he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble, or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

Why was that? What was the idea of the President? That there was a resolution reciting certain facts about certain States relating to a certain election; and if that was all that was to be done it was not for him to express any opinion about it or enter into it one way or the other; and no doubt he felt the delicacy of his position, as he was at that time the successful candidate between whom and his competitor those votes were to be counted. I agree entirely that if the whole purpose is to make provision for a given case at this particular time, and not to bind our successors or to make a general provision, we need nothing except the suggestion of Mr. Lincoln, a concurrent resolution giving notice beforehand what we shall do.

But again, the proposition of the Senator from Vermont calls by name certain States, and says the votes from them shall not be counted in certain contingencies. Now, to show the danger of that sort of enumeration let me mention that in looking over this bill I see that Tennessee is omitted entirely. Why omit Tennessee? Is there not as much danger in Tennessee of irregular action, of the interposition of military force, of lawless invasion, and of electoral votes being sent here despite that State organization quite as hateful to the honorable Senator from Kentucky and as obnoxious to his criticisms, to say the least, as the organizations in the residue of these States, and quite as liable, I may say, in the face of current history to be disordered and overturned as the organization in some at least of the States which are here enumerated?

But, Mr. President, the votes of North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, &c., are not to be counted upon the happening of certain things. Suppose that the same things occur in the State of Maryland, is the vote of Maryland to be counted? Suppose they occur in Kentucky or in New York, are the votes of those States to be counted? If there is a Shays in Massachusetts, or a Dorr in Rhode Island, or a whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania, or an anti-rent insurrection, which we have had in most formidable proportions over and over again in the State of New York, and they prostrate the modes of election, overturn regularity, and send by lawlessness and usurpation electors to an Electoral College, and their votes are transmitted here, are they to be counted on this occasion, or on any future occasion?

In 1864, we stood upon the law as the Constitution makes it; as we might have stood upon it since but for these troublous times, full of suspicion, of discord, of animosity, and of elements of disturbance. But now that we do so stand, why should we adopt a provision, partial, special, technical, temporary, if we are going to pass any law on the subject? I agree that the amendment offered by my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. DRAKE] is an improvement upon the original proposition, and I shall vote for it with great pleasure if I am unable to get the consent of the Senate to my own proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the Senator from New York whether his proposition provides that in any case New York shall not be represented in the Electoral College? Does he so understand it?

Mr. CONKLING. The proposition provides that the vote of no State, whether it is New York or any other, in which the State government has been overturned, in which there is at the time no government under which an election can be held or is held, can be counted. That is precisely what the Constitution says now, as I have been arguing longer than perhaps I should, to show; for when the Constitution says that electors shall be chosen in such mode as the Legislature of the State shall prescribe, if there is no legal Legislature there, then electors cannot be chosen and votes cannot be counted. Therefore, it says precisely what the Constitution declares it shall say, provided we are to declare anything on the subject.

But I was saying that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri goes further than the original proposition, and it would, at least, embrace Tennessee. I am inclined to think it would embrace something which the Senate are hardly contemplating; and I beg the Senator's attention to these words, "No State heretofore in insurrection." The words are not "No State heretofore declared in insurrection." Maryland was in insurrection; and literally, according to this amendment as he proposes it, the vote of Maryland would not be counted at all.

Mr. DRAKE. Will my honorable friend from New York be so good as to name the time when the State of Maryland was in insurrection?

Mr. CONKLING. Oh yes, sir; I will name that time. My friend, who is a lawyer, will remember the maxim that that is certain which can be rendered certain; and I therefore render the time certain by referring to the occasion when George B. McClellan, with the universal acquiescence of the loyal people of America, swept away the Legislature of the State of Maryland and blotted out her Statehood entirely, for the reason that she was in open, rampant rebellion against the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress. I do not say it was declared by the President to be in insurrection, and was in that sense technically in insurrection; nor does this amendment require that she should have been so; and therefore it is that I invite the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact, that in order to exclude Maryland from the operation of his amendment he should change its language thus, "No State declared in insurrection." Maryland was not so declared; but practically, historically, politically, militarily, Maryland was in insurrection quite as much as some of these other States.

Now, Mr. President, not to detain the Senate on this subject, I wish to suggest, as briefly as I may, the idea with which I have proposed the amendment I have submitted. It is first to put upon the statute-book a permanent provision for all cases and for all times, and a provision so specific that it cannot be eluded and cannot be baffled by the omission, accidental or otherwise, of any particular State—a provision which, looking not only to the dangers immediately before us, to the three States whose condition is special, to the residue of the eleven States, the condition of some or all of whom may be special, but looking to all the States, shall make adequate provision.

Why should we not do that? What is the object, I beg to ask the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] referring to a remark which he made yesterday. What is the object we have in view here? It is to close the door of the Electoral College against all those not entitled to enter. The Senator assents to that, as he must. That is what we are all driving at. The object is to close the door of the Electoral College against all States not entitled to enter. Then why not say so?

Mr. HOWARD. Against those mentioned in the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the honorable Senator mean that if between now and the election an outbreak should occur in some State not mentioned in the bill, in consequence of which the same state of things legally should come about which he fears, he would be in favor of counting those votes? I beg the Senator to let me know what he means by saying "those mentioned in the bill."

Mr. HOWARD. I have this to say: I do not anticipate any further insurrection in the States at present; and least of all do I anticipate any insurrection in the loyal States; and to pass such a law as that which is contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from New York appears to me to be a very unnecessary and gratuitous reflection upon the loyal States of the Union who have never rebelled, and who never intend to go into a state of insurrection. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof"—a very sound and ancient maxim. When one of the loyal States goes into rebellion, I take it we can deal with it as the occasion requires.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, Mr. President, I am very glad that the honorable Senator has reversed the current of his objection, as he has done, if I understood him correctly last night. He says now that he does not anticipate that any of the loyal States will have an insurrection. Does he anticipate, I should like to inquire of him, that those governments which we have been setting up will fall down before November?

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then this, as I said before, is a declaratory measure for abundant caution, to provide for possible contingencies, and that is all it is. Then why does the Senator say that it is a reflection to suppose that, within the range of possibility, things which have occurred in the loyal States in the past may be repeated in the future at some time.

Mr. FOWLER. Before the Senator from

New York proceeds further, I wish to know whether his amendment provides for this possibility: in case any insurrection or disturbance occurs in a State between this and the election, may Congress when it meets declare such State in insurrection and refuse to count its votes? Is that the Senator's understanding of the effect of his proposition?

Mr. CONKLING. I am not sure that I understand the question of the Senator.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the Senator's proposition authorize Congress, when it shall meet next winter, to say that any particular State may have been in insurrection; or, in other words, that there is no regularly organized government in that State, and therefore refuse to count its votes?

Mr. CONKLING. The amendment authorizes the Senate, in the presence of the House of Representatives, to do exactly this: if votes shall be received purporting to come from a certain State, to pass upon the question first, whether when that election took place there was a constitutional government in that State, and second, whether the election was held under the auspices and authority of that government; so that, although there should be in Tennessee a regular government, as there is, if marauders, moss troopers, a mob, a vigilance committee, should hold an election and send electoral votes here, the Senate would adjudicate that, although there was a regular government there, the election had not been held by force of that government, and therefore the votes were not entitled to be counted.

Returning for a moment to the honorable Senator from Michigan, his objection now is that my amendment embraces too much, that it is too strong, that it is a reflection upon the States which have not been in insurrection. I thought I heard him say last night that the objection to it was that it was "velvet-clawed." I think he used that very expression.

Mr. HOWARD. "Velvet-footed."

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon, "velvet-footed," a troop of horse shod with felt. That was the idea, that the oars were muffled, that there was not spattering enough, that the words were not valiant enough, that there was some bravery or some virtue in calling these States by name and saying something snappy and crisp with regard to them. I differ entirely with that criticism. I do not think that using strong words or having anything declamatory in a bill makes anything for it. On the contrary, when you say that no State shall be permitted to do a certain thing under certain circumstances, that includes all States. A very old lawyer in my State once said to a nervous client who was troubling him about a contract, thinking the thing was not sufficiently described, that it did not say all that was necessary. "Never mind; when you said that you sold a horse, that meant that you sold his head and his tail and his mane and all the rest of him, just as if you wrote it all down." So I think when you say that votes shall not be counted from any State whatever, in which such a condition of things exists as is here described, that is no more velvet-footed, it is no more squeamish or mealy-mouthed than it would be if you wrote in the names of all these States and called them some hard name besides.

Now, Mr. President, there is no doubt whatever as to the meaning of this provision as it will stand in the light in which it was criticised last evening by the Senator:

Unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors there shall be in such State a government recognized by Congress.

Stopping there the criticism might be that Congress had recognized the provisional governments in the South, or had in time gone by recognized the old governments. Therefore the provision is:

Unless there shall be in such State a government recognized by Congress as regular and permanent and not provisional only.

Stopping there the criticism might be, "True, there may be such a government there, but yet they may have elected these electors under the old governments which are held by those of a certain opinion to have smoldered and continued through the rebellion." To meet that the further safeguard is:

Nor unless the election for electors shall have taken place under the authority of a State government so recognized.

Does not that provide for every case?

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to one fact?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. It is claimed by the President of the United States, certainly a very sagacious man in some respects, as well as by his entire train of followers, including the whole of the Democratic party lately so ably represented in the New York convention, that Congress has already recognized the Johnson governments established in the ten rebellious States. Does the Senator from New York intend to leave that question open by his amendment; and does he not leave that question open for discussion; and may it not happen in the future that under such a provision the two Houses might hold that the governments established under the decrees of Johnson were the recognized governments of the rebel States? Had we not better close the door against all doubt on that point? I look upon it as one of great delicacy, not to say difficulty, in the future.

Mr. CONKLING. I hardly think the Senator would have asked that question if he had attended to the reading of the language of the amendment; but as he has asked it let us examine the language once more:

Unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors there shall be in such State a government recognized by Congress as regular and permanent, and not provisional only.

Upon that language I have two points to which I should like to direct the Senator's attention. "Unless there shall be in such State a government." What does that imply? A government in existence, not merely a government in theory. I have not a right to say that? Because the subsequent provision is that the election must have been held under the authority of that government. Therefore is it not merely hypercritical, but is it not going a bow-shot beyond hypercriticism for the Senator to insist that this might be held to mean the Johnson provisional governments, when, in the first place, in every one of these States the ground is occupied by a later government substituted for it, and when the amendment expressly provides that every government which has been recognized merely as provisional is denounced by its terms, and that electoral votes coming from such a government as that shall not in any event be considered.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator will not fail to observe that Mr. Johnson and his followers do not regard those governments established by him as provisional governments. They are spoken of by him and them as the permanent lawful governments of the States, and in no sense provisional. The addition of the word "only" certainly gives no force to the language.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator loses sight of the parties to this controversy. The bill is not providing in reference to governments recognized by the President; it is providing for governments recognized by Congress; and does the Senator say that Congress, even if it can be said that those governments were ever recognized at all by Congress, recognized them in any sense except as provisional and temporary governments merely? The language of the statutes, several of them, is the precise language here. I not only say that no votes shall be counted from a government which has been recognized as provisional, but I add after "provisional" the word "only," and therefore, how does the Senator make headway when he argues that the President has recognized those governments? Has Congress recognized them? That is the point.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not argue that there is any weight in the recognition of these governments by the President; I do not think there is. I do not think he had any right to recognize governments in the rebel States at all. I suppose the honorable Senator and myself agree on that subject; but there is a party who hold that his organization of State governments in the rebel States was valid and constitutional, and that those governments are the permanent lawful governments of the States; and they insist upon it, they have insisted upon it in this Chamber, as the honorable Senator knows very well, that Congress has on repeated occasions recognized by its legislation the existence and the validity of those governments. Would the honorable Senator leave that very important question open to debate and discussion hereafter?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all; and therefore I propose to close the question by excluding from the provision all governments which have been recognized as temporary or provisional. Now, does the Senator mean to say that anybody has argued that Congress, speaking at this time, recognizes or has recognized those governments as legitimate, permanent governments, contradistinguished from provisional governments, when the President himself and his party, as has been argued here over and over again, and greatly at length the other day by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] have never treated them as anything except temporary and provisional governments?

It may be said that that objection which the honorable Senator makes, which is so unlike the objection he made last night, has the recommendation of ingenuity; but he must pardon me for saying that I do not see that it has. It seems to me that it is a criticism made in the very teeth and letter and obvious meaning of the provision. "Unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors, there shall be in such State a government recognized by Congress as regular and permanent, and not provisional only." How anybody in the face of that language can say that there is room for the shadow of a doubt as to its meaning in the behalf suggested I cannot comprehend.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will ask the Senator whether his amendment would not exclude the votes of States situated as Wisconsin once was, whose votes were counted in the joint convention of the two Houses? Would it not exclude the votes of States that may have been taken under provisions made by their constitutional conventions before State organizations have been actually organized or an act of the State Legislature passed authorizing the election of electors? There may be cases of that kind where it would operate very inconveniently; cases where there would be no question about the validity of the new State; no objection to its organization or its constitution; and yet it might not have gone through all the necessary forms to meet the requirements of his amendment before the electoral votes were taken.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator what he means by not having gone through the forms required by this amendment?

Mr. BUCKALEW. The form of setting up a State government, and having regular authority by virtue of State law for holding the election of electors, and the acceptance of the constitution by Congress, and the admission of Senators and Representatives, all which would seem to be contemplated as constituting recognition by Congress under the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not understand the provision at all as the Senator does in that respect. The original proposition recites what are to be the prerequisites, and recites the things to which the Senator has referred among others. This provision is that there shall be in the State a government which Congress recognizes, and that the election shall have taken place under the authority of that government. If the Senator can put me the case of a Territory which does not come within this provision, the votes from which ought to be counted, I should like to hear such a case as that stated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Of course the territorial organization might continue until the State was fully organized under the enabling acts of Congress. The electoral votes might be taken before the new State organization was perfected, and yet there be no earthly objection to the reception of those votes.

Mr. CONKLING. How would this amendment interfere with that?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think it would exclude the vote.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Territory is to be treated as a State within the provision at all, then it seems to me the language is exactly adapted to admit it. Why not? It would have a government, which government would be recognized by Congress, and the election would have taken place under the authority of that government. That is precisely what is provided for here.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think the new government set up in such a case would be strictly provisional, until the State constitution and representatives should be accepted by Congress, and the State fully admitted. It would fall exactly under the description of a provisional government.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think so. I cannot imagine any case which would fall within it. I do not think there can be such a case put. If there can then it would be impossible to have any general provision on this subject, and it would be impossible, I submit to the Senator, to execute in its terms the mandate of the Constitution in that respect.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state to the honorable Senator from New York that just such a case has occurred in the history of this country. The constitution of the State of Missouri was adopted in July, 1820, the year of a presidential election. Suppose that State had gone on at the presidential election to elect electors in the expectation of being admitted. There would occur a case where it had not been recognized at the time of the election in November, and such a case may occur again, and yet Congress would recognize it afterward, and before the counting of the electoral vote. If the honorable Senator perceives my meaning, he will perceive at once a case that might arise.

Mr. CONKLING. I say that is a case that did not happen. If in addition to what did occur other things had occurred that would have been a case. My answer to it, to be brief, is this: there are several answers to it, but one will do; if afterward Congress recognized it as a State, that would be the end of the whole thing. If Congress did recognize it and did count the votes, of course it would be held to be within the provision as it would be, and that would settle it altogether. You might state the case on the constitution as it stands just as strongly as you can state it upon this provision, and I ask the Senator from Missouri to look at the language of the Constitution: "Each State shall appoint in such a manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." That cannot happen in such case as he states, for it would not be a State, but Congress afterward in the case he has supposed would condone that and treat it as State for that purpose, and that would settle the whole thing, and that would be just as much under this declaratory provision as it would be under the Constitution without any provision of law about it, because if you are to stick in the letter the Constitution stands just as much in your way as would a provision of this sort.

Mr. DRAKE. How can that be, when the Senator's amendment says that at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors there shall be in such State a government recognized by Congress, and the election shall have been held under the authority of that government. The constitution of the State of Missouri was formed in July, 1820, and its Legislature was elected in August, 1820, and that Legislature went on to perform the functions of a State Legislature and elected Senators in Congress, and they by virtue of that election were admitted into Congress as soon as the State was admitted. Now, suppose a question had never arisen there in regard to the admissibility of Missouri; suppose a controversy over the question of slavery had not arisen, and Missouri had been admitted before the counting of the votes, but not before the day of the election, and had presented her electoral votes, if such a law as this had been on the statute-book, it would have excluded them and required repeal.

Mr. CONKLING. To go back to the point of the Senator's question, which, I think, was in his first suggestion, all that can be just as the Constitution can be, and if the Senator will give me his attention I will try to answer him precisely. "Each State shall appoint in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." That implies literally that there is to be a State with a Legislature, and that the direction is to precede the choice of electors, not only to be at the same time, but earlier than that. To enforce this literally, how could you ever count the votes in such a case as he has put? You could not do it obviously, because there was no State, there was no Legislature of a State prior to or at the time of the choice, and therefore all you can do is to condone it and treat it as virtually complied with afterward when you count the votes, and that you can do under this provision. If the Senator will look at the Constitution he will find that his criticism is just as strong applied to the discrepancies between the case he states and the Constitution itself, and I think more so, than it is between the case he states and this provision.

Mr. President, I have occupied much more time about this matter than I intended when I rose; and when I make a single further observation, I shall relieve the Senate. I do not think it is worth while for legislative or for political purposes to put forth in an act of Congress the idea that we expect that the particular States which we have been reconstructing are to tumble down or collapse before the next presidential election. I do think it is prudent to have a general provision on this subject for abundant caution, as we had in 1864; and as we are compelled to make one now in reference to the three States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, which are not in condition to vote, I think it is worth while, while attending to them, to extend it so as to provide for any possible danger; but to select suspiciously and tremulously those States which we have just rebaptized, and say that while we fear no commotion anywhere else, we are trembling lest there the rebellion should break out again, as an act of legislative or party policy does not commend itself to my judgment. Nor does it commend itself to my judgment to pass a temporary act, as we did in 1864; and now let me remind my honorable friend from Michigan that if ten years ago the very proposition which I offer to-day had been adopted, there would have been no such occasion in 1864. He will agree with me about that. There would not have been any necessity for the provision, nor any proposition by joint or concurrent resolution in 1864 to provide for this.

If the provision is adopted now no matter what may take place in this presidential election or any future presidential election on this head, we have a statute which stands a harmless statute unless difficulty arises, and which, if difficulty of this sort does arise, will provide for every case, be it North, South, East, or West, just as well for a Dorr or a Shay's rebellion, or an anti-rent rebellion in the State of New York, as for secession in the State of South Carolina. While we are about it why should we not adopt a general and lasting provision on this subject, disclosing no weakness and no unreal apprehension in any direction, but providing abundantly for every adverse contingency which any Senator can apprehend?

I have no pride about this, Mr. President, I need not say. I shall vote with great pleasure for the original proposition introduced by the Senator from Vermont, if we come to that, with one or two amendments, which I shall take the liberty to offer; and I have no doubt that, so far as the present occasion is concerned, and the substance of it, that provision will be adequate; and yet I must think that a general provision to be made durable, and to apply to all cases, would be much wiser for the present and the future than this special and temporary proposition.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, there is so much said in the Senate that might just as well not be said for the purpose of shedding light on any question that the greatest trouble I ever have to address the Senate at all is to determine whether I have anything worth saying. I think there is something worth saying about this matter. I am not going to wander from the points of the case and not going into any political discussion; I simply wish to have the matter shown in its true light and in as brief terms as I can possibly command.

It is of no manner of use for the Senator from New York to talk about introducing a general proposition here and putting it upon the statute-book of the country when he knows, as well as he knows anything else, that it never would have occurred to him in the world to introduce such a proposition as this but for the fact that this Congress has been through its whole history so far, and the next preceding Congress through its whole history, dealing with States that were in insurrection; and, sir, we might just as well come out and treat the subject upon that basis, admit to the country that we are still dealing with States that were in insurrection and not undertake to salve over the whole thing by adopting a general proposition which, in my opinion, is an insult to the loyal States to adopt at all. The very proposition that we have gone upon in all our legislation is that these insurrectionary States ceased to be States in connection with the Union by their insurrection, and that it was necessary that they should be readmitted to representation in Congress. The amendment that I propose directly affirms that fact by its terms. The Senator from New York shies clear round it, and says nothing whatever about it. It does not refer, either, to the insurrectionary States; but proceeding upon the idea that there is a necessity for a general law, it goes into the enactment of a law which could have no possible necessity except in the fact that insurrectionary States exist.

Why should we do this? Why should there be such a law put on the statute-book with regard to Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Missouri, and all the other loyal States of the Union to determine the question here whether their governments had been recognized by Congress when the joint session of the two Houses meet in February next? There is necessity for it. I do not understand the reason which lies at the bottom of the amendment of the Senator from New York. Does he dislike to come up and talk in plain terms about these insurrectionary States and deal with them upon the basis of their readmission to Congress and the substitution there of lawful and permanent for provisional governments? If he does, I do not. I choose to take this matter by the horns exactly as it stands, to put no general statute upon the book for which there can be no justification in the circumstances of the country. You can find no justification in the condition of any of the States but those that engaged in rebellion; and I wish to make it distinctly and pointedly applicable to them. This is the whole purpose of my amendment; that is the difference between the amendment of the Senator from New York and the one that I have proposed, that he undertakes to deal as to the whole nation and all the States on a condition of things that is not applicable to all, while I undertake to deal with the rebel States and the condition of things applicable to them only. Therefore, sir, it is that I think the amendment I have proposed is preferable to his.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from

New York [Mr. CONKLING] to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ross, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalow, Cattell, Cole, Conness, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Howard, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Tipton, Vickers, Williams, and Yates—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, and Welch—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DRAKE. I propose to amend the amendment by inserting in the first line after the word "heretofore" the words "declared to be."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. We have never declared them to be simply in insurrection; we always say "rebellion."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Five o'clock having arrived, the Senate according to the order will take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven and a half o'clock p. m.

POST ROADS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to move a few amendments. I move to strike out lines seven and eight, under the head of "California," in these words:

From Trinity Centre via Summersville, Petersburg, Cecilville, Centreville, and Black Bear to Sawyer's Bar.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to strike out line thirty-seven under the head of Minnesota, in these words:

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to insert after line twenty-one:

KANSAS.

From Waterville, via the county seat of Clay, Cloud, Ottawa, and Saline counties, and Sharp's Creek to Wichita on Walnut Creek.

The amendment was concurred in.

Smith.

VALLEJO AND HUMBOLDT BAY RAILROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 349. My object is to get the bill read; I shall not ask action upon it just now.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 349) granting aid in the construction of a railroad from the town of Vallejo to Humboldt Bay, in the State of California, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Public Lands proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of California, for the use and benefit of the San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company, (a company organized and created under the general laws of said State,) the right of way through the public lands of the United States for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Vallejo to Humboldt bay, and the right, power, and authority is also hereby given to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road material of timber, earth, and stone for the construction thereof; said way is granted to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad, where it may pass through the public domain.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad on the line thereof, between Calistoga Springs and Humboldt bay, where the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from preemption or other claims or rights at the time the line of said road is designated by a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And whenever, prior to said time, any of said sections or parts of sections shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or preempted, or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof, under direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections, and designated by odd numbers, not more than five miles beyond the limits of said alternate sections, and not including the reserve numbers: Provided, That all mineral lands be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the operations of this act: Provided further, That the word "mineral," where it occurs in this act, shall not be held to include iron or coal: Provided further, That the lands hereby granted to aid in the construction of said railroad shall be sold by the State of California to actual settlers in quantities not to exceed one quarter section to any one person, and at a price to be fixed by the company not exceeding $2 50 per acre, and the amount received for said land shall be paid by the State to said company, after deducting all the expense incurred by the said State in making such sales. And all sales so made shall be made upon the following terms, namely, one-fourth of the amount thereof shall be paid in cash at the time of purchase, and the balance thereof shall be paid by the settler in three annual installments with interest, not to exceed seven per cent. per annum, until paid. And the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect, and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence, in such form as the Governor of the State may prescribe, that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase: Provided further, That any alternate even-numbered sections along the line of any railway, which have not been sold or entered upon by actual settlers within ten years from and after the survey and location of said railway, shall be disposed of on the same terms as other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever said San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company shall have ten consecutive miles of any portion of said railroad and telegraph line ready for the service contemplated, the Governor of the State of California shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that ten consecutive miles of the said road and telegraph line have been completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as in all other respects required by this act; and thereupon patents of lands, as aforesaid, shall be issued to said State, confirming to the said State for the said company the title to said lands situated opposite to and commencing with said completed section of said road. And from time to time, whenever ten additional consecutive miles shall have been constructed, completed, and in readiness as aforesaid, and verified as aforesaid to the President of the United States, then patents shall be issued to said State for the use of said company, conveying the additional sections of lands as aforesaid, and so on as fast as every ten miles of said road is completed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That said Vallejo and Humboldt Bay railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary draws, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turn-outs, stations, and watering-places, and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling-stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first class when prepared for business, with rails of the best quality; and a uniform gauge, being the same as that of the Union and Central Pacific railroads, shall be established throughout the entire length of the road. And there shall be constructed a telegraph line of the most substantial and approved description to be operated along the entire line. And it shall be the duty of the San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company to permit any other railroad which shall be authorized to be built by the United States, or by the Legislature of the State of California, to form running connections with it on equitable, just, and fair terms.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall cause the lands to be surveyed for ten miles in width on both sides of the entire line of said road, after the general route shall be fixed, and as fast as may be required by the construction of said railroad; and the said odd-numbered sections of land hereby granted shall not be liable to sale or entry or preemption after the line of said railroad is designated by a plat filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as provided in section two of this act, except by said company, as provided in this act. And the reserved alternate even-numbered sections shall not be sold by the Government at a price less than $2 50 per acre when offered for sale.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein, are so made and given to and accepted by said San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company, upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: that the said company shall commence the work on said road within one year from the passage of this act, and shall complete not less than ten miles per year after the second year, and shall construct, equip, furnish, and complete the main line of the whole road by the 4th day of July, A. D. 1880.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the United States make the several conditional grants herein, and that the said San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company accept the same upon the further condition that if the said company make any breach of the condition hereof, and allow the same to continue for upward of one year, then in such case, at any time hereafter, the United States may do any and all acts and things which may be needful and necessary to insure a speedy completion of the said road.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the acceptance of the terms, conditions, and impositions of this act by the said San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company shall be signified in writing under the corporate seal of said company, duly executed pursuant to the direction of its board of directors, first had and obtained, which acceptance shall be made within one year after the passage of this act, and not afterward, and shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the directors of said company shall make and publish an annual report of their proceedings and expenditures, verified by the affidavits of the president and at least five of the directors, a copy of which shall be deposited in the office of the said Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely: to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times, but particularly in time of war the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said San Francisco, Vallejo, and Humboldt Bay Railroad Company, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. CONNESS. Now I move that the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTORAL VOTES OF LATE REBEL STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of the morning session is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized. That joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.]

Mr. DRAKE. With regard to that amendment, in consequence of a suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas just before the Senate adjourned, as to the use of the word "insurrection," I have examined the acts of 1861, and the proclamation of the President in regard to the insurrectionary States, and have found that I had correctly used the word "insurrection." I have now modified my amendment so as to embrace the very language of the acts and proclamations of 1861; and it reads thus:

"No State whose inhabitants were by the proclamation of the President of the United States of August 16, 1861, declared to be in a state of insurrection, shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral vote be received or counted from any such State, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of such electors the State shall have been readmitted to representation in Congress, nor unless the electors shall have been chosen under and by authority of a State government theretofore recognized by Congress as lawful and permanent, and not provisional."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish Senators to pay a little attention, because the only object any of us have is to get the measure in the best form. I studied the subject somewhat myself before the original resolution was introduced; and going over the debates of 1864 and 1865, and the various forms in which Senators then offered amendments to reach this same result, I thought it was altogether wiser to take what was then settled upon as the foundation of this proposition, because men of all parties agreed to that form and voted for it. As I stated to-day, it was maintained that in that form it was the true and proper expression of legislative will; and I would be glad to have the Associated Press—who have to-day, I see, reported my advocacy of the joint resolution, which was all I was entitled to, but who have omitted to report what I read as to the previous opinions and declarations of the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Illinois—if it is not too much trouble to them, to put what they said, or the substance of it, into their report, because, as the report goes out to the country in the evening papers, the Senator from Kentucky is represented as contending that Congress has not any power or jurisdiction whatever over this question. I would beg of the Associated Press, as a favor to the country, and for the cause of history, to put in the opinion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky delivered three years ago, in which he most clearly demonstrated that this was one of the subjects over which Congress had jurisdiction, and upon which they ought to act.

That having been settled in 1865, and in this very form that the resolution I have introduced settles it, naming the States, and declaring what should be the rule as it respects those States, I thought it was altogether wiser upon a question of this kind that we should take that as the settled and proper form, and merely reenact it by declaring that the state of things which then existed still continued until those communities should have restored themselves according to the plan laid down by Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. With the honorable Senator's permission, as he has referred to the argument contained in the remarks which I made in 1865, I beg to say that he is mistaken. I did not admit the power of Congress to decide whether a State had the right to cast electoral votes or not. What I admitted was that Congress might regulate the simple matter of computing the electoral votes. If I recollect what I did say, and if I recollect what the honorable Senator read this morning from that debate, this was the extent of my position.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To that I have only to reply by asking the reporters of the Associated Press to report exactly what the Globe shows that the Senator from Kentucky did say, which I read this morning, and the country then will judge what his two positions are as distinguished between 1865 and 1868.

Mr. DAVIS. I am sorry that the honorable Senator gives himself any trouble about what the reporters of the Associated Press report of his remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not.

Mr. DAVIS. I never give myself any trouble about or any attention to what they report me as saying. I would as soon they should report one thing of me as another, because I care not what they do report, and I should hope the honorable Senator was as indifferent as I am in relation to that matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have found no fault with the Associated Press as to reporting me. They have always done me entire justice by condensing what I have to say into a very narrow compass indeed. What I was saying was that inasmuch as my honorable friend from Kentucky is known over the whole country as a public man and as a jurist, I hoped they would do the country the benefit of reporting what he did declare in 1865 as well as what he declared to-day. That is all.

Mr. DAVIS. I am obliged to the honorable Senator for his courtesy, and I hope he will extend it a little further by reading himself all that I said on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have done so with the greatest satisfaction and instruction. Now, to come back to the precise point that is pending: when you have studied the debates of 1865 and the form in which they were finally crystallized into a statute, we find that our predecessors at that time thought the wise and safe way was to say exactly what we did mean as it respected the very States of which we spoke, and it therefore declared that those States, naming them, there having been votes sent here from two of them, were not legally entitled to be represented, using in the main, so far as the prohibitory branch of it is concerned, the very language which is contained in the joint resolution now reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and which was copied from that joint resolution. That resolution had a preamble which recited "that the inhabitants and local authorities of the States of Virginia, North Carolina," and so on, reciting them, "rebelled against the Government of the United States, and were in such condition on the 8th day of November, 1864, that no valid election for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, according to the Constitution and laws thereof, was held therein on said day;" and therefore Congress proceeded to resolve that "the States mentioned in the preamble" were "not entitled to representation in the Electoral College" at that election. That was the declaration. Now, this joint resolution stands precisely upon that position, which was then agreed to, with the concurrence of all parties, and merely declares, naming those same States, that they shall not now be entitled to representation unless they shall have organized themselves into a new political community, and shall have thereafter once more been restored into the brotherhood of States. It is a logical, necessary consequence of that legislation. Now, on a question which is represented by the Senator from Illinois and several others to be a delicate question, is it not wiser to take a settled form, and follow it in substance and in form, which has been agreed to by gentlemen of all parties, than it is to resort to any new rule? I think it is; and it was so thinking, and after having tried almost all the experiments that my friend from Missouri and my friend from New York have, that I came to the conclusion that it was wisest to follow what our predecessors had settled upon.

One very serious objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, until he has now modified it in the light of later events, (which shows how unsafe it is to pass upon an amendment in a hurry,) was that as he proposed it it declared that "no State heretofore in insurrection" should be entitled to representation, &c. That leaves open the very question that we are trying to foreclose, because our honored friends on the other side maintain that no State as a State ever has been in insurrection or rebellion. That is the very dogma upon which they hang all their hopes. But my friend from Missouri has now modified it, so that as to that particular objection the difficulty is removed, and his amendment now provides that "no State whose inhabitants were by the President's proclamation of August 16, 1861, declared to be in a state of insurrection shall be entitled," and then copies at quite a little distance the language of the original joint resolution. I do not now remember whether all these States were named in the proclamation of 1861. I presume the Senator from Missouri has looked to that.

Mr. DRAKE. Every one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That proclamation, as I remember it, was partial as to several States, omitting several districts in some of the States, and naming the others altogether. Of course in a running debate in the Senate we cannot tell precisely how such a provision will apply. But still if Senators think it is better, instead of naming, as the joint resolution of 1865 did, by name the very States that we meant to operate upon, and in respect to which as a matter of precaution there is a necessity for action, to pass a general formula, be it so. Action is called for, not necessarily on account of the violence that has been talked of, but because according to the distinct announcement of the Democratic press and of the Democratic leaders it is fairly to be presumed that there is an intention to have a vote cast for electors there by white men, as they call them, not necessarily by overturning the other governments, but quietly, and on the ground that by the laws of 1860, still in force as they say, the white men are entitled to do that—to have a quiet election and send on a set of votes from the white men alone, when another set will come from the reorganized governments. It is, therefore, necessary to declare by law which of these two ostensible representations from such a State is to be received.

Then there is another provision in this amendment that these States shall not be entitled to hold this election, and so on, until the States "shall have been readmitted to representation in Congress." It is a somewhat equivocal phrase. One gentleman would say "that meant 'until they had become entitled to representation,'" and so far I should agree to it. Another would say, my honorable friend from Pennsylvania with his keenness and clearness would say "that meant 'until their Senators and members had been actually admitted,'" that they could not hold an election although they might have become entitled to be admitted, and therefore next February, when the votes come to be counted, if the State of Alabama or North Carolina should happen to have voted in a direction that he should consider to be the wrong one or the unconstitutional one, and their Senators and Representatives had not before the 8d of November actually taken their seats, he would say their votes under this provision were not to be counted. That may or may not be a correct construction. It is somewhat equivocal. It will bear either interpretation, whereas the object of this law is to provide against any such open question being raised and to determine by a rule which does not admit of any misinterpretation, no matter how ingenious may be the person who would wish to misinterpret it, what shall be done in that contingency.

Now, Mr. President, saying this, and only saying it in the interest of getting that which shall state what we propose in the clearest and most specific way, having the sanction of all parties for its form adopted in 1865, I feel obliged to oppose this amendment of my friend from Missouri. Otherwise I have no objection to his amendment or to that of my friend from New York. What they desire I desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DRAKE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DRAKE. I notice one feature of the original joint resolution to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. Simply that if the Senate choose to put this matter upon that basis, it will do so with a full knowledge of the exact position of things. The original resolution does not make the admission of the electoral vote of any of these States dependent upon the readmission of the Representatives and Senators of these States to their seats in Congress, but upon the fact that the people of such State and before the day of choosing the electors have adopted a constitution under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation. Therefore, Mr. President, we are to leave the matter, if the original resolution is adopted, at loose ends so far as determining the question whether these States are again admitted to representation in Congress. If I am wrong in this matter the honorable Senator from Vermont will correct me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will correct my friend. What the resolution reported from the committee provides is—that is the substance and effect of it—that when these States, Alabama and North Carolina, and those that we have now provided may be admitted and yet whose Senators and Representatives have not come, shall, under our law which authorizes them to come have complied with it and become entitled to have their Senators and Representatives in this Capitol, then they shall be entitled to cast their votes for President, and to have them counted. That is the proposition which the bill contains; and it is not indispensable to their voting that their Senators and Representatives should actually have been received, because according to ordinary expectation we shall probably have adjourned before the Senators and Representatives from all those States will have been received here, as a mere matter of time. Suppose we should; I do not know that we shall; but take it for granted that we may; my proposition is that having adopted the fourteenth article of amendment, having got their governments in operation under this act of admission which has passed, as the Senate knows, and having taken every step pursuant to our law to put themselves upon their original restored footing, they may be entitled to vote on the first Tuesday of November, and let their Senators and Representatives come here and be sworn in, if they are not before, on the first Monday of December, to which we shall adjourn when we do adjourn; and that I think is right. They ought not to be deprived of their vote for whomsoever they may cast it, because we do not interfere with that; nobody wishes to interfere with it. They are perfectly at liberty to vote the Democratic ticket if they think they can carry the platform and candidates; nobody objects to that; but they ought to be permitted, when they have complied with all that Congress requires, and their Senators and Representatives have become fully entitled to be admitted, to then cast their vote for President, although it may be three or four weeks afterward before those Senators and Representatives actually come in.

Now, I understand my friend's construction of his amendment to be the one I supposed might be put upon it, and he would require that they should actually have come here and been sworn in and admitted to their seats. I think that is going too far.

Mr. DRAKE. I think that I can state the whole proposition in much fewer words than those employed by my friend from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt that.

Mr. DRAKE. It is simply this: whether the Senate will agree to letting the electoral vote be counted in those States which have not been declared by Congress to be entitled to representation here by the admission of their Senators and Representatives, or whether they shall go on and elect upon their assumption that they are entitled to be readmitted. There is the whole thing. The question is, in other words, whether we shall take their electoral vote before we have ourselves recognized practically their right to readmission, or whether we shall wait until after that practical recognition has taken place.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will permit me to say that as to five States, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and Louisiana, who have not yet their Representatives here, by a bill we have passed they be now readmitted and entitled to representation as soon as they adopt the fourteenth article of amendment; and as to one of them, Georgia, there is another little condition about not enforcing a particular article of her constitution, and that the Legislature is to vote upon it. No matter for that. Then we have declared as to these five States that their constitutions are satisfactory to us, that their people are justly entitled to be remitted to self-government now. If we should happen to adjourn before their Senators and Representatives get here, after they have adopted the fourteenth article, I can see no ground of justice on which they should be precluded from voting for President. If the Senate do, very well.

Mr. DRAKE. Then the matter stands in this way: we have declared that they may be admitted upon the happening of a certain contingency, may be admitted upon their doing certain things; and now the proposition is to give them the right to send in an electoral vote here before we ourselves have declared that the conditions of admission have been complied with. I merely wish the Senate shall see sharply and distinctly the point of difference between the two propositions, and if it is the desire of the Senate to take the original instead of my amendment, certainly with all cheerfulness I will abide their judgment.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I like the amendment of my friend from Missouri best in one respect, and yet I think there is a great deal of force in the last argument I have heard from the Senator from Vermont. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is amendable.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I beg to submit a slight amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to strike out in the sixth line the words "been readmitted," and insert in lieu thereof the words "become entitled." I do not like that part of the committee's resolution which recites the States. I prefer that they should not be recited. I like the style of the amendment best.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri if he has referred to the proclamation mentioned in his amendment, and is quite certain that it enumerates the States that were in rebellion. I do not wish to make any mistake on that subject.

Mr. DRAKE. I did so, and had the book here. I will have it again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I prefer the phraseology employed by the Senator from Missouri in his amendment, if it be true that that proclamation does refer to the eleven States that were at one time in rebellion against the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Oregon will listen a moment, I will read him a clause from the proclamation:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in pursuance of an act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, do hereby declare that the inhabitants of the said States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida, (except the inhabitants of that part of the State of Virginia lying west of the Alleghany mountains, and of such other parts of that State and the other States hereinbefore named as may maintain a loyal adherence to the Union and the Constitution, or may be, from time to time, occupied and controlled by forces of the United States engaged in the dispersion of said insurgents,) are in a state of insurrection against the United States."

Mr. DRAKE. That is it.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, that is it; but the Senator from Missouri will observe that the proclamation contains exceptions. One exception is the whole of what is now West Virginia, and then there are exceptions of parts of other States which are not in insurrection, and those parts of States which are occupied by the troops of the United States. It presents a very complicated question.

Mr. DRAKE. When the proclamation expressly declares that the inhabitants of those States were then in insurrection, with some slight and inconsiderable exceptions, I should hardly think there could be any question as to the States referred to in the language of my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not altogether pleased with the phraseology of the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Vermont, but at the same time, since the reading of that proclamation, I can see that a door will be left open there for controversy, and it is desirable, if we legislate upon this subject at all, to make our legislation clear, certain, and definite, so that it can be understood, and so as, if possible, to avoid any future controversy on the subject. I suppose that the object of this joint resolution is simply to provide that so many of the States which were in rebellion as are not entitled to representation in Congress when this session of Congress adjourns shall not be allowed to cast electoral votes for President and Vice President. That is the purpose of the joint resolution. I should prefer to have phraseology employed less diffuse and more pointed than that contained in this original joint resolution. I suppose that it will be necessary for somebody or tribunal to decide this question as to whether or not these several States have complied with the reconstruction acts of Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if he has any doubt as to whether Arkansas and Florida have complied.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have none whatever.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then why should we pass a resolution declaring "if they comply."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that there is objection to including those States; but there is a suggestion which perhaps would have some force upon the idea proposed by the Senator from Illinois, and that is, that it is not only necessary under this resolution that these States should be entitled to representation in Congress, but it is necessary that electors should be elected under the government that is recognized by Congress.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire again of the Senator from Oregon if he has any expectation that anybody is to be elected in Arkansas or Florida under any other government, or would give color or countenance to such an idea for a moment by passing a resolution to provide against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I must confess that I have not much expectation that any such election will be held in those States; but it is impossible to foresee what may happen, and from what has been put forth to the country by very high authority it is possible that revolutionary proceedings may be organized there for the purpose of carrying the presidential election. It is possible, although I acknowledge it is not very probable in my opinion, that the white men of those States may undertake to hold a presidential election under the provisional governments that were set up there by the President, and repudiate the governments that were organized under the reconstruction acts of Congress because they allow suffrage to the black men. I am very sure that proclamations have been made by men very prominent in the party opposed to the reconstruction policy of Congress that some means were to be devised to overthrow and destroy these State governments that were set up under the reconstruction acts of Congress. Whether that attempt will be made at the presidential election, or whether those persons may suppose it most expedient to wait and see if their candidate is not elected, is more than I can determine. But if we are to have any legislation at all on this subject it is desirable that it should be as explicit and as unambiguous as possible.

I was about to say that these questions as to whether or not these States have complied with the reconstruction acts of Congress, as to whether or not their electors were chosen under the governments that have been recognized by Congress, must be questions to be decided, I suppose, by Congress when it proceeds to count the electoral votes, for there must be some tribunal or some body somewhere to decide these questions in case a controversy should arise; and although I am not so fully impressed with the necessity of this legislation as some other Senators, because it seems to me that the power is in Congress at that time to pass upon all these questions, yet it is perhaps advisable to have some legislation on the subject, and I would prefer to have this joint resolution so constructed as to refer exclusively to those States that are not entitled to representation in Congress when this session adjourns. That is the way the resolution ought to read, and that is what it ought to mean, and not provide that certain States whose Senators and Representatives are now in Congress, shall not, in a certain contingency, be entitled to representation in the Electoral College. I have no time to suggest an amendment, but that would suit my views better than any of the propositions that have been submitted. I concur with the Senator from Vermont that whenever a State is entitled to representation in Congress it should be entitled to have its electoral votes counted for President and Vice President; and if we should adjourn in a week or two before Senators and Representatives from some of those States are able to take their seats in Congress, I do not think that therefore those States should be denied the right to have their votes counted for President of the United States.

Mr. DRAKE. I have concluded to accept a modification of my amendment at the suggestion of the Senator from California, and have further modified it, so that it now reads:

No State whose inhabitants were by the proclamation of the President of the United States of August 16, 1861, declared to be in a state of insurrection, shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral vote be received or counted from any such State, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of such electors the State shall have become entitled to representation in Congress under the reconstruction acts thereof, nor unless the electors shall have been chosen under and by authority of a State government theretofore recognized by Congress as lawful and permanent, and not provisional.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the Senator one question in reference to this modification. I understand the amendment now to be applicable to those States which were proclaimed by the proclamation of 1861 to be in insurrection. Am I right?

Mr. DRAKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Virginia was declared in that proclamation to be in insurrection, except that part of Virginia lying west of the Alleghenies. That did not describe correctly the present State of West Virginia. On the contrary, a considerable part of West Virginia was embraced within that proclamation as West Virginia stands to-day. What is to become of her under a description like that? She has never been readmitted, and she was proclaimed in insurrection as she stood geographically.

Mr. DRAKE. West Virginia?

Mr. CONKLING. A large portion of West Virginia.

Mr. DRAKE. Never.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator will not say "never" without looking at the proclamation, because if he will look at it he will see that Virginia was declared to be in insurrection except that part lying west of the Alleghenies. Well, a large portion of West Virginia does lie west of the Alleghenies, but some of West Virginia also lies east of the Alleghenies, and that portion of West Virginia was and is embraced in the proclamation. I ask him what sort of a question are we going to get up in that regard if we adopt this language.

Mr. DRAKE. I would say to the honorable Senator from New York that the State of West Virginia was not named in the proclamation at all.

Mr. CONKLING. The State of West Virginia was not then created. It was all Virginia; but anticipating the erection of West Virginia and the division of the State, Mr. Lincoln pointed out what he supposed would be the boundaries. When the State came to be erected it was not confined to those boundaries, but went over and took a portion of the territory which was and is embraced within that proclamation.

Mr. DRAKE. All I have to say is that if the honorable Senator from New York can make anything out of that he is able to discriminate better than I can.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the Senator make out of it? What shall we understand the law to be?

Mr. DRAKE. I beg leave to say that I make nothing whatever out of the point that the Senator from New York has now made, for the reason that we are referring to the State of Virginia, and whether that State has the same limits now that it had then is a matter of no consequence. It comes now with reduced limits, seeking to cast its vote for President and Vice President; and what is it to us if since it was declared in insurrection in 1861 a part has been taken off and a new State formed out of it. This act only applies to the State of Virginia with its present limits; and that State with larger limits was declared in insurrection in 1861.

Mr. HOWARD. I far prefer the original resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, because it is more specific; it tells us and tells the country exactly what communities we intend to embrace in our legislation and what geographical limits we intend to include. It leaves nothing uncertain, as the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri seems to do. For instance, the difficulty pointed out by the Senator from New York, is, in my judgment, rather a serious one. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri refers to the proclamation of the 16th of August, 1861, as containing the States or territorial extension to which that amendment is to apply. Now, it turns out on inspection that a portion of Virginia lies west of the Alleghany mountains. The proclamation did not declare the inhabitants of that portion of Virginia which was west of the Alleghany mountains to be in insurrection at all, but excepted that region entirely out of its operation. There are other exceptions in that proclamation. Portions of Louisiana are excepted; other portions of Virginia, and portions of the several rebel States that should happen to be in the occupancy of our troops in the field. Now, I submit to the Senator from Missouri that we hardly ought to incur any of the difficulties or embarrassments that may grow out of these little debatable points. Why not, therefore, say in so many words that the several States named in this bill that have not complied with the terms which we impose upon them shall be excluded from the right of representation in the Electoral College.

But it is asked with a great deal of earnestness, "Why include Arkansas and Florida in the bill; are they not already readmitted into the Union; they are not only admitted entitled to readmission, but they are actually readmitted in the persons of their Senators and their Representatives in Congress?" That is all very true; but the reason for applying the bill to those States is this: as I said the other day, there are dual governments established even in those two States. There is a Johnson Governor in Florida and one in Arkansas, a Johnson Legislature in Florida and another in Arkansas. That is to say, such Legislatures have been elected in those two States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to my friend from Michigan that I understand that those Legislatures called the Johnson Legislatures and the Johnson Governors have acquiesced in the new organizations and gone in, some of them being members of the new Legislatures.

Mr. HOWARD. If that be the fact I certainly am very happy to learn it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators are here representing those States; and, as I understand, some of the members of the Johnson Legislatures are members of the Legislatures of the new organizations. It does seem to me very absurd to provide a rule now for Florida and Arkansas that is not provided for Ohio and New York.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose there should be a revival and resuscitation of the Johnson governments in these two States; suppose they should reappear on the theater of action and should undertake to set up governments of their own, and as one of the steps toward it should organize a presidential election to be carried on exclusively by white men, and that they should select presidential electors and send on certificates of election to the President of the Senate. That such a state of things may happen is by no means impossible, and I wish to guard against it, and to advertise the whites, as well as the blacks, that no government will be recognized in those States which are already admitted except such as we have recognized by our reconstruction legislation. I think that would have a tendency at least to prevent these difficulties and these squabbles which I foresee may take place even in the reconstructed States that have been admitted into the Union.

There is no trouble in doing this, and we may possibly prevent a great deal of embarrassment; and I may go further and say we may even prevent bloodshed in these States by taking these precautionary measures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Drake, Harlan, McDonald, Pomeroy, and Tipton—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Howard, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saisbury, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, and Yates—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out "Florida" and "Arkansas." I will simply state that either of these propositions I could have voted for with great pleasure; and if I had been present I should have voted for, because I have preferred the language of, the amendment of the Senator from New York, for it was more general. It does seem to me that we ought not to express a doubt on the completeness of our work so far. We have these two States represented here by Senators; they are represented in the other House; and I would just as lief think of guarding against double election in Ohio as I would in these two States. I do not like to acknowledge to the world a doubt of the completeness of the reorganization of these States; they are here; and it does seem to me that the Senator from Vermont ought to yield to striking out these two States. This bill was probably framed when these two States were not represented. Certainly we ought not to provide one rule for Ohio and a different rule for them. I should be perfectly willing, as I said before, to vote for any of these propositions; I do not see any material difference between any of the three propositions submitted to us; but at the present time we ought not to legislate for Arkansas and Florida anticipating a state of things that cannot exist in all human probability; that will be no more likely to exist there than in the State of Oregon. We shall be here two months at the next session before the electoral votes are counted with the same Senators and Representatives we have now. Why need we guard against a contingency so remote and problematical? It seems to me to be legislating as if we were in doubt about the completeness and perfectness of our work, which I consider as concluded and perfected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will assure the Senator from Ohio that the Senator from Vermont will yield, and with pleasure, to the judgment of the Senate. The Senator from Ohio is mistaken in supposing that I inserted these names before these States were readmitted. I inserted them with the others after I had studied the conduct of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives, as it respected the admission of their members there, after I had observed the conduct of the Senators of the Opposition when the Senators from those States were admitted here, and their declarations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not insert Tennessee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will come to that presently if you want to consider it. We are now on these two States. I inserted their names after I had noticed from time to time the constant declarations of the Democratic press, not that there was any doubt about the fact that we had restored these two States, or that there was any doubt about the fact that we intended to stand by that restoration to the last extremity, as we do, not only with votes; but as Senators talk about sweeping away things by the white man's government, I will say also by the same kind of influence that we have exerted over that community and over the Democratic party for the last five years; that is to say, the influence of force upholding the law.

These papers—I have my hands full of them—all the Democratic press, North and South, maintain this proposition as to these two States distinctly, although they have been readmitted; that everything which has been done down to this hour, and the existing state of things is a pure nullity. They propose, some of them, to overturn these existing organizations. That I do not believe they will have the courage to attempt. Others propose to vote peaceably and quietly what they call the white man's ticket, claiming that the laws of 1860 are still in force, which authorize the citizens of those States, the persons entitled to vote, to meet together on the first Tuesday in November and cast their votes for electors.

We believe all that to be a farce, a sham, as it would be if they went through with it; but suppose it should happen that two sets of votes were sent up from these States, one from the regular and legal organization that exists there now and the other from the white men, as they call themselves, acting under the laws of 1860. It would be an easy question to decide, to be sure; but suppose the votes of those two sets, whichever were received, determined the election of General Grant or of Mr. Seymour; what then? The Democrats have given us notice—I could occupy the whole evening in reading extracts I have from them which come right up to that point—through all their press North and South that in that event their votes shall be counted or there shall be tumult and disorder.

Mr. WILSON. That is the way they expect to win.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know it is so. I do not anticipate that they will come to any such scratch as that. These same Democrats, through their leaders in this Senate three years, declared that it was the subject of legislative provision to make laws in advance for just such a case, and that they ought not to be made in any other way. Serious complaint was made against the legislation of 1865 because the legislation was enacted after the votes had been taken in November, operating in the nature of an edict rather than in the nature of a law prescribing a future rule of action.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate in reading, as I can, if any Senator wants it, to show the state of public opinion and the threat that is held out in these papers, the evidence that I hold in my hands; and it has cropped out even after the remarkable speech of the Senator from Illinois the other day, in a leading article of the National Intelligencer, quoting that speech with approbation, and going on further and declaring that this whole thing was a nullity, and was to be disregarded.

Now, Mr. President, when as it is remarked it is merely a matter of formality, at the worst to leave in these names, I say it is not the part of wisdom to run any risk of leaving a question open; not that it is a real question as we understand it, but the Senators on the other side maintain that it is. I say, therefore, it is not wise to leave out these names.

The Senator from Illinois has told us that we are anticipating trouble; he told us so the other day; that we are alarmists, and that we are now in such condition that we can fold up our arms and believe all is peace. I should have more confidence in the opinion of my distinguished friend from Illinois upon these points if I had not reposed myself upon those opinions before during the past winter. We had the same opinion from my honorable friend about Alabama, that we ought not to change the regulation requiring a full majority, because it was all going right as it was, and people would say that we had begun to tinker again with the reconstruction laws, and all that. We reposed, as generally we well may, upon his judgment; but it turned out to be wrong, and it led us into serious difficulty.

There was another case in which the faith of my honorable friend in the safety of everything touching our legislation was put to a severer test respecting certain transactions in the Supreme Court of the United States, which it is only necessary to allude to; they are in the mind of everybody. My honorable friend was mistaken, I think he will confess, again in that sense of repose and security that he trusted in almost too long.

I do not speak of these things as criticising the judgment of my friend from Illinois. He will not understand me so. I only remind him of them in all respect and good will to show that it is wiser to take what may seem to be an unnecessary step as a matter of precaution when you are threatened, than it is to wait until the evil is upon you and then have a tumult. But I do not wish to trespass upon the time of the Senate. They will understand why I think it is that the names of these States should be left in the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the idea of firing a bill or a joint resolution at every newspaper that threatens an overthrow of the acts of Congress, when no Senator representing any State in the Union makes such a threat, it seems to me is rather preposterous.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All the Democratic members of the House did it in a written protest.

Mr. SHERMAN. No member of the Senate has made any such declaration. I have listened to the argument, and no member of the Senate denies that the States represented in this body must conduct the counting of the electoral votes, and that the organization provided under the reconstruction acts must provide the mode and manner of conducting the election. The Senators are here, and this Senate is the very body that is to act on the question. Now, because the National Intelligencer or some other newspaper threatens a great many things to be done, I do not think we ought to be moved from the even tenor of our way. We had in Ohio a great many threats that they were going to march a hundred thousand Democrats into Canada on one occasion and get a candidate for Governor, and bring him over and instal him as Governor of the State of Ohio. The people of Ohio were not troubled much about them. It seems to me idle to legislate in view of such things. I am willing, and I think it is proper, to provide for the contingency of some of these States not having a legal State government when the next election comes off, and when clearly they would not have the right to vote. Therefore, so far as the main feature of this bill is concerned I am willing to vote for it; but to provide for a double election in States that are represented in Congress now in as full and complete a manner as the State of Ohio or the State of New York, it seems to me is preposterous, and is a confession of weakness that I am not willing to make.

But I am perfectly indifferent about it. I do not wish to take time at this late period of the session, but I trust the Senate will, for its own sake, strike out of this bill the names of the States which are represented by Senators on this floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senate has been engaged in what seems to be rather a profitless debate for a day or two upon a joint resolution which was thrust, as I conceive, very inconsiderately upon us; and it has been spoken of as the report of the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee did authorize the Senator from Vermont to bring in this joint resolution. I objected to it in the committee, and those who authorized the report to be made gave notice at the time that they should not be bound by the joint resolution as reported by the Senator from Vermont, but the Senator from Vermont, in his haste and anxiety to bring the thing before the Senate, succeeded in getting permission to bring his resolution here; and we have lost probably a couple of days in the discussion of it because it was brought here without having been considered and agreed upon by any considerable number of the members of the Senate before it came here; and you see after it gets here that the members of the committee that authorized it to be reported are not satisfied with it. I am sorry that it was brought in in that way.

Sir, the Senator from Vermont has thought proper to speak of my having been mistaken in views that I have entertained. Why, Mr. President, I never set myself up to be infallible. I have been mistaken often. The Senator from Vermont is wiser, and very seldom makes mistakes, though I think that his resolution has occupied the Senate here unnecessarily for a day or two, and I very much fear that it may lead us into trouble hereafter. All that I would do, if I could have my way about it, would be simply to wait until we see the Carolinas and Georgia and Alabama and Louisiana, as well as Arkansas and Florida, ratify the constitutional amendment, and send their representatives here; and if they do so, then reconstruction as to all of those States will be complete; and I would no more have passed such a resolution about them than I would in reference to my own State, as to whether they should vote or not; and when you falter in your work in the face of some newspaper article in which somebody says that your reconstruction measures are good for nothing, you encourage opposition. We shall never have an end of this matter if we are going on to provide against two elections. The idea, to my mind, is preposterous of a double election in Arkansas. There is no organized government in Arkansas except that represented here. There is no other Legislature in Arkansas except that represented here; there is no other government there; there is nobody in authority there or pretending to be in authority or exercising authority in that State except the organization represented in the Congress of the United States. Now, sir, here is a resolution reciting what? Reciting that no electoral votes shall be received or counted from the State of Arkansas "unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors," the people of Arkansas, "pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized." We have said that they have done that already.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose you read the rest.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have already said that they have done what is here required, and now you repeat it over again. It is a thing accomplished and ended. I will read the rest:

"And shall be in operation, and unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government, and such State shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf."

Are they not entitled? Why do you say "unless they are entitled." You have voted that they are entitled? Congress has done it. They are represented; and you want it to be reiterated and represented over.

Sir, it is the very way to get up a dual election. It is the very thing that has caused debate. It is fraught with mischief. It will cause debate when you come to count the votes next February for two days, very likely, again, and confusion and disorder, and I know not but civil war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can that happen if there is only one set of votes cast?

Mr. TRUMBULL. By a resolution that invites them to cast two sets of votes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But you say there will be only one set cast.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There would be but one; but when you pass a resolution in regard to two, that you will only count the one, it shows that you anticipate and put it into the minds of those people to have two elections. You are reciting over in this resolution "unless" certain things are done, which you have said are done.

The Senator from Vermont has repeated over and over again that we enumerated the States four years ago. We did enumerate them; but how? We said that whereas the States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, &c., were in rebellion, no electoral votes should be counted from them; and so I am prepared to say to-day that no electoral vote shall be counted from the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, because they have not organized State governments recognized by Congress, and it is impossible now that they should. You need not put in a provision here that they are to have electoral votes when they are entitled to representation. It is impossible under our legislation that they should be entitled to representation in this body on the first Tuesday of November next, because under the legislation of Congress they can only have representation when they present constitutions here which Congress approves. They have not presented such constitutions to be approved. Texas has not framed hers. Mississippi has not ratified hers. Virginia has not ratified hers. No election has been held in Virginia or Texas, and so far as we have heard from Mississippi the people at the polls have not ratified the constitution adopted by the convention. The reconstruction acts require that before a State can be admitted to representation its constitution shall be ratified by the people at the polls. More than that, they require that the constitution shall be approved by Congress after it has been thus ratified at the polls. It is impossible that the constitutions of these States should be ratified at the polls and approved by Congress in time to have representation in this body. I would have no discretion about it. Pass a resolution as we did four years ago, that no electoral votes are to be counted from those States, and let the people of all parties understand it, and the people of all parties do understand that in regard to States which are admitted to representation in this body, there can be no question as to their right to vote for President and Vice President.

I shall not vote myself for the resolution as it is introduced by the Senator from Vermont which comes here, not having the sanction, in the form in which it is, of the Judiciary Committee, but having the sanction of that committee for the Senator to bring it into this body. I hope that the motion to strike out Arkansas and Florida will prevail. I should prefer myself waiting to see what these other States do, and before our adjournment passing a concurrent resolution that from those States that are not reorganized and represented in Congress no votes shall be counted.

Mr. WILSON. Four of them will be here within a week.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Four of them will be here, as the Senator from Massachusetts reminds me, within a week.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose they do not come?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Suppose they do not come. Let us pass a concurrent resolution, as suggested by President Lincoln, and let the country know, and let the people of those States know, that no votes will be counted from those States. That is all we have to do. I think it important that we should do that much.

I should not have said this much, having made some remarks the other day, had not the Senator from Vermont thought proper to refer to what I had said, and to remind me (which I well knew before) that I had often made mistakes in my expectations as to future events. I never claimed to be a prophet, and least of all did I ever profess that I was infallible. I exercise my best judgment in regard to measures as they arise, and that judgment tells me that it is improper to pass a resolution making a discrimination against the States that we have just admitted to representation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President—

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to know what committee reported this joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I am trying to find out now.

Mr. POMEROY. Every member of the Judiciary Committee seems to be opposed to it, and I should like to know how it got here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only members of the Judiciary Committee who have thus far opposed it are the Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONKLING. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I hope he will not make that statement. My honorable friend from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] voted with us on the amendment I offered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be. That does not prove my statement incorrect.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the Senator should not say that the only Senators who did not vote for his proposition are the Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say Senators who did not vote for it; I said the only Senators who had opposed it. The only merit probably that the joint resolution now has is contained in two lines that were inserted in committee on the motion of the Senator from New York, which any Senator will find in italics. I confess that that is the only merit that the joint resolution has, but inasmuch as it has that merit, I still have some hope that the Senate will look upon it with favor.

The Senator from Illinois has talked as if this joint resolution was reported by the gracious permission of the Judiciary Committee, as a matter of personal favor, to one of its junior members. I do not know but that it was. It was a great favor if it was. I do not urge this resolution upon the Senate. I have not urged it upon them unduly, I think. My constituents live so far from the scene of war, and from their experience in the rebellion they have so much dislike to any further difficulty, that probably we can stand any grief that may come as long as anybody.

I quite agree with the Senator from Illinois that we have spent the last two days in profitless debate about this joint resolution, and the reason, which my friend did not give and that I will, is the fact that he addressed the Senate more than two days ago and has not done it since until now. I admit that all that the rest of us have said has not had the pungency, at least it has not satisfied the Opposition so well as the remarks of my friend from Illinois, which received the next day a first-rate notice from the organ of the Democratic party. My friend is not to blame for that.

Now, my friend says that all this is moonshine about these States; that we are not bound to suppose any such thing. I do not want to repeat what I said before. I will not refer any more to the newspapers and to public opinion; but we have had the official action of the Democratic party in the House of Representatives on this very point put as a protest upon the records. Is not that worth taking any precaution against? Does it invite double voting or tumultuous elections to provide by law against them?

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether a dual vote in these States which shall have been admitted like Arkansas and Florida will be any more unlawful after you have passed this joint resolution than before?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it will not.

Mr. FERRY. Then what is the use of the joint resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I should be glad to have my friend from Connecticut give enough attention to, to understand.

Mr. FERRY. That is what I want to do. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The distinguished gentlemen who composed this body in 1865, on all sides, led by the Senator from Illinois, whose remarks I read this morning, declared that it was wise and proper and necessary to provide by a rule of law what votes, and under what circumstances, should be counted in the House of Representatives, because the Constitution does not provide for judicial powers in that body; and it will be remembered that when the Wisconsin case arose earlier there was a great difference of opinion when they got in convention as to what they could do, and they finally decided that they could not do anything inasmuch as it did not make any difference, and thus got themselves out of that scrape. The Senator from Illinois, rightly and wisely—and I hope he will not consider me as having overstepped the proprieties in alluding to these things—maintained, in so many words, that in these cases of irregular voting and improper voting, although the House of Representatives and the Senate meeting together and acting upon the returns were the persons who in the end must judge, yet they must judge according to a rule of law that the legislative power of the country should have prescribed in advance. That was his proposition. I think I do not misstate it. It was a perfectly sound proposition, a proposition that lies at the basis of all law, which is, in its definition, the prescription of a rule, in advance of the event, to guide the executors of the law in acting when that event arises; and I should as much expect, in reply to my honorable friend, to hear him argue that we ought to pass no law against piracy, no law against counterfeiting, because it would put it into people's heads to commit piracy and go to counterfeiting, and rather stimulate them to do it, as to hear him say, after this rebellion and turbulence, and in the face of these organized and authentic threats, that they will have a tumult, that we should not declare in advance by law which are the States that we intend to count the votes of, and that no others shall be counted. It does not invite any such query. It does not raise any such doubt. It is the usual exercise of a prudent foresight in providing a prohibition by law, in advance, of an illegal act that is threatened; and that is all there is of it.

But, as I have said, Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I shall be perfectly satisfied if the wisdom of the Senate chooses to strike out these States and put in any others, or to leave them all out.

Mr. DAVIS. I feel some sympathy with my honorable friend from Vermont this evening. Some of his friends seem disposed to twit him, among other things, with showing a propensity to talk too much. I agree with the honorable Senator that it does not become any of the pots on the other side to call his kettle black. [Laughter.] But the discussion this evening has certainly resulted in establishing this proposition: that the honorable Senator is not only the original, but the sole patentee of this measure in its original form. I will do this much justice to his merits: we have had an attempt to take out two additional patents, but I do not think either of them has enough of novel and important discovery in it to entitle it to any patent; and I believe my honorable friend from Vermont is entitled to the whole and sole credit of the affair, not only the original, but the sole inventor and patentee.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Vermont on one point. He says this is a specific remedy, not for all cases, but for certain descriptions of cases, and that the remedy in its language ought to speak for the cases to which it is intended to present a cure. I agree with him in that. If this proposition is not to apply to three fourths of all the States in the Union, why leave it in such vague and general language that a casual observer would be disposed to apply it to all the States, when the real gist and object of the thing is to apply it only to one fourth of the States. I think the honorable Senator is quite right in his desire and his solicitude in relation to the verbiage of the resolution, that it ought to state the specific and precise objects and subjects for which it was intended to be a remedy.

I have been amused to-night with one reflection that has passed in my mind, not merely in relation to the honorable Senator from Vermont, who finds himself beset by his friends all around him and in distress. I certainly feel a good deal of sympathy and interest for him and with him. I believe that in part he is right, and I trust, as he has such odds against him, that he will find himself a full match for the whole of them. But I have been surprised at one feature in the affair. We used to hear a good deal about State-rights politicians and State-rights men. I once thought that they applied to old Virginia and South Carolina and some sections of the South between those States; but it seems that the doctrine of State rights is becoming general in the Senate of the United States with the Radical portion of the members. I do not mean State rights exactly in the sense in which it used to be used in the Old Dominion and in South Carolina. There they held to State rights for the purpose of maintaining and sustaining their sovereign State edifices, as they attached an idea of sovereignty to them, their State governments, their State sovereignty; but the modern application of the idea seems to be of a contrary tendency. It is not to preserve, to protect, to defend, but it is to pull down and build up at pleasure. Here is the majority of the Senate pulling down State rights and State governments and building them at will. It seems to me eminently ludicrous when the Senate of the United States shall be engaged from year to year and session to session, and week to week, and frequently from day to day, in the work of pulling down States and then building them up. That is a sort of State rights, as I said, not such as used to be heard of in old Virginia, but in the sense in which we speak of millwrights, wheelwrights, playwrights, [laughter;] men who like to dabble with the machinery, and who amuse themselves from day to day in being with the machinery; a sort of tinkering. To be sure, it is not a very apt subject to apply the term "tinkering" to, but there are various tinkering beside those with metals, I believe; but my honorable friend [Mr. STEWART] who represents the metal country, I do not know whether most in the brass or the gold, can give me full information on that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEWART. The brass mines are further east. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. But it is in this sense, Mr. President that I am perfectly charmed with the idea in which the Senate have become State-wrights, mill-wrights, wheel-wrights, playwrights, patent-wrights, patentees, and all that sort of thing. [Laughter.] I think, however, they might just as well quit fun and get back to the old principles and the old vocations of statesmanship, and let these amusing ephemeral novelties of the day pass into oblivion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. WELCH. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out the words "Florida" and "Arkansas," in the fourth line of the joint resolution.

Mr. WELCH. I should be glad of the privilege of saying a single word in respect to that amendment. I ought to know something of the state of things in Florida. I do not know whether the exception of these two States is on account of the condition of things there or not. If it is I am ready to bear testimony that the reconstructed government of Florida is to-day more firmly settled and more generally accepted, I believe, than that of any other reconstructed State in the South. There is not a trace of a Johnsonian Legislature there, and I never have heard one mentioned; nor is there a Johnsonian Governor there. There is one Governor and one Legislature.

Mr. HOWARD. I will ask my friend from Florida whether there was not a convention, and afterward a Legislature, elected in Florida under the proclamation of Mr. Johnson in 1865?

Mr. WELCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the term of office of the members of the Legislature expired?

Mr. WELCH. Nobody claims that that Legislature is now in existence. The term has expired. The government, with all the archives, has been handed over to the present Governor.

Mr. HOWARD. Can the honorable Senator inform us who was the Johnsonian Governor, or the last one, if there was more than one?

Mr. WELCH. David S. Walker.

Mr. HOWARD. And has he delivered up the archives of the State to the new Governor under the reconstruction?

Mr. WELCH. He has.

Mr. HOWARD. I merely inquired for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on Mr. SHERMAN'S amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays, or a division. I am perfectly willing to take a division.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to offer a substitute, which I should like to have read now, if there is no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us vote on this amendment first.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear the substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The vote on this amendment might depend on the reading of that.

Mr. POMEROY. If any States are to be stricken out, all ought to be stricken out, excepting Texas, Mississippi, and Virginia. While I agree to what the Senator from Florida has said, that there is a regularly organized government in Florida, and it is acquiesced in, I must say that that is true also of North Carolina, Alabama, and other States. I do not like to make any distinction, simply because we have sworn in Senators and members from Arkansas and Florida.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose the other States vote down the constitutional amendment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They have not yet adopted the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. That is only a question of time. They are just as certain to adopt it as they are to meet together. I am speaking of the Carolinas and Alabama. Now, the States that we put into the law of this session, in which we said they were entitled to representation, include all the original seceding States excepting the three I have mentioned. If we are to legislate with reference to specific States I think we ought to confine our legislation to that class, or else leave the names of all of them out and make a general law that shall be applicable to all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Clerk to read the proposed substitute that I sent to the desk for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out all of the joint resolution after the enacting clause and to insert:

That all the States that have been in rebellion against the United States, who have not, upon the adjournment of the present session of Congress, become entitled to representation in Congress, shall not be entitled to vote for electors for President and Vice President at the next presidential election, nor shall the electoral votes of such States be received or counted.

Mr. POMEROY. The difficulty about that is, that it depends upon the contingency of an adjournment. We do not know but that there may be some reasons why we may have a hasty adjournment or may delay the adjournment. I do not want the question of the right of States to vote in the presidential election to depend upon the contingency of an adjournment of Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. If the date of the next presidential election, the 3d of November, were substituted for that it would be better.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is another thing about that: it speaks of the "States that have been in rebellion." That is exactly what the Democratic party on the other side say has never happened; that the States never have been in rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ferry, Harlan, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Welch, Willey, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Howard, McCreery, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomroy, Stewart, Vickers, Wade, and Williams—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, and Yates—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon offer an amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will modify the amendment that I suggested by inserting the words, "the States whose inhabitants have been in rebellion."

Mr. CONKLING. "Inhabitants or authorities."

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Inhabitants" will do; and to substitute "the 3d day of November" for "the adjournment of Congress."

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to hear it read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of the joint resolution after the resolving clause, and insert the following:

That all the States whose inhabitants have been in rebellion against the United States, who shall not on the 3d day of November, 1865, become entitled to representation in Congress, shall not be entitled to vote for electors for President and Vice President at the next presidential election, nor shall the electoral votes of such States be received or counted.

Mr. McCREERY. There are two negatives in that.

Mr. HOWARD. I venture to suggest to the Senator from Oregon to use the word "only" instead of "all," and to strike out "not."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I guess I had better withdraw it.

Mr. POMEROY. "Entitled to representation by law" would do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That amendment embodies my idea. I had not time to prepare the phraseology quite satisfactorily to myself; but as I see that there is so much diversity of opinion about it, I believe I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to move an amendment. I propose to amend the joint resolution by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting:

The States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, respectively, shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from any of such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, &c.

And then following the language of the original resolution. The States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas will not be in a condition to vote at the presidential election. I propose to say that they shall not vote. They will not be entitled to be represented in Congress this year. As to the other States, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, and Georgia, four of them will probably be here within a very few days, three of them perhaps next week, and the other in a few days after. There is doubt about the State of Georgia complying with the conditions we have imposed. The House of Representatives of Georgia is said to have a majority who are opposed to the policy of reconstruction. I saw in a letter or telegram received from there yesterday that Howell Cobb and Robert Toombs were at Atlanta struggling to defeat the constitutional amendment; it was the great object to do it; and I saw by the paper to-night that they were there last night indorsing this new revolutionary ticket put before the country, and which is in perfect harmony with Toombs's doctrine to "let discord reign forever," which he avowed here some years ago. I think North Carolina and South Carolina will choose their Senators on Tuesday next, probably, and adopt the constitutional amendment. Louisiana has already chosen hers. In Alabama the Legislature is all on one side; it will be unanimous on all these questions. Georgia is doubtful. The State of Arkansas and the State of Florida have complied with the conditions and are here, and I do not think it is necessary to say anything about them. I think we might just as well say something about Massachusetts. I have just as much confidence in their standing as I have in that of my own State. I believe North Carolina and South Carolina and Louisiana will do the same. There is doubt about what Georgia will do in the matter.

Now, why not say that Virginia, and Mississippi, which has voted down the new constitution by a majority probably of three or four thousand, and Texas, which is not yet prepared, shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College, say it squarely, and stop there, and that these other States which have not complied shall not vote, unless they do comply. Four of them unquestionably will do so in a day or two, and perhaps the others, and that will leave the matter, it seems to me, all safe.

Mr. FERRY. I do not like the proposition to say peremptorily that Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi shall not participate in the election, especially as in Virginia the submission of the constitution to the people for ratification may take place, the constitution be ratified, and the State comply with all the requisitions of the reconstruction laws before November. Our peremptory declaration to her now that she shall not participate in the presidential election, I think, would be used to our disadvantage.

Sir, I had prepared an amendment which I intended to submit, but the Senator from Oregon in the first portion of his amendment used somewhat similar phraseology. As his amendment has been withdrawn, and mine does not cover as much ground, I will read mine in order to suggest a mode which it seems to me will relieve us from the difficulty under which we are laboring. From the tone of the discussion, it seems to me that the main objection to the joint resolution, as reported by the committee, has now dwindled down to an objection to the enumeration of the States in the third, fourth, and fifth lines of the joint resolution; and it is desirable to find some mode of expression which shall convey the idea expressed in those three lines by that enumeration, without making the enumeration. I therefore propose to insert in lieu of that enumeration this language:

That such States as, by reason of the participation of their inhabitants in the late rebellion, shall not be represented in either branch of the Fortieth Congress on or before the 3d day of November, 1863, shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College, &c.

Adopting the entire joint resolution as it remains, simply describing by the phraseology of my amendment instead of enumerating the States as they are enumerated in the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Read the resolution as you have it.

Mr. CONNESS. Send it to the Clerk and let the amendment be read in connection with the joint resolution.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the joint resolution so that it shall read:

That such States as by reason of the participation of their inhabitants in the late rebellion shall not be represented in either branch of the Fortieth Congress on or before the 3d day of November, 1863, shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from any of such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation, and unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government, and such State shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that it may be read again, and I beg to ask the Senator who drew it to attend to the first and last part of it in connection with each other.

The Chief Clerk again read the joint resolution as it would stand, if amended.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire of the Senator if that is not a contradiction in terms?

Mr. FERRY. I do not see it.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me indicate how it strikes me. I may be wrong; I only know from listening. The provision is that those States which at the expiration of this session—that is it practically—

Mr. FERRY. Practically.

Mr. CONKLING. Are not represented in Congress shall not be represented in the Electoral College unless, in those same States which are not represented, the votes shall be cast pursuant to a government set up and they shall have become entitled to representation. How can both those predicaments exist, where in point of fact they have not become entitled to representation before this session ends?

Mr. FERRY. There the Senator makes his mistake. The first clause provides that States not actually represented before our adjournment shall not participate in the election unless, to come to the very point, in the mean time they shall become entitled to representation by carrying out the reconstruction laws. There is no inconsistency.

Mr. CONKLING. But what is to be the criterion? Who is to determine whether they have become entitled?

Mr. FERRY. The law itself, when they have.

Mr. CONKLING. In other words, if my friend will pardon me, is it not true that this is the sole place of arbitration? Is not Congress the arbiter of all that question, and can it be politically or legislatively determined until we have the evidence that they have ratified the fourteenth amendment, and done the various things which are required? And would it not be, in reality, leaving it all at sea to make such a distinction as he now makes between their actually having received recognition and readmission of representation, and having become in theory entitled to it, when there is no tribunal except this to pass upon the question?

Mr. FERRY. Under the joint resolution, if it should pass with this amendment, the practical operation will be this: any State which has been represented in this session of the Fortieth Congress, in either branch, will vote, and from the fact that its admission to representation in either branch is a sanction by Congress, the proper authority to its right to membership in the Union, and thus to its right to participate in the presidential election. In addition to that, should any State, after the adjournment of Congress, and before the presidential election perform all on its part incumbent to be performed under our reconstruction laws, so as to be entitled to representation, in the language of the joint resolution as originally reported from the committee, it also would be entitled to participate in the presidential election, and the votes would be returned to this Congress at its next session. If it should have entitled itself to representation, so as to make its votes in the Electoral College legitimate, that fact would also appear at the next session, and their Senators and Representatives would be here and would be admitted, I suppose.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if my friend will allow me, at that point, to make a suggestion, would it not be much better to say that all States which are not admitted to representation at the next session of Congress, or by the time the vote is to be counted, shall be excluded? If that is what he means, I suggest that would be a simpler way to get at it.

Mr. FERRY. You cannot pass a law that all States that shall not be admitted in December shall be excluded from voting in November.

Mr. CONKLING. No, no; but all States which have not been admitted by the second Wednesday in February, when the votes are to be counted; all States which have not been admitted to representation when the count of electoral votes takes place, shall not be entitled to have their votes counted. That would be the effect of this.

Mr. FERRY. The object now is to prevent an election being held in those States. If the object of the joint resolution is to prevent the counting of the votes after the States have held elections, the phraseology could be changed in that way.

Mr. CONKLING. How can any of these States foresee whether they are to be admitted or not? Of course, they will go on and vote at a venture in November. How can any State in November know that she may not be admitted by February afterward?

Mr. FERRY. Under the joint resolution as it now stands with this amendment in it, each State would know whether it had conformed to the reconstruction acts, and was thereby entitled to representation. It seems to me the argument of the Senator goes against the whole joint resolution, the whole principle.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. This matter seems to have got a good deal muddled by the numerous amendments which have been offered here this evening. I suggest that it might be well to refer it back to the committee for revision; or perhaps a better suggestion than that might be made: the Committee on the District of Columbia reported a bill here a few days since, which was finally referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; now, I apprehend that while they are fixing up that bill, the District Committee could fix up this joint resolution, and I suggest that we reciprocate the kindness that was paid to our committee the other day. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say one word, and that is to remind the Senator from New Hampshire that there have not been any amendments adopted to the resolution yet. I have no objection to any amendments if they can be so considered that we understand we are accomplishing the purpose. Everybody agrees that the joint resolution, which it seems that the Judiciary Committee did not report, but I did, will accomplish the object, as to these specific States, we have in view; but gentlemen are dissatisfied with the mode in which that object is stated in the resolution. Now I suggest, let us take a vote on these amendments, and if we do not adopt any and are not in favor of the joint resolution, to reject it and then try again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw it.

Mr. FERRY. Then I offer mine.

Mr. THAYER. I rose to inquire if amendments are still in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is one pending. There are generally two. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. An amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. THAYER. There seemed to be a general offering of amendments, and I thought I would offer mine. If I were called upon to solve this difficulty, it seems to me we might agree upon a form to obviate all disagreement. I would take the original resolution as reported by the Senator from Vermont and modify it so as to read:

That none of the States lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College, &c.

It seems to me that covers the whole ground. I propose to take the original resolution, striking out the names of the States and inserting a few other words, so as to make it read:

That none of the States lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President—

Mr. DAVIS. Will you not stop there? [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. No, sir; I prefer to go through. I waive the reading of the residue of the resolution. If it is in order, I move that amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. That would shut out Maryland.

Mr. THAYER. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Look and see.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say but one word on the proposition of my friend from Nebraska. This is not my dish, and I do not help to cook it; but at the same time I would ask leave to make a single suggestion which gentlemen can accept or reject. I think I can tell pretty certainly what their purposes are, and it seems to me that, without any more trouble or waste of words, they might just provide a short bill in this form:

Be it enacted, &c., That the electors of Alabama, Arkansas, &c., shall not be counted in the next presidential election except so far as those electors are pledged to vote for the Radical candidate for the Presidency.

I think a few simple words like those would achieve the whole object. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. I do not know how this is. I should like to have a night to think of it. There are some forty odd thousand words, I am told, in the English language, and I am a little inclined to think that by studying over night I could frame a proposition which has not been yet offered by way of amendment, [laughter,] and I move that the Senate adjourn. ["No!" "No!"]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the vote is taken on the pending amendment I wish to try a vote on recommitting the resolution, and let the Senate decide whether they will take that course or not. I move to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 18.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY.]

The amendment was rejected—ayes nine, noes not counted.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Vermont is not particular in regard to the naming of these States, there is a form which I think will suit almost every one by just leaving out the names of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not particular about anything, except I am particular in believing in my own opinion; but I am ready to give up to a majority at any moment if you can find a majority.

Mr. POMEROY. I am in favor of the resolution. The form of amendment which I have prepared is simply to make the resolution read thus:

That all the States whose inhabitants have been declared to have been lately in rebellion or insurrection against the United States shall not be entitled, &c.

Mr. CONKLING. That we voted upon before. That leaves West Virginia out in the cold, for example.

Mr. POMEROY. No; West Virginia has a State government organized.

Mr. CONKLING. The difficulty about West Virginia is this: a part of West Virginia was embraced in the proclamation of 1861. Virginia was embraced except that part west of the Alleghanies. That exception included the bulk of West Virginia, but not all of it. Therefore, there is a part of West Virginia which would be included in that proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. It does not apply to West Virginia or Tennessee.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The proclamation of 1861 embraced a number of counties which are now a part of West Virginia.

Mr. POMEROY. I withdraw the amendment. Let us have a vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the resolution should be reported to the Senate, and the Senator from New York [Mr. COXKING] would offer his proposition again, perhaps the Senate would adopt it. That certainly covers the whole case, and I do not think there is any serious objection made to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further amendments to be offered, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CONKLING. If it is in order, at the suggestion of several Senators, two or three of whom voted against the proposition before, I beg leave now to renew the amendment that I moved in committee in the nature of a substitute. The Secretary has it.

Mr. POMEROY. We have not concurred in the amendment made in committee yet.

Mr. CONKLING. There was no amendment made.

Mr. POMEROY. An amendment was made which will be found in italics on the second page.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon; I had forgotten that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to insert in line fourteen, after the word "operation," the words:

And unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I renew my proposition in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause of the joint resolution, and insert:

That no State shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from any State, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors there shall be in such State a government recognized by Congress as regular and permanent, and not provisional only, nor unless the election for electors shall have taken place under the authority of a State government so recognized.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am opposed to this amendment. If some others have changed their minds I have not seen any good reason to change mine. I think it is a bad time for the Congress of the United States to assert in this form this jurisdiction over all the States of the Union. It may be that this proposition can be supported by an argument, but the doubt in my mind is as to whether that argument will be satisfactory to the people so as fully to vindicate our cause if we adopt this amendment.

If there is any objection that has been urged with force against the present Congress, it is the assumption of power over the States of the Union; the disregard of the rights of the States. I do not of course fully sympathize with that objection; but at the same time this proposition assumes that whenever a party majority in Congress chooses not to recognize a State government, at that moment that State ceases to have any right of representation in the Electoral College. It will be said, as it seems to me, by those who are opposed to the policy of the present Congress, that the majority here have assumed the power to say that any State in the Union shall not be entitled to have representation in the Electoral College. Is that a power which can safely at this time be exercised by this Congress? I ask if we have not burdens enough to carry at this time, derived from the legislation that has taken place in reference to the reconstruction of the rebel States? Is it necessary now that we should adopt this abstraction relating to all the States of the Union, by which we put ourselves in the position before the country of saying that at any time, whenever it suits the views or interests of a party majority in Congress, any State of this Union may be deprived of its right to vote for President or Vice President of the United States? I say we expose ourselves to this criticism at the hands of our political opponents, and it is a criticism that it will be difficult to answer. It will afford another ground for assailing the policy of Congress. It will be argued from one end of this country to the other that the Congress of the United States, not content with assuming absolute power over the States which have been in rebellion, because they have been in rebellion, are now undertaking to assume a similar power over all the States of the country.

I do not undertake to say that that is a sound argument. I pronounce no opinion upon it; but I say that we expose ourselves to that charge, and it puts upon us the necessity of explaining and defending this proposition everywhere before the people. But if a law is passed here that relates exclusively to the rebel States, the people understand it and know what it means, because we have heretofore assumed and maintained the ground that these States on account of their rebellion have entitled Congress to exercise jurisdiction over them and regulate the reorganization of the State governments.

I think, therefore, that this amendment ought not to be adopted. There is no necessity now for providing that Congress may at any time declare that the State of New York shall not be entitled to representation in the Electoral College or the State of Pennsylvania or any other State. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Let us confine our legislation at this time, under existing circumstances, to these rebel States, and not undertake to add to the burdens that we have to carry this other which is contained in this amendment. I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. I am very anxious to come to a vote upon the main proposition offered by the Senator from Vermont. I will, therefore, allow myself but a single moment of time to speak upon the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from New York.

I see no necessity whatever for so general a statute on this subject. There is no necessity for it, and as I said before, it seems to me to be a gratuitous reflection upon the loyal States who have carried the Government successfully through this war; and I protest, in the name of ninety thousand brave men whom my State sent to the war and who did their duty gallantly, and their parts in the great drama fully, against this insult to their State, conveyed by the very language of the amendment of the Senator from New York, implying that there is a danger that any of those loyal States will hereafter embark in a rebellion against the United States. Does the honorable Senator fancy that his State will be guilty of this crime? He does not. Does he fancy that my State will be thus guilty; or that any one of the loyal States is likely in the future to commit this high offense? If there is no such danger, why reflect upon them this wanton insult? Why accuse them, in the language of this amendment, of being ready to embark into rebellion? Sir, if this amendment shall prevail, I am obliged to say here in my place that I shall vote against the whole resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Cragin, Ferry, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Davis, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howard, McGreevy, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Welch, and Williams—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, and Yates—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DRAKE. I move to amend the joint resolution by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting the amendment that I offered in committee, and I ask for the reading of it. My impression is, that if the Senate will listen to the reading of it they will see that it puts the language on a better basis than any other proposition that has been offered.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the resolution after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof:

That no State whose inhabitants were by the proclamation of the President of the United States of August 16, 1861, declared to be in a state of insurrection shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President and Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral vote be received or counted from any such State, unless, at the time prescribed by law for the choice of such electors, the State shall have become entitled to representation in Congress under the reconstruction acts thereof, nor unless the electors shall have been chosen under and by authority of a State government theretofore recognized by Congress as lawful and permanent, and not provisional.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Howe, McDonald, Osborn, and Pomeroy—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Edmunds, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "that" in line three, down to and including the word "not" in line five, and in lieu of those words to insert "none of the States lately in rebellion, and not now represented in Congress shall;" so as to read:

That none of the States lately in rebellion and not now represented in Congress shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope this amendment will be adopted. Many Senators have a serious objection to naming States which are now represented here. This amendment embraces all that were lately in rebellion, and are not now represented. What objection can there be to it? There has been none stated. And as for legislating to provide for a double election in States which are represented in Congress, it seems to me, to say nothing stronger, to be an absurd proposition. It seems to me to be looking for dangers that do not exist, to be making windmills and then beating them down. I am perfectly willing to vote for anything that is agreed upon; but certainly there can be no objection to this amendment, because it includes in the provision all the States lately in rebellion which are not now represented in Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must be pardoned for saying one word in reply to the Senator from Ohio. I do not wish to be thought captious about this business, and I am sure I do not feel so; but now this proposition of the Senator from Nebraska is open to three distinct and special objections that have been made to other propositions which were substantially like this and which were voted down, one including West Virginia, another that I do not remember on account of the haste in which it was read. But I will say no more; I do not wish to take time.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THAYER. It will be seen that this amendment can have no reference whatever to West Virginia. It provides for all the States lately in rebellion except these now represented in Congress, and those who come in hereafter will not be excluded from the Electoral College. I do not see how any one can object to it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Welch, Willey, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Davis, Edmunds, Howard, McCreery, Nye, Stewart, Vickers, Wade, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, and Yates—20.

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear the resolution reported as it is amended.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. Let me suggest to the mover of the last amendment that he may be able to make an improvement in the language. It reads now, "none of the States not now represented."

Mr. DRAKE. "None of the States now unrepresented," probably would be better.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska to insert after the word "States" the words "whose people were lately in rebellion," because otherwise it leaves open the same old doubt we have been disputing about three years.

Mr. THAYER. The meaning is made perfectly plain by the first part of the amendment, "and not now represented in Congress."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only suggest it to the Senator. He may take it at his own risk.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to strike out the last clause of the bill.

The words proposed to be stricken out were read, as follows:

And such State shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will state in a word what I understand that to be. It requires not only that the State shall be reorganized under the reconstruction laws, but that representatives shall be actually received by the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a mistake. The language is "entitled" not "admitted" "to representation."

Mr. BUCKALEW. The question of the right under our recent legislation must be determined by the two Houses in order to come within the meaning of that clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it has been determined by law.

Mr. BUCKALEW. These recent acts which have been passed proved that the State shall accept the amendment of the Constitution; they shall agree to certain fundamental conditions, and then they shall be entitled to be received in Congress; and until an actual vote is taken receiving them their votes will be excluded under that clause. The prior part of the bill provides for a full compliance by the State with the requirements of the reconstruction laws, but this additional clause will require in my judgment, if I understand it at all, that Senators and Representatives shall be actually admitted into Congress before the State is allowed to vote.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THAYER. I will suggest this modification:

That none of the States whose inhabitants have lately been in rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read, so that we can understand just how it stands.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as amended.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. There is an amendment necessary in the first clause to make it congruous. It should read "whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion, and which States are not now represented," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, there being no objection.

Mr. DRAKE. There is another verbal change which ought to be made to put the resolution in grammatical structure. It reads now, "that none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion, and which States are not now represented in Congress shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States; and no electoral votes shall be received or counted from any of such States," &c. I suggest that this latter clause should read, "nor shall any electoral votes be received or counted from any of such States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, there being no objection. The joint resolution was read the third time, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion, and which States are not now represented in Congress, shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral votes be received or counted from any of such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation, and unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government, and such State shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BUCKALEW and Mr. VICKERS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Willey, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Henderson, McCreery, and Vickers—5.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Williams, and Yates—23.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 1354 to provide for the distribution of arms for the use of the militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 10, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was partially read, when, on motion of Mr. ELA, the further reading was dispensed with.

PRINTING, BINDING, ETC.

Mr. ELA, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire whether the Commissioner of Patents has procured any printing, binding, or blank books except at the Government Printing Office; and if so from whom, what amount, and by what authority of law; with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. ELA moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the motion pending at the close of the session yesterday afternoon, being the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House non-concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river. The Clerk will report the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate was reported, as follows:

Add the following as a new section:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Minnesota, the further quantity of one hundred thousand acres of public lands, subject to the same restrictions as to selection and sale as are hereinbefore named, the proceeds whereof shall be used in making such improvements in the Mississippi river at the Falls of St. Anthony as may be deemed necessary by the Legislature of that State to protect and secure the existing navigation immediately above said falls.

Mr. DONNELLY. If the House refuses to lay on the table the motion to reconsider in what condition will that leave the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER. In that event the next question will be on reconsidering the non-concurrence of the House in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is it in order to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not. The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider has priority.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 30, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCOFIELD and DONNELLY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes 47; no quorum voting.

Mr. PIKE. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is it in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. The non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate removes the bill from before the House.

Mr. DONNELLY. I move that a committee of conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That brings the question again before the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is this the usual stage to ask a committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. It is. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is now in order, if he desires to make it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If the gentleman from Minnesota will let the bill go as it is, I will not make the motion.

Mr. DONNELLY. I insist on the motion for a committee of conference.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I move to lay the amendment of the Senate upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That will carry the bill with it.

The question was put on Mr. SCOFIELD's motion; and there were—ayes 23, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the Senate may be invited to a conference on this bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I will not insist on my motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. DONNELLY's motion; and it was agreed to.

CLERK OF PENSION COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The next unfinished business is the resolution pending at the adjournment of last night's session reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and on which the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the clerk of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a sum of money which shall make his compensation equal to that of the clerk of the Committee of Claims, to commence July 1, 1868, and to terminate on the 4th day of March, 1869.

Mr. COVODE. Is it in order to move to amend the resolution so as to make it apply to other clerks, who do double the work this clerk does?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make that motion.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 30, noes 49; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 54, nays 62, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Baker, Beatty, Blair, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Cuke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullon, Driggs, Fields, French, Getz, Glossbrenner, Hawkins, Hinds, Hulburd, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketchum, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marshall, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Moore, Mullins, Orth, Pile, Pomeroy, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Taber, Taylor, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—54.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Beck, Benjamin, Brooks, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grover, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Jencks, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kitchen, Knott, Koontz, Loan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mungen, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Plants, Poland, Sawyer, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stone, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Henry D. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Windom—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Archer, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Barnum, Beaman, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Boies, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clark, Cornell, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dodge, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Ferriss, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Golladay, Gravely, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kerr, Laffin, Lincoln, Logan, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Mercor, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Polsley, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aiken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—82.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurred upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. ARNELL. Is it in order now to move to refer this resolution to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the previous question is now operating.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] how much this resolution, if adopted, will give this committee clerk? That is not very well understood by members here.

Mr. MILLER. It will give him the same as the clerk of—

Mr. WELKER. I know that. I want to know how much in dollars.

Mr. MILLER. I was told the clerk of the Committee of Claims received $1,800 a year.

Mr. WELKER. I have been told it will give him $3,500.

Mr. MILLER. Oh, no; that is a mistake. It is only from the 1st of July to the 4th of March next.

Mr. WELKER. How much does it increase the compensation of this clerk? That is what I want to know.

Mr. MILLER. I will tell the gentleman I have been informed that the clerk of the Committee of Claims receives $1,800 a year. I have no objection to naming that amount in the resolution, or to naming any specific per diem compensation.

Mr. WELKER. My objection to this resolution is that it does not disclose to the members of the House how much it is proposed to give this clerk. I want it fully understood, so that gentlemen may be able to vote intelligently on the subject, for no doubt there are other clerks as well as this one who are entitled to increased compensation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am told that the clerk of the Committee of Claims gets $2,100 a year besides the twenty per cent.

Mr. MILLER. No, sir; with the twenty per cent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, with the twenty per cent.

Mr. MILLER. It is only $1,800, without the twenty per cent.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that this resolution does not cover any back time.

Mr. MILLER. No, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It applies only to the balance of this Congress.

Mr. MILLER. That is all.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that it is a very fair proposition.

Mr. MILLER. The compensation this clerk has received has not much more than paid for his board. As I stated yesterday, the Committee on Invalid Pensions have had more bills to consider than any other committee of this House; and the clerk of the Pension Committee has probably had more labor to perform than almost any other clerk.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it be in order to ask a question of the Chair, or of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make an inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has charge of the resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is this resolution to pay this clerk an increased compensation during the recess, from the adjournment until December next?

Mr. MILLER. It pays him precisely as the other clerk is paid.

Mr. MAYNARD. A per diem or a salary?

Mr. MILLER. A salary from the 1st of July to the 4th of March next.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think it would be better to frame the resolution so as to allow a per diem compensation. The principal objection I have to this resolution is that it makes this clerk a salaried officer.

Mr. MILLER. I will modify the resolution so as to give this clerk seven dollars per day for the time he shall be actually employed from the first of this month.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The clerk of the Committee on Reconstruction receives but four dollars per day for the time he is actually employed.

The SPEAKER. If no objection is made, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER] will be received.

No objection was made.

Mr. WELKER. I understand that other clerks get but four dollars a day, and it is proposed to give this clerk seven dollars a day.

Mr. MILLER. The clerk of the Committee of Claims, and some other clerks.

Mr. WELKER. There may be two clerks who get that amount.

Mr. MILLER. There are five or six of them.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular business of the morning hour is the consideration of reports of a private nature; and the House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis. This bill was, on Monday last, reported from the Committee of Claims by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. CLARKE.]

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river, upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, to be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at the present time.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to taking any bill from the Speaker's table out of its order.

DIRECT TAXES IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] on the condition that the business he may introduce shall take but little time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, for consideration at the present time, a joint resolution to amend the fourteenth section of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes."

The joint resolution, which was read for information, provides that the fourteenth section of the act named in the title be so amended as to extend the operation thereof until January 1, 1869.

Mr. ROSS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. As the gentleman is aware, there is, by existing law, an imposition of direct taxes which has been met by most of the States of the Union; but the southern States have not been able to meet or to assume these taxes. By the act of July 28, 1866, the time for the collection of the direct taxes in those States was extended till January 1, 1868. Those States are still in a condition of transition, as it may be called, and are so situated that the tax cannot be readily or conveniently collected even by resorting to oppressive measures for that purpose. It is proposed by the Department that the provision of the act of July 28, 1866, shall be extended till January 1, 1869; and that is the object of this joint resolution.

Mr. ROSS. I do not object to the resolution.

Mr. MULLINS. Let me say to any gentleman who may be disposed to oppose this joint resolution, that if such a measure be not passed, and if we should attempt to force the collection of the direct tax in those States, the effect will be most disastrous. The property of the people will be sacrificed everywhere. I hope that there will be no objection to the passage of this joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 329) was, by unanimous consent, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBUILDING OF LEVEES.

Mr. HINDS, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Arkansas constitutional convention, asking aid in rebuilding the levees along the Arkansas and Mississippi rivers, in the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTURE OF JEFF. DAVIS.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order in the morning hour was the consideration of House bill No. 1277, to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis, reported from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts moved various verbal amendments correcting the names of parties mentioned in the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move the following amendment, to come in at the end of the first section:

And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to receive evidence to correct misnomers or the omission of any of the names of those actually present rendering service with either of said detachments according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and to certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be audited and paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAUM. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for the purpose of moving an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will state in the first place, if I supposed the members of the House had read the report of the committee I should take no time in explaining the action of the committee, but I know at this period of the session few have the time to read any reports. I wish to say, so far as the action of the committee is concerned in reference to this reward, the committee doubt whether, strictly speaking, the reward could be legally claimed by any of the military force engaged in the service of the country. They believe the reward when offered was not intended to apply to that class of persons. While they were engaged in this duty they were merely performing that which devolved upon them in the service of the country; but the course having been taken in regard to the capture of Booth to divide the reward among the military engaged in his capture, the committee felt it was too late to discuss that question, and therefore, believing from the previous bills referred to the committee it was the opinion of the House the reward offered for the capture of Jefferson Davis should also be divided among the military officers and men entitled to it, we have taken the precedent adopted in the case of Booth's capture, and have reported the pending bill.

As the question presented itself to the minds of the committee—what class of persons are entitled to this reward; if it is to be divided among the military force which of them is entitled to it?—it will be noticed by those who have examined the bill we have divided it, so to speak, into three parts. First we state that the individual who had the control of these operations, who had been so energetic and so active in sending out all these various squads of soldiers in order that success might attend their efforts in the capture, he who laid the plans, without which the capture in all human probability would not have been made, certainly deserves consideration at our hands. No one disputes that Major General Wilson was the individual who sent out all these different parties. He planned and controlled and guided and directed the course to be taken by these different officers and men. The committee therefore state, in the first place, he should be rewarded for this direction and superintendence and guidance, and they have, therefore, included his name as one of the officers to receive this reward.

But it has been said, and I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAUM] rose to move an amendment on the subject, we have not allowed him as much as he is entitled to. The committee were of the opinion that we should adopt the principle in distribution that no man or officer shall be made rich by this award. Therefore we allow no officer a higher sum than $3,000. We recognize his services by the allowance of that sum, and so far as I know there has been no complaint made by any of these officers that the amount of $3,000 which we have given them is not satisfactory. Agreeing, then, in the first place, that General Wilson should receive a portion of the award, the next step was to determine what classes of persons in addition to him should receive it. We said it should be given to those men who were instrumental in accomplishing the result. The first party that was sent out for this purpose was Captain Joseph A. O. Yeoman, with a company of thirty-three men, who started May 3, under the order of General Wilson to one of his sub-officers to select one of the most enterprising officers and a company with him, to be sent in a certain direction to see if they could ascertain anything in reference to Davis and his party, who were supposed to be fleeing from the country. Captain Yeoman and his detail dressed themselves in rebel uniform and went forth, using such energy and perseverance in the work in which they were engaged as rarely ever was displayed before by a like body of men; they fell upon the trail and the train of Davis and his escort, mingled with them for three days in order to ascertain his course and give such information as would lead to his capture. On the 6th of May, having ascertained his whereabouts and the direction which he and his party were taking, he sent two of his men with all possible speed to convey the intelligence to General Wilson. The couriers in one day and night rode one hundred and twenty miles in order to convey the intelligence to their commander, and to dispatch the forces that were to be sent out to cut off Davis and his party. They were ordered to go with the utmost speed, and to kill their horses if necessary, and to seize others in order to convey the intelligence in the shortest possible time.

Now, it was from the action of Captain Yeoman and his men that the intelligence was communicated which led to the dispatch of the other officers and men for the certain capture of Davis. He informed General Wilson in reference to the late action, and the probable future course of Davis. His information was relied upon, and was correct. Had it not been for his energy in that regard the capture of Davis would never have been effected. From the information thus communicated the marching regiments were sent out which succeeded in the capture. It is on that ground, Captain Yeoman and his men having been instrumental in guiding and directing the forces which succeeded in the capture, that we have seen fit to embrace this detail and their officer in this award. We believe they are as much entitled to it as any who were engaged in the pursuit. They risked their lives, and encountered the peril and fate of spies, a more hazardous enterprise than any other command engaged in this duty can boast of. General Wilson having received information from Captain Yeoman at once sent off Colonel Harnden, of the first Wisconsin cavalry, with his regiment, to cut off Davis in the direction he was supposed to be escaping. Colonel Harnden started on the 5th of May, at night. He marched with all possible speed until he arrived at Jeffersonville, where he left thirty of his men. He went forward and arrived at Dublin, where he left forty-five more of his men, who were directed to scout the country around and guard the fords and passes in that direction if, perchance, Davis and his party should come there, in order to cut them off. Colonel Harnden, with the rest of his command, went on, and at length fell upon the trail of Davis and his party on the very route indicated by Captain Yeoman. He followed them day and night for some two days, until, on the 9th of May, he reached Abbeville, where he discovered Davis had passed a few hours before. Stopping at a house near Abbeville he inquired the way to Irwinsville, where he proposed to go in order to obtain forage for his horses, intending to follow Davis as rapidly as possible.

At three o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th of May, he left Abbeville on the road to Irwinsville, where he believed Davis had gone. After he had thus started his command, and was about to follow with his orderly, he saw four men riding down from the Hawkinsville road. He went to see those four men to ascertain whence they came and what was their object, noticing that they were United States troops. He ascertained from them that they belonged to Colonel Pritchard's regiment which had been sent from Macon, and had been following the river down in pursuit of Davis. He accordingly waited until Colonel Pritchard came up. And here let me say, that while there is some dispute in regard to the exact conversation which took place, it will not be my object to say to the House that there is any dispute in reference to. When Harnden met Pritchard, Pritchard told him his object, that he had been ordered to examine the passes of the river and see if Davis and his party undertook to cross the river, or if he could discover them in the valley of the river, to pursue and capture him if he could succeed in doing so. But the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this, that Colonel Harnden at this time asked Colonel Pritchard if he had heard anything of Davis and his party, and Colonel Pritchard replied that he had not. Up to this time, so far as there is any evidence before the committee, Colonel Pritchard had heard nothing of Davis and his companions.

Harnden told Colonel Pritchard that he had been following Davis's trail for two days, and that Davis had gone on the road to Irwinsville a few hours before; that he was in pursuit of him on that line, and was then going to Irwinsville. He left Colonel Pritchard with that understanding, Pritchard guarding the line of the river, and at the same time informing him that he understood another party had taken the left toward the river supposed to be a part of Davis's escort. Colonel Harnden then left, and started in pursuit of his command. They pressed on toward Irwinsville till nine o'clock in the evening, when they arrived near the outskirts of the town. Being dark, and their horses unable to undergo a further continuous march, it was deemed best to encamp for the night, and start early in the morning in order that they might succeed in the capture. They accordingly rested at nine o'clock, with orders to start the next morning at three o'clock. At three o'clock Colonel Harnden and his men started in pursuit of Davis. An officer and six men went in front in order that they might lead the way. They had gone, as is known to those who have examined the testimony, but a short distance when they fell in with an advance guard which gave the order to "halt and dismount." Supposing this company to be a part of Davis's band of rebels, they fell back and were fired upon. Two men were killed and three were wounded in the action. It seems, then, that Harnden with his entire force pressed forward supposing that this was a part of Davis's band. At length light began to dawn. They had taken one of the men who opposed them prisoner, and it turned out that he was one of the fourth Michigan cavalry, Colonel Pritchard's men. This was the first knowledge they had of Colonel Pritchard's being in that region, and of course all firing ceased. But the question which arises is how came Pritchard's men in that position? Colonel Harnden inquired and ascertained that Colonel Pritchard, a short time after he left him, left the river and took a portion of his regiment and hastened by another road to the same point, Irwinsville, and that he arrived there the night previous and encamped about the same distance from the town that Harnden had. He also rose early in the morning and sent a squad of men to capture Davis in order that they might be there as soon as it was light.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that Colonel Pritchard encamped at Irwinsville. He never encamped, but immediately surrounded Davis's company and lay there until morning.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No matter; he stopped near Irwinsville, whether any of them camped or not; there is where they stopped. I do not know that Harnden camped during the night; perhaps he did not. But he rested near Irwinsville, and marched in the morning about the same time. And as Pritchard states he sent a squad of men upon this Irwinsville road, which road Harnden took, for fear Davis and his train might attempt to escape by that road.

After the discovery was made that these were Pritchard's men, and that Colonel Pritchard was near, Pritchard himself came in and told Harnden that he with his command had just started; and that a squad of his men had just captured Davis and some persons with him. Harnden and Pritchard then went together to where Davis was, and there found, what is known to every member of this House, the company that were captured with Davis.

Now, all I wish to say is this: here were Harnden and his regiment who had been on the track of Davis, and were ready to capture him. Here was Pritchard and his men who also had used uncommon energy, and who had succeeded in arriving near Irwinsville the night before, and were also ready to capture Davis. There is no dispute but what the squad of Pritchard's men surrounded the camp of Davis, and so far as the immediate capture of Davis was concerned they were instrumental in accomplishing it. It is claimed on the part of Harnden's men that had it not been for Pritchard's advance-guard, which halted them when they were marching to the camp of Davis, they would have arrived there as soon as, if not sooner, than Pritchard's men, and been instrumental in making the capture rather than Colonel Pritchard himself. But the committee think that that fact does not necessarily follow, for it is neither necessary to admit it or deny it.

It is enough for me that the two commands occupied about the same position, as far as their distance from camp was concerned; and had it not been for Pritchard, Harnden would have captured Davis about the same time that Pritchard did; and that if Harnden had not been there, Pritchard and his men would have captured him as he did. The escort with Davis was so small that either party of our men would have been more than enough to make the capture; but the force of Davis was previously unknown; it had been strong, but had abandoned him, and was finally reduced by desertion, fear, and poverty to the meagre squad which yet, by the sympathy of a common misery, clung to his fallen fortunes.

It is proposed to divide this reward equally among these men. Pritchard was not in advance of Harnden, nor was Harnden in advance of Pritchard; but all the information that Pritchard had in regard to Davis was obtained from Harnden, was volunteered by Harnden, and there is every reason to suppose that had not Pritchard happened to meet Harnden at Abbeville, it is very doubtful whether he would have turned his course so as to have succeeded in the capture of Davis at all.

However that may be, I say for the Committee of Claims, in regard to both of these regiments and their officers, that they did all in their power to accomplish the object for which they were sent out, and which they had in view. Both were equally meritorious, and with the men who were immediately present surrounding Irwinsville and ready to capture Davis as soon as the dawn appeared, are equally entitled to this award. I am not prepared to say that because one party happened to get there a few minutes before the other therefore that party is entitled to any more of this reward than the other; but that they are entitled to be treated both alike, with equal praise, equal merit, and equal generosity. I must insist, that under all the circumstances, we should treat them all alike. All that I have intended in these remarks has been to state the reasons which have brought the committee to the conclusions embodied in the bill. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Urson.]

Mr. UPSON. Before proceeding with my remarks upon this subject, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Washburn] whether the bill is now open to amendment? I have an amendment which I would like to offer.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will say that the committee were unanimous in this report, and that the Committee of Claims of the last Congress were unanimously in favor of a report substantially similar to this. I have no authority from the committee to permit any amendment, but I will allow the gentleman's amendment to be read. Of course, if the House should see fit to vote down the previous question when the time comes, the amendment can be offered.

Mr. UPSON. I send my amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, on the 2d day of May, 1865, the President of the United States issued a proclamation, of which the following is a copy, offering rewards for the arrest of Jefferson Davis and others:

By the President of the United States of America.
A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas it appears from evidence in the Bureau of Military Justice that the atrocious murder of the late President, Abraham Lincoln, and the attempted assassination of Hon. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, were incited, concerted, and procured by and between Jefferson Davis, late of Richmond, Virginia, and Jacob Thompson, Clement C. Clay, Beverly Tucker, George N. Saunders, William C. Cleary, and other rebels and traitors against the Government of the United States, harbored in Canada:

Now, therefore, to the end that justice may be done, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do offer and promise for the arrest of said persons, or either of them, within the limits of the United States, so that they can be brought to trial, the following rewards:

One hundred thousand dollars for the arrest of Jefferson Davis.

Twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of Clement C. Clay.

Twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of Jacob Thompson, late of Mississippi.

Twenty-five thousand dollars for the arrest of George N. Saunders.

Ten thousand dollars for the arrest of William C. Cleary, late clerk of Clement C. Clay.

The Provost Marshal General of the United States is directed to cause a description of said persons, with notice of the above rewards, to be published.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the city of Washington, this 2d day of May, in the year of our Lord 1865, and of the [U. S.] independence of the United States of America the eighty-ninth.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:

W. HUNTER, Acting Secretary of State.

Subsequently on the 10th day of May, 1865, the arrest of Jefferson Davis was effected near Irwinsville, Georgia, by the fourth Michigan cavalry regiment, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel B. D. Pritchard. After the capture of the assassins of the late President, there being numerous conflicting claimants for the rewards offered for the apprehension of the said murderers, and for the rewards offered by proclamation, as aforesaid, for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis and others, a commission was appointed by the Secretary of War, consisting of E. D. Townsend, Assistant Adjutant General, and Joseph Holt, Judge Advocate General, to examine and determine the respective claims, and thereupon the following order was issued and public notice thereof given:

[General Orders, No. 65.]

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON November 24, 1865.

Ordered, That—

1. All persons claiming reward for the apprehension of John Wilkes Booth, Lewis Payne, G. A. Atzerott, and David E. Herold, and Jefferson Davis, or either of them, are notified to file their claims and their proofs with the Adjutant General, for final adjudication by the special commission appointed to award and determine upon the validity of such claims, before the 1st day of January next, after which time no claims will be received.

2. The rewards offered for the arrest of Jacob

Thompson, Beverly Tucker, George N. Saunders, William C. Cleary, and John H. Suratt are revoked. By order of the President of the United States:
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

The Secretary of War, in a communication to this House on this subject of date of April 18, 1866, (Ex. Doc. No. 90, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress,) states that—

"Claims continued to be presented after the expiration of the time specified in that order; and on the 16th instant, a year having elapsed from the date of the murder of Mr. Lincoln, it was considered that ample time had been allowed and the commission were directed to make their final report."

The final report of said commission was made January 13, 1866, and their findings and awards, without the evidence, will be found in said Executive Document No. 90, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, and by it the reward for the capture of Jefferson Davis was awarded to Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard and the fourth Michigan cavalry under his command, as stated in the present report of the Committee of Claims now under consideration. The entire evidence upon which said awards for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis were made will be found in Senate Executive Document No. 64, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, having been communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of War in compliance with a resolution of that body calling upon him for the same.

The reports and evidence on behalf of the claim of Lieutenant Colonel Henry Harnden, three officers, and one hundred and forty-eight non-commissioned officers and men of the first Wisconsin cavalry, for arrest of Davis, is contained therein, and the report of the commission states that the said claimants were adjudged to be not entitled to the reward under the terms of the published offers. (House Ex. Doc. No. 90, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, pp. 22, 23.) The subject having been referred to the Committee of Claims in the House of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, Mr. HOTCHKISS, from said committee, on the 24th day of July, 1866, reported a bill authorizing the payment of the various rewards offered for the capture of the assassins, and for the capture of Jefferson Davis, the said bill, so far as the captors of Davis were concerned, following out the finding and award of said commission, and of which the bill presented by me was a copy. Said bill was ordered to be printed and the further consideration of the same was postponed till the next day. On being taken up in the House, that portion of it relating to the reward offered for the arrest of Jefferson Davis was objected to, and it being just at the close of the session and little time left for debate, and as delay would be likely to kill the whole bill and thus defeat the payment of claims for the other rewards, a substitute was adopted leaving out from the bill all that part of it relating to the reward offered for the capture of Jefferson Davis, and the bill thus substituted passed on or about the last day of the session, with some amendments. Up to this time no application or claim for the reward had been made on the part of any one save the officers and men of the fourth Michigan and first Wisconsin cavalry, although the report of General Wilson and his recommendations in regard to the capture and the reward were returned and filed with the evidence before the commission which made the finding and award heretofore referred to, and notwithstanding the publication of the order for the presentation of claims as hereinbefore stated.

On the 15th January, 1867, on the motion of one of the Wisconsin delegation in the House, [Mr. Cobb,] an order was passed for the Committee of Claims to take certain testimony in the case, which testimony, as far as taken, was, on the 2d March, 1867, just at the close of the session, ordered to be printed, and will be found in Miscellaneous Document No. 82, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress. It contains a further report of General Wilson, and also a further statement, with an application or claim on his part, of date of January 27, 1867, for a portion of the reward. Also, the testimony taken again of Lieutenant Colonel Harnden; and new and enlarged affidavits again made and filed by Orson P. Clinton and J. J. Aplin, and an original affidavit of George L. Wright, all of the said first Wisconsin cavalry, being all, except Wright, the identical persons whose reports and affidavits were filed before the said commission, on behalf of the said first Wisconsin cavalry regiment, and which will be found in Senate Executive Document No. 64, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress; and being, therefore, only a restatement, with additions, as they might deem proper, of the evidence in support of their claim. But the committee did not see proper, or did not have time, to call upon or examine further any of the officers or men of the fourth Michigan cavalry, or to call for their evidence before the commission; and, in that respect the evidence in said House Miscellaneous Document No. 82, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, if, perhaps, we except General Wilson's new report and statement, is entirely ex parte.

I am not aware that any additional testimony has been taken in this case by the Committee of Claims of this Fortieth Congress, though one or two official reports may have been referred to them; and I have also presented in the House and had referred to them the affidavit of Lieutenant J. G. Dickinson, adjutant of the fourth Michigan cavalry, who was present at the capture, and who is particularly referred to by General Wilson in his report of January 17, 1867. (See House Mis. Doc. No. 82, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, p. 11.)

This sketch or history of the proceedings in this case, with references to the documents where the evidence is to be found, and suggestions as to the circumstances under which it was taken, has been deemed necessary to facilitate its examination and to lead to a proper understanding of its merits. The claim of the fourth Michigan cavalry has once been favorably reported on by the commission appointed by the War Department, and approved by the Secretary; and subsequently a bill to carry out said award has once been reported by a former committee of this House, while by the same commission the claim of the first Wisconsin regiment has once been rejected. The claim presents itself in two aspects, first before the commission, and, secondly, before this House. Before the commission, and in the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the parties claiming the reward were comprised in the fourth Michigan and first Wisconsin cavalry.

Now, the parties claimants are more numerous, but in each instance Lieutenant Colonel Harnden and the witnesses he brings with him have unwisely, as it seems to me, seen fit in presenting their claim on behalf of the first Wisconsin cavalry to assail the honor of Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, as if acknowledging that, without making good their charges against him, their claim had no just foundation. The aforesaid commission appointed by the Secretary of War to examine and determine upon the evidence, the merits of the respective claims, in their report to the Secretary announcing their finding, use this language in giving their conclusion upon the evidence before them, expressly referring therein to these charges made by Colonel Harnden:

"The arrest of this chief traitor was effected on May 10 last, near Irwinsville, Georgia, by the fourth Michigan cavalry regiment, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel B. D. Pritchard, who started upon the pursuit with his command, from Macon, Georgia, on May 7. The reward in this case, however, is also claimed by Lieutenant Colonel Henry Harnden, who, with his regiment, the first Wisconsin cavalry, also engaged in the pursuit, arrived upon the ground but a few minutes after the command of Colonel Pritchard had taken possession of the camp of Davis. Without discussing at length the charges which have been made by Colonel Harnden in regard to the course adopted by Colonel Pritchard upon this pursuit, it will be sufficient to observe that upon a careful consideration of all the evidence these charges are not deemed to be sustained in any particular; and it is concluded by the undersigned that the latter officer, both in the pursuit and the capture, acted in entire good faith toward the former, and cannot be held responsible for the momentary unfortunate collision which took place between the two commands.

"The charges in question not being sustained, it must be held that the regiment or detachment of Colonel Pritchard were the actual captors, and that it is among the officers and men who constituted such detachment that the specific reward for the 'arrest' of Davis is to be divided.

"At the same time it is proper to bear testimony to the valuable services upon this occasion of the first Wisconsin cavalry and its commander, and to note that, while the Michigan regiment is deemed under the terms of the offer to be entitled to the reward, the activity and zeal displayed in the pursuit by the other must commend it to a hardly less honorable mention than its more fortunate ally."

This finding having been approved by the Secretary of War, the said claim and charges restated are now pressed by Colonel Harnden and his friends as if in the nature of an appeal from that decision, and to Colonel Pritchard and the fourth Michigan cavalry it becomes a matter of far higher and more important consideration than any mere pecuniary reward.

The report of the Committee of Claims accompanying their present bill, after quoting the aforesaid testimony and report of General Wilson of January 17, 1867, and also the last statement of Colonel Harnden on oath, made 29th January, 1867, before the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and giving an extract from the report of General Thomas of June 1, 1868, (probably 1865,) makes this extraordinary statement, namely:

"From this testimony may be gathered the facts of the capture of Jefferson Davis and the merits of the contest between the fourth Michigan and first Wisconsin regiments. That contest was one of true heroism, in which both parties rendered the most honorable service in the field, and it ought not, in the opinion of the committee, to be now degraded into a controversy for the pecuniary reward."

The report then refers to affidavits of Lieutenant Clinton and privates Aplin and Wright, of Colonel Harnden's regiment, but gives no extracts from, and makes no reference to the report or affidavits of any officer or private of the fourth Michigan cavalry in regard to the capture, nor even to the prior reports or recommendations of either General Wilson or Colonel Harnden, so that the facts, according to the report of the committee in regard to the contest between the fourth Michigan and first Wisconsin cavalry, are to be gathered entirely from the ex parte statements of the officers and men of the first Wisconsin cavalry, and the last statement of General Wilson, after he had been apparently importuned to make some further declaration to favor Colonel Harnden's cause; but the statements of the officers and men of the fourth Michigan regiment apparently are not deemed worthy of notice or even of mention in the case. I have too high an opinion of the committee, and especially of the gentleman who made the report, to believe that this omission was intentional, but it is so remarkable that I must conclude that the reports and affidavits of the officers and men of the fourth Michigan regiment must have been by some mistake overlooked or forgotten, for they contain some statements totally at variance with the testimony of Colonel Harnden, and somewhat seriously affecting the "merits" of what the report styles the "contest" between said regiments.

As the committee in their report quote from the finding and award made by Assistant Adjutant General Townsend and Judge Advocate General Holt, the commission appointed by the Secretary of War to examine and determine the respective claims for the reward offered for the capture of Jefferson Davis, and as they in effect overrule and set aside the same in their report and bill it is fair to presume that they have examined all the evidence upon which the award of said commission was made. That evidence will be found in Senate Executive Document No. 64, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, communicated by letter from the Secretary of War, April 30, 1866, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate calling upon him for such evidence, and is comprised in the following list, given at the commencement of said communication:

1. Report of General J. H. Wilson, dated May 12, 1865.

2. Report of Colonel Minty, dated May 18, 1865.

3. Report of Lieutenant Colonel Harnden, first Wisconsin cavalry, dated May 18, with indorsements.

4. List of officers and men of the first Wisconsin cavalry reported as engaged in the pursuit.

5. Report of Captain Hathaway, fourth Michigan cavalry, dated May 15, 1865.

6. List of officers and men of the fourth Michigan cavalry reported as actually present at the capture.

8. Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard's report, dated May 25, 1865.

9. Brevet Brigadier General Minty's letter of July 6, 1865, forwarding report of Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, dated July 2, 1865, with two inclosures.

11. Supplemental report of Lieutenant Colonel Harnden, sworn to December 11, 1865, with inclosures.

12. Copy of proclamation by the President of May 2, 1865, offering reward for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis and others.

Copies of the said report of General Wilson, with that of Captain Hathaway, Lieutenant Colonel Harnden, and Colonel Minty, with the indorsements thereon, as transmitted by General Wilson, are also contained in Senate Executive Document No. 13, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, communicated by the Secretary of War, January 31, 1867, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate. Yet, notwithstanding the report of the committee accompanying, this bill overrules and sets aside the finding and award of this commission. It does not once allude to the aforesaid evidence on which it was founded, or any part thereof, but bases its conclusions wholly, as would seem, so far as the fourth Michigan and first Wisconsin cavalry are concerned, upon the subsequent statements of General Wilson and Colonel Harnden, in Miscellaneous Document No. 82, with the exception of the brief reference to the report of General Thomas; and it would seem as if the evidence on the part of the fourth Michigan cavalry had never been seen by the committee, or had been wholly overlooked and ignored, and even the sworn statement of Lieutenant Dickinson, of the fourth Michigan cavalry, which gives a full statement of the transaction, and particularly of the interview between Lieutenant Colonel Harnden and Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, at Abbeville, and which was presented by me and referred to the committee on the 18th of December, 1867, seems also wholly to have escaped the attention of the committee or to have been considered immaterial and unworthy of notice.

As Lieutenant Dickinson's statement of the capture of Jefferson Davis has never been printed, and as it contains some matters which I deem material and pertinent, and as controverting some of the statements contained in the first report of Colonel Harnden, and also in his sworn statement of December 11, 1865, filed before the commission, and in the affidavits accompanying the same, I will now send it to the Clerk to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN, County of Wayne, ss:

Before me, a notary public in and for said county, personally appeared J. G. Dickinson, of the city of Detroit, county and State aforesaid, who being by me duly sworn, deposes and says that he was first lieutenant and adjutant of the fourth Michigan cavalry during the month of May, A. D. 1865, and was with his regiment during the pursuit and capture of the rebel Jefferson Davis and party, on the 9th and 10th days of May, A. D. 1865, in the vicinity of Irwinsville, Georgia. That he was personally present at the meeting and interview of Lieutenant Colonel B. D. Pritchard, commanding the fourth Michigan cavalry, and Lieutenant Colonel Harnden, commanding detachment first Wisconsin cavalry, on the afternoon of the 9th day of May aforesaid, near Abbeville, in the State of Georgia, and heard the whole of the conversation between those two officers at that time; and deponent further says that during said conversations Colonel Pritchard did not tell Colonel Harnden that he should remain at Abbeville or at any particular point, but told him in general term that his (Colonel Pritchard's) orders were to take possession of all the fords and ferries on the Ocmulgee river below Hawkinsville, as far as the strength of his command would permit, and to scout the country on both sides of the river for the purpose of the capture of Davis and others; and deponent further says that he has good reason to believe, and does believe, that Colonel Harnden did not and could not have understood from what Colonel Pritchard said during said conversation that he (Colonel Pritchard) was going to remain at Abbeville, from the fact that Colonel Harnden met Colonel Pritchard on the west side of Abbeville, and continued to ride with him at the head of his column until it had passed Abbeville on its way down the river from that place about a quarter of a mile, when Colonel Harnden struck across the country to the road on which he said the first Wisconsin cavalry had passed out, leaving Colonel Pritchard and his command still moving down the river on the river road; and deponent further says that he was with the detachment of the fourth Michigan cavalry, under command of Colonel Pritchard, which effected the immediate capture of Davis and party, on the morning of May 10, aforesaid, and was cognizant of all orders issued by Colonel Pritchard to his command, and of the movements of the same, and knew that all such movements were executed with the most strict fidelity toward Colonel Harnden and his command, and that no effort was made to reach Irwinsville in advance of Colonel Harnden and his command. And that Colonel Pritchard and all of his command was surprised on their arrival at that place to find that neither the train or Colonel Harnden had reached there, as Colonel Harnden had told Colonel Pritchard at Abbeville that he should go through to Irwinsville before he went into camp that night; and deponent further says that he was present and participated in the immediate seizure and capture of Davis and party, and that Colonel Pritchard had the camp of Davis surrounded for more than an hour and a half before he attacked the same, and that the actual seizure had been made complete from five to ten minutes before the first shot was fired between the detachment of the fourth Michigan cavalry, under Lieutenant Purinton, and the first Wisconsin, and any statements to the effect that the first Wisconsin was fought back while the capture was being made is incorrect, and all statements to the effect that the fourth Michigan cavalry waylaid the first Wisconsin is unqualifiedly false and without foundation in fact or otherwise; and deponent further says that he was present at another conversation between Colonel Pritchard and Colonel Harnden immediately after the capture of Davis, in which Colonel Harnden stated frankly and voluntarily that he did not think that he would have captured Davis in the manner he was moving, as his advance (which was a sergeant and six or seven men only) would have given the party notice in time for Davis, and those who desired to escape, to have fled before the rest of his force could have come up sufficient to make the capture.

J. K. DICKINSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 23d day of February, 1867.

DAVID B. BROWN,
Department Clerk of the Circuit Court, for Wayne County, Michigan.
[Stamp.]

Mr. UPSON. The material statements in this affidavit are substantially corroborated by the report of Colonel Minty, the two reports of Colonel Pritchard of May 25 and July 2, 1865, the affidavits of Lieutenant Purinton and of Lieutenant Boutelle of the fourth Michigan cavalry, who were both personally present at the capture of Davis, and at the unfortunate collision immediately thereafter between the two detachments, in which two men of the Michigan regiment were killed and Lieutenant Boutelle severely wounded, and several men of the Wisconsin regiment were severely wounded, all of which evidence will be found in said Senate Executive Document No. 64, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress; and they also seem to be supported by the reports and indorsements of General Wilson, found in the same document. The reports of Colonel Pritchard of May 25, 1865, of July 2, 1865, beginning on page 24 of said document, contains a very full, clear, complete, and candid statement and history of the transaction, and its material facts are also sustained by the general current of the whole testimony.

The facts as shown by all the testimony may be stated substantially as follows: some days before the capture of Davis General Wilson had ascertained that Jefferson Davis and family with a train of a few followers and an escort was moving southward through Georgia toward the Ocmulgee river, evidently seeking to escape, and he at once sent out various detachments to intercept his train and capture him, giving his subordinates information of the general course in which Davis and party were moving. Colonel Harnden with his detachment was sent eastwardly through the country north of the Ocmulgee river, to discover his trail and if possible to intercept or follow and capture him. Colonel Pritchard, with his detachment, was sent down the south bank of the Ocmulgee river, the general course of which is southeast, to guard the fords, picket the river, and scout it on both sides for the same purpose, and if he found Davis and party had crossed the river to pursue and capture him.

Harnden, on his expedition east, struck the trail of a train some distance north of the Ocmulgee, which he believed belonged to Davis and party, and followed it south to where it crossed the Ocmulgee at Brown's ferry, near Abbeville; and, after some little delay by an accident in getting over the river, he crossed and learned that the train had, early on the morning of the 9th of May, 1865, moved on in the direction of Irwinsville, which is some twenty or twenty-five miles south and a little to the east of Abbeville. Harnden had just sent on his command in pursuit toward Abbeville when Colonel Pritchard appeared, coming down the river to Abbeville, having also just learned that a train had crossed the night previous at Brown's ferry. Harnden rode up to meet him as he came into Abbeville, and accompanied him as he moved down the river through Abbeville, informing him that he was pursuing the train toward Irwinsville, and that he thought Davis's family was with it, but Davis probably was not, as he had been reported as traveling by himself with a small escort. Colonel Pritchard, in the conversation, offered Colonel Harnden some of his men, which offer Harnden declined, as he deemed his force was strong enough, and Pritchard continued moving down the river, while Harnden, leaving him, rode across the country to overtake his own men. This was between two and three o'clock p. m.

Pritchard says he told Harnden before parting that it was useless for him to follow on the same road with him, (Harnden;) mentioned to him what his orders were, and that he should continue down the river and act as circumstances might dictate, and Harnden said he should press forward to Irwinsville before he encamped if the train went to that place. No plans of action were agreed upon between them, as neither of them knew anything about the roads. Colonel Pritchard, after continuing down the river some three miles, found a negro guarding his master's wagon, broken down in the road, and from him learned such information of the passage of the party over Brown's ferry as satisfied him that Davis was undoubtedly with the party. Learning, also, from the same negro and a lady living close by that there was another road leading to Irwinsville, about fifteen miles down the river road from Abbeville, at a point known as Wilcox's mills, Colonel Pritchard, feeling that no effort should now be spared on his part to insure the capture of the party, decided at once to pursue the party by way of the river road, believing that if they were hard pressed at any time by Colonel Harnden they would be likely to abandon the direct road in order to escape, and might drive over the road by which he (Colonel Pritchard) would approach Irwinsville, and if Colonel Harnden pressed forward to Irwinsville as he had intimated, the party would then fall between the two commands. As the distance by this new route was much greater, and as Colonel Harnden's command was then two hours on its way, he could not anticipate reaching Irwinsville in advance of him.

Selecting a part of his force, and leaving the remainder under Captain Hathaway to picket the river, &c., he started at four p. m., reached Wilcox mills at sunset, halted an hour and fed and refreshed his horses, and then proceeded by a blind wood's road some eighteen miles, mostly through a pine forest, to Irwinsville, without seeing any traces of the train or of Colonel Harnden, and arrived there about one o'clock on the morning of the 10th.

Surprised at this they began to make inquiries, and by representing themselves as Confederates they soon learned from the inhabitants that a party had encamped about sunset near a mile and a half out, toward Abbeville, and some of the party had been in the town during the evening. Pressing a negro for a guide, Colonel Pritchard moved up cautiously near the camp and surrounded it, sending Lieutenant Purinton with twenty-five men to the rear to cut off all possibility of escape, and giving him orders to carefully ascertain the character of any men he might meet before firing upon them.

This was about two o'clock in the morning, and after waiting about an hour and a half, thus keeping watch, with the first appearance of dawn a dash was made on the camp, which was immediately captured without firing a shot. In about five or ten minutes after this capture of Davis and his party the collision occurred between Lieutenant Purinton's men and the Wisconsin cavalry, which was attended with such serious results, and which probably would have been wholly avoided had Sergeant Hussey, when challenged by Lieutenant Purinton, properly disclosed himself or answered to the challenge instead of retreating, as stated by Colonel Harnden in his first report of May 13, 1865; but which, as it occurred, was clearly a misadventure, the result of mutual misapprehension, and far from the intention of either party, both unquestionably acting in good faith, in ignorance of the identity of each other, and if any error occurred on either side it was an error of judgment. Neither party at that time knew anything of the reward that had been offered for the capture of Davis, nor could they have any possible object or motive to induce them thus to assail each other.

I come now to notice the most unpleasant feature in the subsequent history of this case. Colonel Harnden in his first report, while claiming that he understood from his conversation with Colonel Pritchard at Abbeville that he (Colonel Pritchard) was going into camp at Abbeville, and hence that he had no intimation of the presence of Union troops near Irwinsville where the collision occurred, and while expressing his regret at the occurrence did not seem disposed to be harsh or censorious in his judgment so far as Colonel Pritchard and his command were concerned. His superior officer, Colonel Lagrange, in forwarding that report saw fit, however, gratuitously to make an indorsement thereon, wantonly and unjustly, if not maliciously, assailing Colonel Pritchard. That indorsement is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS SECOND BRIGADE,
FIRST CAVALRY DIVISION, M. D.,
MACON, GEORGIA, May 14, 1865.

From this report it appears that Lieutenant Colonel Harnden faithfully discharged his duty, and no blame can attach to him in relation to the unfortunate collision between his detachment and Colonel Pritchard's, which he had every reason to believe remained at Abbeville. It is, however, a source of painful regret that the satisfaction experienced in this consummation is clouded by the knowledge that an act having every appearance of unsoldierly selfishness, in appropriating by deception the fruits of another's labor, and thus attaining unearned success, resulted in unnecessary bloodshed, and a sacrifice of lives for which no atonement can be made. What may have been intended merely as an act of bad faith toward a fellow-soldier resulted in a crime, and for this closing scene of the rebellion, inglorious in itself but historic by circumstance, it is difficult to repress a wish that accident had afforded the Government a representative above suspicion.

Respectfully forwarded:

O. H. LAGRANGE,
Colonel Commanding.

By some means, and contrary to military regulations, as I am advised, this report and indorsement was soon after published in the Cincinnati papers, and copied with comments by the press generally, while Colonel Pritchard's report was only forwarded to the War Department in the usual way. Colonel Harnden at first seemed conscious of the great wrong and injustice which was done to Colonel Pritchard by this act, and endeavored to disclaim all connection with it, as would appear from a disclaimer published in the Nashville Press and Times of the last of June, 1865, as follows:

"A Disclaimer.—An article appeared in our paper last week under the head of 'Personal,' in which, after several sentences commendatory of Brevet Brigadier General Pritchard, the gallant officer whose command captured 'the confederacy in petticoats,' the following passage occurs: 'We shall have something to say hereafter regarding the false and vil-laneous charges made against him by the jealous officer," &c. On Saturday we had a visit from Lieutenant Colonel Henry Harnden, who feared that the public might take the reference as applicable to himself. He authorizes us to say that he neither published nor caused to be published any charges against General Pritchard; that he would disdain to do such an act; and that he knew nothing about his report of the campaign, in which he indulged in no reflections, and the indorsement of Colonel La Grange appearing in the newspaper, until he saw both in print. The warmest relations exist between General Pritchard and Colonel Harnden, and the prompt manner in which the latter has come forward with his disclaimer is creditable alike to his head and heart."—Senate Executive Document No. 64, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, p. 34.

So far, then, all appeared to be well as between these two officers; and yet, on the 11th day of December, said Harnden made oath to a new statement or report of the capture, addressed to Judge Advocate General Joseph Holt, and claiming a share of the reward, in which, after giving his new version of the affair, he makes the following strange, new, unworthy, and insinuating statement, namely:

"Had we not been waylaid and fired upon by the fourth Michigan cavalry, we should, without a doubt, have captured Jeff. Davis even sooner than it was effected."

This statement is also made in the face of the fact that is shown in his same deposition, that he was then approaching Davis's camp, without even knowing where it was, and with an advance guard of only seven men; and this statement or claim laid before the commission he attempts to fortify by having it also sworn to, in a somewhat general or qualified way, by J. J. Aplin and Orson P. Clinton. (Senate Mis. Doc. No. 64, first session Thirty-Ninth Congress, p. 37.)

This also, notwithstanding General Wilson in forwarding Colonel Harnden's first report, with Colonel La Grange's aforesaid indorsement thereon, had properly rebuked Colonel La Grange, and vindicated Colonel Pritchard, by adding his indorsement thereon as follows: after the indorsement of General Croxton had been first appended to the report and following that of Colonel Lagrange, namely:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION, C. C., M. D. M.,
MACON, GEORGIA, May 15, 1865.

As an act of justice to all parties I recommend that this report, together with that of Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, be forwarded to the Secretary of War, with the request that they be published in the Army and Navy Gazette.

Respectfully forwarded,

JOHN T. CROXTON,
Brigadier General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY CORPS,
MILITARY DEPARTMENT MISSISSIPPI,
MACON, GEORGIA, May 19, 1865.

Justice to a brave and skillful officer impels me to say I do not think the strictures of Colonel La Grange warranted by the facts. Colonel Pritchard would have been more culpable had he have remained in camp, knowing the object of his search had already passed on. I am unwilling to believe him intentionally guilty of any act unbecoming a good soldier.

Colonel Harnden and his command are certainly, on the other hand, entitled to a full share of the credit in apprehending Jeff. Davis, and in no way to blame for the collision between his own command and that of General Pritchard.

Respectfully forwarded; the recommendation of General Croxton approved.

J. H. WILSON,
Brevet Major General.

The vindication of Colonel Pritchard was as soldier-like and manly on the part of General Wilson as the rebuke of Colonel La Grange was timely and deserved.

Alike manly and just was the indorsement of General Wilson on the report of Colonel Minty, accompanying that of Captain Hathaway, narrating the circumstances of the capture of Davis, and which is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS CAVALRY CORPS,
MILITARY DIVISION MISSISSIPPI,
MACON, GEORGIA, May 9, 1865.

Respectfully forwarded: a comparison of the inclosed reports with that of Colonel Harnden, first Wisconsin cavalry, will show that Colonel Pritchard acted in good faith with Colonel Harnden. I must, therefore, and in view of all the facts, respectively recommend that medals of honor be given to the officers and men of both regiments actually engaged in the pursuit south of Abbeville. In the distribution of the reward, the families of the two men killed should be amply provided for.

J. H. WILSON,
Brevet Major General.

Defeated, as we have seen, before the commission, and his claim rejected, he next appears before the committee of the last House, and makes a new and enlarged statement, and somewhat amplifies and reiterates his charges and insinuations against Colonel Pritchard and his men, again calls to his aid Aplin and Clinton with new affidavits, and a further affidavit from one George D. Wright, in which affidavits, among other things, pretended hearsay statements are given of persons whose names are not stated, and who are in no way identified, other than that they are alleged to have been with the Michigan men, and affidavits thus patched up to fit the case he proposes or hopes to dignify into evidence to support his charges.

It is sufficient for me to refer the House to all the evidence and reports before the commission, and to their report and the affidavit of Lieutenant Dickinson, to show both the fallacy and injustice if not maliciousness of these charges thus reiterated and attempted to be substantiated. I should be sorry to be compelled to believe that a desire to obtain a share in the reward has originated or prompted these charges; but it is suggestive that until the claim for the reward was made before the commission by Colonel Harnden he had never made any such statement or imputation against Colonel Pritchard and his regiment.

We next come to the new recommendations of General Wilson. General J. H. Wilson, in his last report of January 17, 1867, on this subject, uses the following language, which is quoted by the committee in their report in this case:

"In my correspondence with the War Department just after the capture I recommended, probably without due consideration, that the reward of $100,000 offered by the President for the capture of Davis (or that part of it remaining after the families of the men killed in the pursuit had been amply provided for) should be divided according to the law of prize among the actual captors, and that Colonel Harnden and his men should receive medals of honor specially commemorating the part they had taken in the pursuit. This recommendation had not been carried into effect, but the commission, of which General Townsend was president, disallow the claims of Colonel Harnden, and recommend that the members of the fourth Michigan cavalry, scouting and picketing the Ocmulgee river, over thirty miles north of Irwinsville, as well as the 'actual captors,' shall be included in the distribution of the reward, on the ground that they were performing service of a 'most important precautionary character.' With just as much reason every other man of the entire cavalry force then on duty in Georgia should also be included in the distribution, as they were performing service of 'a most important precautionary character incidental to the immediate purpose of the expedition, and such as could not, without an imputation of neglect of duty, have been omitted to be provided for.' Colonel Harnden and his detachment, who were actually within gun sound of the capture, certainly deserve more consideration in this case than any one who remained behind, no matter upon what duty he was engaged. I am therefore compelled, in equity and justice, to respectfully recommend, in the further consideration of this matter by the proper authorities, that the strict law of prize be observed. Under this law it seems to me that Colonel Harnden and Captain Yeoman should receive share and share alike with the officers who were actually present at the capture."

Had General Wilson looked at the report and recommendation of Colonel Pritchard of May 23, 1865, which is referred to by the commission in giving their decision, he would have found that Colonel Pritchard did not insist that strictly any but those of his regiment present at the capture had a right to the reward; but when he advised that those of the regiment picketing the river should share in the reward, he added, "and when I say this I believe I but utter the wishes of a large majority of both officers and men." If those who were present at and participating in the capture and entitled to the reward were willing that their fellow members of the regiment on duty at the river should share with them in the reward the rights of no one else were violated in allowing it, and the rule of law was not changed. No one else had any right to complain, not even General Wilson, on that account, nor can he justify any change of his first recommendation on that ground. But this extract from General Wilson's last report also shows this important fact, that up to January 17, 1867, he had never considered Colonel Harnden or his men entitled to share in the reward, and had not recommended that they should share in it. He had only recommended that Colonel Harnden and his men should receive medals of honor; nor does he now recommend that the men of the first Wisconsin should share in the reward, but only that Colonel Harnden himself, and Captain Yeoman, of the first Ohio cavalry, should receive share and share alike with the captors.

Yet the committee, in their report and bill, allow shares not only to these officers but to all the men serving under them, and disregard the law of prize advocated by General Wilson as well as adhered to by the commission. Never has General Wilson considered the first Wisconsin cavalry as among the captors of Davis, and entitled to share in the reward. Having a high regard for General Wilson, his services and his manly, soldierlike qualities, I desire to speak only in praise of that gallant officer. But in preparing his last report, as he was about to prefer a claim of his own for a share in the reward, in changing a little his recommendation it would have been a delicate matter to have so enlarged it as to include only himself, especially when it is possible he might have been greatly importuned by officers and friends for whom he doubtless had a high personal regard.

He briefly presented his claim to the committee as follows, referring therein to his said report:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 27, 1867.

Having given all the orders and instructions, as commanding general of the cavalry corps, military division of the Mississippi, for the movement and disposition of the troops which resulted in the capture of Jefferson Davis and his suite, I have the honor to ask that a portion of the reward offered by the President under proclamation dated Washington, D. C., May 2, 1865, to which I am entitled under the law of prize, be paid to me.

I have also the honor to ask that the reward offered for the capture of Clement C. Clay, jun., under the same proclamation, or that part of it to which I am entitled, may also be paid to me, the said Clay having surrendered in person to me at Macon, Georgia, May 11, 1865.

The full facts and particulars in these cases are set forth in an official report, dated January 17, 1867, now in the hands of General Grant.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. H. WILSON,

Lieut. Col. 35th Inf., Brev. Maj. Gen. U. S. A., late Maj. Gen. Vols., commanding Cav. Corps, M. D. M. Chairman of the Committee of Claims, House of Reps.

The reward was offered for the arrest of Jefferson Davis, and when that rule of distribution to the actual captors is passed, there is no fixed line of discrimination, and it then becomes an arbitrary matter, or rather one of caprice. The reward was offered not for information which might lead to his arrest, nor for vigilant efforts, labors, and services, however meritorious in pursuing and endeavoring to arrest or capture him, but which did not succeed. The actual arrest was to be the crowning work, which was to earn, achieve, and receive the reward. This was the work of Colonel Pritchard and his men, of the fourth Michigan cavalry. While, therefore, strictly as a matter of right under the terms of the award, we do not consider that General Wilson or Captain Yeoman and his men are entitled to share in it; yet our estimation of and regard for them is such that, under the circumstances, we would not object to the bill reported by the committee, on account of the provisions it contains in their favor, preferring to yield to their recommendations where it does not affect our honor. But Colonel Harnden and his regiment not only are not entitled by the terms of the offered reward to share in it as a matter of right, but they have seen fit, in presenting their claim, to base it upon a charge against the fourth Michigan regiment of the commission of an act most diabolical and dishonorable in its nature, and for the commission of which no possible motive or object is shown to have existed, and which charge is wholly unsupported by the facts.

They cannot, then, claim a share of the reward as a matter of right nor by the law of courtesy, nor can the fourth Michigan consent to the allowance of their claim as thus presented and urged, without contributing to their own dishonor. Far be it from us to disparage the first Wisconsin cavalry or their services as soldiers. The Union soldiers of all the States during the late great rebellion wrote their own glorious and patriotic record in imperishable characters on the brightest page of their country's history. But we are called upon to defend Colonel Pritchard and his men from what we consider a most foul and unjust imputation and aspersion which owns Colonel Harnden as its author, and hence we have spoken. Colonel Pritchard, for gallant and meritorious services in the war, was made a brigadier general of volunteers by brevet, and I am proud to number him, as well as many of his regiment, as among my constituents. My honored colleague from the third district, [Mr. BLAIR,] who so ably and patriotically filled the executive chair of my State during the four long, bloody, and devastating years of the war, assisted him in organizing his regiment and issued to him his commission, and will not fail to bear testimony with all my colleagues to his worth, his integrity, and high standing both as a soldier and as a citizen.

By virtue of the suffrages of a vast majority of the people of his State, he has held for two years past the honorable and responsible office of commissioner of the general land office of the State, for which office he has recently been renominated by acclamation.

The people of Michigan who know him, honor, trust, and confide in him, and will continue to do so; and while we say nothing, as we know nothing, against the character of Colonel Harnden, outside of his connection with this charge, we do know Colonel Pritchard, and his reputation and his honor, the honor of his regiment and of his State alike forbid that we should consent or vote to reward Colonel Harnden and his men for thus unjustly assailing him and his regiment in connection with this transaction, which has now become a matter of history.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] has in the course of his remarks referred to the charge that the first Wisconsin cavalry were waylaid and fired upon by the fourth Michigan cavalry, and that but for this the former would have captured Jefferson Davis. I wish to say that the committee did not base their report on any such ground. We do not say whether that charge is correct or not.

Mr. UPSON. Colonel Harnden predicates his claim on that charge.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. UPSON. That is the charge which was made before the commission, and repeated in an affidavit before the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. We understand that Colonel Harnden made that charge; but the committee, without attempting to determine the correctness of that charge, say that even if the charge were unfounded Colonel Harnden gave the information leading to the capture; he had been on the track; he had been riding day and night; he had encamped during the dark hours of the night, and started out at three o'clock in the morning with his regiment ready to make the capture. Now, even though the other party happened to get to the scene of the capture, as the affidavit says, five minutes sooner, that did not seem to us a reason why they should receive the entire reward.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to correct the gentleman in one respect. He will find by Colonel Pritchard's report, and by the affidavits in the document to which I have referred, that Colonel Pritchard obtained from a negro and from a lady residing three miles below Abbeville, information that Jefferson Davis was with the party—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. But the gentleman must be aware that that was subsequent to the information he received from Colonel Harnden; that up to the time he met

Colonel Harnden he had not heard anything of the kind. I know it is claimed that subsequent to the time when Colonel Harnden told him that Davis had gone to Irwinsville, he was on the track; but it was not claimed by Colonel Pritchard that he had heard one word in reference to the whereabouts of Jefferson Davis before that.

Mr. UPSON. Another point is this: the evidence shows that Colonel Pritchard's party had surrounded Davis's camp an hour and a half, not five minutes, before the other party arrived.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BLAIR.]

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I have been anxious that this important bill might be considered in Committee of the Whole, or in some such manner that the facts might be fully brought to the attention of the House, in order that the questions involved might be properly decided. I deny altogether that we have any special care as to the particular persons who may receive this money. This question reaches further than that. This bill proposes to unsettle the finding that has heretofore been made in regard to this transaction. The committee do not deny that this capture was made entirely by the fourth Michigan cavalry; but they undertake to weaken the statement of this matter which has heretofore gone forth to the country. These and other matters I should like to consider; but I am unable to do so in the ten minutes allowed me, and I must speak directly to the point.

Now, sir, it is within the recollection, I suppose, of everybody in this country that soon after the assassination of President Lincoln in April, 1865, his successor, President Johnson, issued a proclamation bearing date May 2, 1865, in which, upon evidence in the department of military justice, he charged Davis with being accessory to the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. Upon that ground he offers a reward for various persons, and among others a reward of $100,000 for the arrest of Jefferson Davis, not to troops, not to soldiers, not to anybody in particular, but to any person or any single individual, any one who should arrest Jefferson Davis—not to any regiment which should well conduct itself; the reward was offered to nobody or for any other purpose than the single one of the arrest of Jefferson Davis as a criminal, not as a traitor to his country at all, not as president of the southern confederacy, but only and simply because he was charged with being an assassin this reward was offered and was to be given to whomsoever should make this arrest. I submit, sir, that statement disposes of the whole view the committee have taken.

The chairman of the committee, in the outset of his remarks, stated that, strictly speaking, none of these people would be entitled to this reward. Why not? There is no restriction. It would go to the soldier, it would go to the troop of soldiers, it would go to the civilian, or to the sheriff or constable, or to any number of persons who might make the arrest, but it is confined to the persons who shall arrest Davis. There is no denial by the committee or any one else that the arrest was made by Pritchard and a detachment of the fourth Michigan cavalry. They did make the arrest. He captured Jeff. Davis and lodged him in Fortress Monroe and came to Washington and reported the matter to the Secretary of War, who ordered a commission to examine in reference to the capture, and that commission declared he was entitled to the reward, with his detachment of the fourth Michigan cavalry.

This is a plain, unvarnished statement of the case. Now, Lieutenant Colonel Harnden says he is entitled to a part of the reward. He is not pretended to have captured Jeff. Davis, but it is claimed he acted as meritoriously as those who did. Very likely. I should say that the whole Army did the same thing. I am not about to find fault with anybody on this subject at all. It may be very true that he acted as meritoriously as Colonel Pritchard and his men. But the fact nevertheless remains that Colonel Pritchard did in fact make the capture.

Now, in my own State this question is one of great importance, and I feel it pretty hard that the Representatives of that State should be confined to twenty minutes in defending the claim of this officer and his men. But we must do the best we can in the limited time. We say that upon the plainest principles which are applied in all such cases this reward belongs to these men. But it is said in the argument of the committee—with some force it is true—that the allowance was made by the commission of the Secretary of War to all Pritchard's men, including those who were not present. But, sir, why? Simply because Pritchard and those who were present agreed to it. If they chose to take a reward which belonged to them and divide it with their comrades, that harms nobody and nobody has a right to complain. It does not alter the principle. I maintain that if five men of Colonel Pritchard's force without an officer had arrested Davis they would be entitled to the reward. Ay, if one man, and he a civilian, a man who had never served in the Army at all, had arrested Davis and brought him in, he would have been entitled to the entire reward. Can there be any doubt of it? Is it not entirely clear?

Now, sir, this was the view taken of this question by the military authorities. I will read very briefly from the letter of the Secretary of War of the 18th of April, 1866:

"The arrest of this chief traitor was effected on May 10 last, near Irwinsville, Georgia, by the fourth Michigan cavalry regiment, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel B. D. Pritchard, who started upon the pursuit with his command from Macon, Georgia, on May 7. The reward in this case, however, is also claimed by Lieutenant Colonel Henry Harnden, who, with his regiment, the first Wisconsin cavalry, also engaged in the pursuit, arrived upon the ground but a few minutes after the command of Colonel Pritchard had taken possession of the camp of Davis. Without discussing at length the charges which have been made by Colonel Harnden in regard to the course adopted by Colonel Pritchard upon this pursuit, it will be sufficient to observe that, upon a careful consideration of all the evidence, these charges are not deemed to be sustained in any particular; and it is concluded by the undersigned that the latter officer, both in the pursuit and the capture, acted in entire good faith toward the former, and cannot be held responsible for the momentary unfortunate collision which took place between the two commands."

A collision which sent two men of the fourth Michigan cavalry to the grave, but none of the Wisconsin men. If anybody has a right to complain of that collision I claim that it is ourselves, and if I felt disposed to enter into a statement of facts in that regard I am sure I could easily show that that statement of the Secretary of War is true. It is said further by the Secretary of War:

"At the same time it is proper to bear testimony to the valuable services upon this occasion of the first Wisconsin cavalry and its commander, and to note that while the Michigan regiment is deemed, under the terms of the offer, to be entitled to the reward, the activity and zeal displayed in the pursuit by the other must commend it to a hardly less honorable mention than its more fortunate ally."

I have not a word to say in opposition to that.

And now one word more upon this subject. The committee have put in the name of General Wilson for an award of $3,000. I am not about to quarrel with that now as it stands, but I ask what is the reason why, when the committee put in the name of General Wilson, they did not put in the name of Colonel Minty, who commanded the Michigan cavalry, or rather the division. It was under his order that Colonel Pritchard was acting. Now, if there is anything to be given to those who were concerned in the matter, why not include Colonel Minty, who gave the order?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts propose to have a vote now?

Mr. WASBURN, of Massachusetts. I propose to have a little time for discussion.

Mr. DRIGGS. Allow me five minutes.

Mr. UPSON. I understood the gentleman would allow my amendment to be voted upon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I stated expressly that I had no authority.

Mr. UPSON. I hope it will be allowed to be read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to that. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. STOKES. As there has been a good deal of controversy about this claim, I desire, as a member of the Committee of Claims, to state my position in regard to it. I have no feeling in regard to the claim of Colonel Pritchard or of Colonel Harnden. I have no respect for persons. An examination of the proof submitted to the committee satisfied my mind most clearly that the only way in which satisfaction can be given is to allow each man who was engaged in the capture his pro rata share according to the rules of the Army. I consider that Colonel Harnden and his men are just as much entitled to a portion of the $100,000 as are Colonel Pritchard and his men. The two regiments, or parts of regiments, were ordered and instructed to go in that direction. Their business was to capture Jeff. Davis. As has been truly remarked, Davis was then a criminal; the reward of $100,000 was offered for his capture, because it was alleged that he had been engaged in the murder of Mr. Lincoln, and therefore all the men, the colonels, the majors, the captains, and the privates were entitled to their pro rata share of the reward.

There was a lieutenant or sergeant with a squad of twenty or thirty men who were in Davis' camp in disguise; they traveled with Davis, dropping information that it was Davis and his band to negroes and other persons, so that our commanders could obtain information. We have awarded a portion of the payment to that lieutenant and his squad. The idea of sending out two different commands to capture one man and one party, and because a major, or captain and five or ten men came up with him first—the advanced guard or the men to the right or to the left—came up with him first, the whole amount of the reward is to go to that little squad of men is simply ridiculous. If you mean to do justice, you must give the reward to the men who were in the command and were moving in that direction at the time. I consider that the committee have done the best they could under the circumstances, and that is to divide the money equally between these parties. There is no other way to do justice. The idea of excluding Harnden and his men when they were upon the ground, and in fact did as much as Pritchard and his men is absurd.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. Let me ask the gentleman who it was that first struck the trail of Jeff. Davis and followed him for one or two days?

Mr. STOKES. I think it was Captain Yeoman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. It was Colonel Harnden.

Mr. STOKES. I am saying that Colonel Harnden rendered as much service in the matter and is as much entitled to reward as Colonel Pritchard or any of his men.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. I believe the man who first struck the trail was Captain Yeoman, and he communicated the fact to Colonel Harnden, who followed the trail for two days.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois. [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to make a statement with reference to the question as presented by the report of one of the officers. I have not time to elaborate very much. I have examined the report of the committee and I have examined the bill, and I am clearly of the opinion that it is the only equitable way to get at a distribution of this reward among the different soldiers that were engaged in the capture. The fact that any particular portion of these men captured Davis does not or would not in equity give them a right to all the money. General Wilson, I think, answers this proposition in his report a great deal better than I could answer it. The report that was first made from the War Department awarded this $100,000 to Colonel Pritchard and his regiment. General Wilson, in answering that, makes this statement which strikes me with great force, that if in justice Colonel Pritchard's whole regiment was entitled to a part of this reward, what justice would there be in excluding a part of Colonel Harnden's regiment when they were nearer capturing Davis than a portion of Pritchard's regiment. A part of Colonel Pritchard's regiment were stationed as a kind of picket some twenty or thirty miles off from the main regiment on watch at the different crossings of the Ocmulgee river, while Harnden's regiment were in close pursuit and close proximity to Jefferson Davis.

Now, if the portion of Colonel Pritchard's regiment, the greater portion of it which were thirty miles off acting as picket guards at the crossings of the Ocmulgee river, are entitled to a portion of this money, I would ask with what justice we can exclude Harnden's men who were in close pursuit of, and in close proximity to, Jefferson Davis? In equity there would be none. Hence I come to the conclusion that inasmuch as you cannot distribute this money according to the law of prizes—which would not be fair, giving the officers the greater portion, and very little to the men—I come to the conclusion that the committee have recommended what is just and equitable in the premises; that is, to divide the money fairly between both regiments, both having been in close pursuit of Jefferson Davis, the division to be made according to the pay-roll of the Army.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I should be very glad to have the vote now taken on this bill. But there are two or three members who insist that they must have a few minutes to speak. I will yield first for five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DRIGGS.]

Mr. DRIGGS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for the five minutes he has yielded to me. I urged him to allow me eight minutes, and even then the members from the State of Michigan would have had less than half an hour in which to present their view of this matter. As I have not time to make the remarks I would like to submit, I will merely ask the Clerk to read a letter from Colonel Pritchard on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALLEGON, December 26, 1867.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of the 16th instant I transmit herewith copies of my reports of the Davis capture, together with extracts from the reports of Colonel Minty to General Wilson setting forth the orders under which I acted in the pursuit and capture, together with such other statements and references as I think may be of use to you in preparing your argument. First I give you the orders as embodied in the official report of Colonel Minty, namely:

[Extract.]

"On the evening of the 7th instant the major general commanding directed me to make immediate arrangements to prevent the escape of Jefferson Davis across the Ocmulgee and Flint rivers, south of Macon.

"I already had pickets at all fords and ferries as far south as Hawkinsville. I directed Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, commanding fourth Michigan cavalry, to march at six o'clock p. m. with his regiment, move as rapidly as possible to Spalding, Irwin county, and there establish his headquarters, leaving pickets at all fords and ferries between Hawkinsville and that place and also to picket from there to the mouth of the Oconee river; but if he found that Davis had already crossed the Ocmulgee to follow and capture or kill him."

These orders were given to me verbally by Colonel Minty in person and from the maps which we then had before us of the country, Colonel Minty saying at the time that any orders which could be given would and could be only an outline of operations which it might be necessary to change or abandon entirely upon arriving upon the ground, and that I would be at liberty to make any change in the distribution of the forces that I might think best after arriving on the ground, and the entire details of operations were left wholly to my discretion with unlimited range in case of necessity. There can be no question or doubt in regard to the orders being sufficient to cover the whole confederacy if it became necessary in pursuit.

I left Macon at eight o'clock p. m. of May 7 and marched all night, halting on the morning of the 8th at nine o'clock and rested until ten o'clock p. m. in order to feed, groom, and rest the horses, having marched thirty-six miles. Moving on again I passed through Hawkinsville just at sunset, halting for the night three miles below, having marched fifty-one miles inside of twenty-four hours. I moved the command out on the morning of the 9th at five o'clock a. m. in the direction of Abbeville, where we arrived at three p. m. of the same day, having marched seventy-five miles from Macon. When about one mile out from Abbeville (and before I had met Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) I first learned of the passage of the Davis train over Brown's ferry the night before of a citizen, but could learn nothing definite in regard to the character of the train or parties with it further than that there were several wagons, the citizen denying that he had any definite knowledge of whose train it was. I continued to move on, and just as I was entering Abbeville was met by Colonel Harnden, first Wisconsin cavalry, accompanied by a single orderly. Colonel Harnden also gave me an account of the passage of the train through Abbeville as he had gathered it from the inhabitants of the town among whom it was no secret. He also stated that he had been following on the track of the train for some distance on the north side of the river with a detachment of the first Wisconsin cavalry, and that his men had gone on in the direction of Irwinesville and were from one and a half to two hours in advance. I asked him how many men he had; he replied that he had with him seventy or seventy-five men. I asked him if he thought his force sufficient, if not I would give him a detail from my regiment; he replied that he thought it ample.

During our conversation the subject of who probably was with the train was talked upon some extent, Colonel Harnden remarking that he was inclined to believe that Mrs. Davis was with it, as it was reported that there was a very lady-like appearing woman along, but expressly said that he did not think Davis was with the train, but believed that he was traveling on parallel roads with an escort, and communicated with the train from time to time. I asked Colonel Harnden how far he intended to march that night and he said he should press through to Irwinesville before he went into camp if the train went there, remarking at the time that it was very uncertain where the train would go, as it was in the habit of driving off from the road to camp sometimes several miles.

The question of a concert of action was also discussed, but it was apparent at once that no definite plan could be agreed upon, as both Colonel Harnden and myself were entirely unacquainted with the roads and country, and no agreement or understanding was entered into between Colonel Harnden and myself whatever, further than that each agreed that no definite arrangement could be made. I told Harnden in general terms what my orders were, and that I would continue to move on down the river and would act as circumstances might dictate. And when Colonel Harnden states in his reports that he understood or that I said that I should remain at Abbeville on the night of the 9th, he is mistaken, for during all the time I was in conversation with Colonel Harnden he was riding with me at the head of my regiment, and continued to ride with me until my command had passed full one half mile below Abbeville, and when he left me and struck across the woods to the road his command had taken he left my command still moving down the river with no preparation or intention of halting. These facts can be proved by a regiment if necessary. At the time Harnden left me neither he or myself had any knowledge of the roads by which I approached Irwinesville, and I did not learn of the roads myself until I had marched three miles below Abbeville, when I met a negro who was watching his master's wagon which was broken down in the road. This negro gave me more definite information than I had received before in regard to the character of the train and the parties with it, by describing the actions of those with the train. He said that at the time the train was crossing Brown's ferry, one mile and a half above Abbeville, they would not allow the ferryman to make a light even to make change, saying that they would pay him amply for his services, and did pay him a ten-dollar gold piece and a ten-dollar confederate note; also described the general movements of the company which convinced me that there were parties with the train whom they were desirous should not be seen.

I then set about inquiring about the roads, and learned that the road Colonel Harnden was on was the direct road to Irwinesville, and that there was another road leading into Irwinesville from the river road at a point fifteen miles below Abbeville, known as Wilcox mills. This road from Wilcox mills was a road running nearly in a direct line from Jackson-ville, on the north side of the Ocmulgee, to Irwinesville. As soon as I learned of this route to Irwinesville I became convinced that it was my duty to move on this road at once, for if Davis was moving on parallel roads it was very probable that he would be moving on this very road as its course lay on the most direct line from Augusta to Irwinesville, and that if Davis expected to meet the train there it would be the road he would undoubtedly approach Irwinesville on, and that if the train was pressed by Harnden it would undoubtedly break and scatter and drive on to any road which might offer any chance of escape, and in that case would be as apt to drive over on to the road I was on as any other. I had no idea at the time that it would be possible for me to reach Irwinesville before Colonel Harnden, as he did not have to exceed twenty-five miles to march, and his command, according to his own statements, was then full two hours on the way, while I would have to march full thirty-three miles after he left me at Abbeville. And the object and only expectancy I had when I determined to pursue by the road I did was that by Colonel Harnden shoving through on the direct road to Irwinesville, and my coming up at a later hour would place Davis or any other parties or trains which might be on the road between Wilcox mills and Irwinesville between the two commands, and thus increase the probabilities of capture, and if none of the parties were looking for were discovered I would be able to communicate with Colonel Harnden at Irwinesville, when we could then, perhaps, fix upon a plan for future operations, as he was then on the identical territory I was ordered to occupy. These and these alone were the reasons why I moved on to Irwinesville as I did, simply because I thought it my duty and an act of wisdom to move as I did. It was with no desire or intent to cut the corners of Colonel Harnden or to rob him of any of the fruits of his earnings, and I would sooner lose all that is or should be coming to me to-day of the reward, than take one cent from Colonel Harnden wrongfully, though poverty has always been my nearest guest.

I have thus given you as briefly as I could and make my statement as explicit as I desired. I would also refer you to the very strong language used by the military commission in determining the award, which you will find in the report from War Department to the Thirty-Ninth Congress, first session, entitled Executive Document No. 90, House of Representatives. Also to the endorsement of Major General Wilson on Colonel Harnden's report, to be found in report from War Department to Senate, Thirty-Ninth Congress, first session, Executive Document No. 64. Also to reports and affidavits herewith inclosed. I would also refer you specially to the affidavit of Lieutenant J. G. Dickinson, who was my adjutant, which is now in the hands of Mr. Urson, of which I have no copy, if I had I would send you one. And in conclusion will give you a statement of distances marched by my command from time of leaving Macon up to time of capture, namely: from Macon to camp three miles below Hawkinsville, fifty-one miles, marched in twenty-four hours, from eight o'clock p. m., May 7, to eight p. m., May 8; from camp to Abbeville, twenty-four miles; from Abbeville to Wilcox mills, fifteen miles; and from Wilcox mills to Irwinesville, eighteen miles; from Irwinesville to Davis camp, about one and a half miles; marched in twenty hours. Total distance marched from Macon to Davis camp by fourth Michigan cavalry, one hundred and nine and a half miles, inside of forty-four hours, including all halts.

For the full particulars of the collision with first Wisconsin, please see my reports and the affidavits of Lieutenants Boutelle and Purinton, inclosed.

Before closing, I would again express my gratitude for the interest you have always manifested in this troublesome and perplexing matter, and would earnestly ask that the thing may be brought to as speedy a close as possible.

I am, sir, very truly, your obedient servant,

B. D. PRITCHARD.

Hon. JOHN F. DRIGGS, Member of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I now yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not deem it necessary to occupy the attention of the House very long, in addition to the able report of the Committee of Claims and the statement of the case made by the chairman of that committee, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts.] Now, if the question was this, whether the first Wisconsin cavalry or the fourth Michigan cavalry were entitled to this reward, we should insist most decidedly that the reward was due to the first Wisconsin cavalry. And we insist further, that we can produce the proof to satisfy any reasonable man that, as between the two regiments, the first Wisconsin cavalry is entitled to the reward. But I am satisfied that the Committee of Claims, after patient investigation, have come to perhaps a correct adjustment of this matter. Certain it is that somebody is entitled to this reward. Jeff. Davis was captured; and the reward is due to his captors. But we are not disposed to be tenacious about the matter. We are willing to acquiesce in this settlement. Nevertheless, we claim that the first Wisconsin cavalry is entitled to the honor of the capture of Jeff. Davis. Now, inasmuch as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] has had read a statement from Colonel Pritchard, I ask to accompany it that the testimony of Colonel Harnden before the Committee of Claims, giving his account of the capture, be also read.

The statement was read as follows:

Henry Harnden, late lieutenant colonel of the first Wisconsin cavalry, being called before the congressional Committee of Claims, and being duly sworn, deposes and says: that on the 6th of May, 1865, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) was ordered to report in person at the headquarters of Brigadier General Croxton, commanding first division cavalry corps, military division of the Mississippi, at Macon, Georgia; that he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) did report forthwith as ordered, and received from General Croxton certain orders, to wit: To take one battalion of the first Wisconsin cavalry and proceed in search of Jefferson Davis; to march immediately: to go to Jeffersonville; from thence to Dublin; thence to go toward Millen, and on to the Savannah river, leaving detachments of men at the most important cross-roads; but in case that he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) obtained any information of said Jefferson Davis, then to pursue and capture him (Davis) if possible. That in obedience to such orders, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) did detail one battalion of his regiment, consisting of one hundred and forty-eight men and three officers, and began his march from Macon, Georgia, at six o'clock p. m., May 6, 1865, proceeding to Jeffersonville, distance about twenty-five miles; he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) left Lieutenant C. Hewitt, with thirty men, and proceeded with the balance of his command to Dublin, arriving about five o'clock p. m., May 7. Distance from Macon fifty-five miles.

The day was intensely hot and roads sandy; the men and horses were much exhausted. The command bivouacked near the ferry. During the night information, which was deemed reliable, was received by Lieutenant Colonel Harnden from a negro man that some wagons had passed during the day through the town, and that they had gone South on the river road. This information was confirmed yet later in the night by another negro, who stated that the party was that of Jefferson Davis and his wife. The negro further stated that he had heard one of said party addressed as President Davis and one of the ladies as Mrs. Davis, and that they had come across the Oconee river ferry, and left Dublin, going South, about twelve o'clock (noon) that same day, which was May 7, 1865. Acting upon this information, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) immediately detailed Lieutenant Lane, with forty-five men, to remain at Dublin and watch the ferry and patrol the cross-roads, starting himself with the balance of his command in pursuit of Davis.

On the outskirts of Dublin some delay was caused by the darkness and the difficulty in finding the right road, so that it was daylight before the pursuit was fairly commenced. When five miles from Dublin and at the crossing of Turkey creek, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) obtained information which rendered it almost certain that Jefferson Davis was with the party ahead. The pursuit was now pressed with vigor, as the trail of the wagon could be plainly seen. The country through which this day's march led was a wilderness of pine woods and swamps, with scarcely any inhabitants. At the time of leaving Turkey creek it commenced to rain and continued to fall heavily during the day. During a portion of the day the tracks of the wagons were lost, but by pressing a guide, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) was enabled to continue the pursuit through the swamps of the Alligator creek and on until after dark, when the command bivouacked on the borders of Gum swamp.

Before daylight, May 9, the pursuit was begun and continued to the Ocmulgee river, where a crossing was effected about noon that day at Brown's ferry. At this point it was ascertained that the Davis party had left at one o'clock that morning and gone in the direction of Abbeville, and to Abbeville the pursuit was continued, where it was ascertained that the Davis party had called at a house and inquired the way to Irwinesville, and the trail of the wagons led in that direction. They had passed before daylight. At this place a short halt was ordered to feed the horses with corn. Just as the command was leaving Abbeville, (the scouts had already gone on,) four men appeared in sight on the Hawkinsville road, dressed in the United States uniform. He (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) inquired of them who they were, and was informed that they belonged to the fourth Michigan cavalry, Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard commanding; and that Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, with his regiment, was advancing on the Hawkinsville road, and only a short distance away. He (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) ordered Lieutenant Clinton to press on after the Davis party, and rode himself, attended by his orderly, to meet Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard. That, at meeting Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) introduced himself, and inquired if Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard had any information in regard to Jefferson Davis, and was told by Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard that he had none. He (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) then gave to Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard all the information in his (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden's) possession in regard to Jefferson Davis, and informed him (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) that he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) with his command had struck the trail of said Davis and had been then two days in pursuit, and also that Davis, with a party and some wagons, had passed Abbeville that same morning and gone toward Irwinesville; and also that his (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden's) command had then gone on toward Irwinesville in pursuit.

He (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) further informed him (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) that there was another party of confederates with wagons on the other side of the river, and that they, the confederates, probably were a part of Jefferson Davis's party, and that they would most probably try to cross the river below. He (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) then informed him (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) that he (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) with his regiment were also out after Davis, but, up to that time, had heard nothing of said Davis, and also that he (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) had orders to encamp at Abbeville and patrol the Ocmulgee river and guard the ferries on said river. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) then parted with Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, and with his orderly hastened on and joined his (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden's) command, and continued the pursuit of Davis in the direction of Irwinesville until some time after dark, (probably about nine o'clock, p. m.;) when, coming to water, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) ordered a halt and the horses to be grazed for a short time (as there was no corn) and some food prepared for the men, with orders that no noise should be made, and for all to be ready to start at three o'clock in the morning.

At three o'clock a. m., May 10, the march was resumed. He (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) selected a sergeant and six picked men to lead the advance, and gave said sergeant particular instructions to proceed with caution, and to look out for the rebel pickets and report to him (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) instantly the first indications that might be discovered of the enemy.

After marching a mile, or possibly two, the advance was suddenly ordered, by a voice a few yards ahead of them, to halt and dismount, when, instead of its being obeyed by the sergeant, he endeavored to retreat. A heavy volley was fired upon them, (the sergeant and his party,) which was almost instantly followed by a second volley from the same unseen source, wounding three of the seven men composing the advance. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) then gave orders for his command to take the trot, dashing ahead at a gallop with ten men to reconnoiter, when another and third volley was fired upon the Wisconsin men. That at this time it was quite dark, and the opponents could only be seen by the fire from their guns. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) very soon formed a line, dismounting a part of his command, and pressed on the enemy vigorously, driving them into a swamp, which lay to the right of the first Wisconsin. At this time a large force of mounted men were seen approaching more to the left of the first Wisconsin men. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) ordered Sergeant How, of the first Wisconsin cavalry, with ten men, to pursue the dismounted force of the enemy, who had disappeared into the swamp aforementioned.

At this time it was getting to be light, and the enemy could be plainly seen. Brisk firing now took place between both parties, the enemy being gradually driven back. At this period of affairs Sergeant How came running to him, (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden,) saying that he (Sergeant How) had captured a prisoner, and that their opponents were the fourth Michigan cavalry. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) instantly gave orders to stop firing, which soon ceased on both sides. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) then rode a few yards and met Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard, and asked him (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) how he came to be there fighting them, (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden and his party.) Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard explained that after parting with Lieutenant Colonel Harnden the day previous, at Abbeville, he (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) had selected a portion of his best mounted men, and taking the river road, and then by the way of House mills, had arrived near Irwinesville, when learning that a wagon party was camped out on the Abbeville road a short distance, he had sent a lieutenant and party of men dismounted across on to that road in the rear of the wagon party's camp, and it was this party of his command that had fired upon them, (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden and his party;) and further, that while the fight was going on a portion of his (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard's) command had captured the wagon train near at hand. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) then inquired if Jefferson Davis was captured. That Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard replied that he did not know who was captured. That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) and Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard then rode in company across a narrow strip of swamp, a distance of about fifty yards, where they (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard and Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) found Jefferson Davis and family, with other officials of the so-called confederate government, and wagon train, in the hands of and guarded by a portion of the fourth Michigan cavalry. That after resting a couple of hours or so, and caring for the wounded, both commands began their return march to Macon, arriving on the 13th day of May, 1865.

That he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) further says that he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) had received no intimation from Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard or any one else that he (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard) intended to go to Irwinesville, or to pursue Jefferson Davis; but, on the contrary, was distinctly told by Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard that his (Lieutenant Colonel Pritchard's) orders were to camp at Abbeville and patrol the Ocmulgee river and guard the ferries; and further, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) says that when first fired upon, and all during the fight, he sincerely believed that his opponents were the escort of Jefferson Davis; and that the first intimation which he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) had of there being any Union troops nearer than Abbeville was from Sergeant How, of the first Wisconsin cavalry; and further, he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) says that the collision and capture of Jefferson Davis aforementioned occurred near Irwinesville, Irwin county, State of Georgia, and twenty-five miles south of Abbeville aforementioned. That upon his (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden's) return to Macon, Georgia, on the 13th day of May, 1865, he made an official report to General Croxton, from whom he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) received his orders, of his doings during the pursuit and capture of Jefferson Davis. That said report was forwarded through the proper channels to the Adjutant General of the Army, and said report is essentially the same and agrees with this statement.

And he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) further says that the collision with the fourth Michigan cavalry aforementioned, in his opinion, was not caused by any fault or negligence on the part of any member of the first Wisconsin cavalry; that the sergeant in command of the advance of the first Wisconsin cavalry acted as a soldier should always act under such circumstances, and that the distinct and heavy volleys were fired by the fourth Michigan cavalry before a shot was returned by the first Wisconsin cavalry, and that a constant firing was kept up by both parties from the time that the engagement commenced until he (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) ordered the firing to cease on the part of the first Wisconsin cavalry; and further, it is the firm belief of him (Lieutenant Colonel Harnden) that had not the first Wisconsin cavalry been fired upon and checked for a time, they (the first Wisconsin cavalry) would have been in the camp of Davis and effected his capture as soon or even sooner than it was effected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, after occupying a few moments, I will call for a vote on this question. I find that I was somewhat mistaken in my statement in relation to the action of the committee in the Thirty-Ninth Congress; but the gentleman from Michigan was altogether mistaken in the statement which he made. I knew that upon an examination of this question the majority of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and I thought the entire committee, were in favor of the same report that we have made at this session. I find upon an examination of the fact that just at the close of the session Mr. Hotchkiss, a member of that committee, made a report; but it did not come before the House as a report from the committee, and was never acted on as such. When the question came before the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] offered a substitute, striking from the bill all referring to the capture of Jeff. Davis, which was adopted by the House almost unanimously.

The gentleman from Michigan has said that this reward actually belongs to the person or persons who made the capture of Jeff. Davis. If that principle be adopted, we must throw aside completely the action of the commission appointed by the War Department. This the gentleman will not deny. To whom did that commission award this money? Not to the little squad of half a dozen men who surrounded Davis and actually made the capture. That commission awarded $10,000 to General Pritchard. Why? Did General Pritchard actually make the capture? Not at all. Did he arrive at the place where Davis was before Colonel Harnden did? Not at all; nothing of the kind is claimed. I say, then, to the gentleman from Michigan that if the persons who actually made the capture are entitled to this reward it must be paid to the handful of privates who surrounded him, and General Pritchard would not be entitled to one dollar, for he and Colonel Harnden arrived at the scene of the capture at the same moment. That fact is not denied.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman is mistaken. There is no such report and no such evidence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. That is the evidence sworn to before the committee; and it has never been denied by any witness that has appeared before the committee.

Mr. UPSON. I can show reports and affidavits to the contrary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. But the gentleman from Michigan says, "Give this reward to the persons who actually made the capture." Why, sir, more than one hundred of Pritchard's men were thirty-three miles distant from the scene of the capture when the capture was made. Can this money be spread out among those men? "But," says the gentleman from Michigan, "General Pritchard and his men have agreed to it." Sir, what right have they to say how this money shall be distributed? They are interested parties. It is for the War Department to determine who are entitled to this reward for the capture of Davis. Are the men who were patrolling the river thirty-three miles distant, who were not within a day's march of the scene of the capture, entitled to receive a portion of this reward? We say they are not; but we say the money should be distributed among each of these bodies of men who contributed to the capture, all who were in the immediate vicinity and ready to seize Davis; and we care not if one body of men was five minutes ahead of the other. Even the affidavit which has been read by the gentleman from Michigan shows simply General Pritchard's party had arrived at the place where Davis was only five minutes previous to the guns being fired.

Members will bear in mind that Colonel Harnden and his party were then immediately on the trail, having been engaged in the pursuit night and day for three days. The night before the capture they encamped to await the light of the morning; and the result shows that Pritchard's men started a little too early, for had they waited until the dawn of morning the lives which were lost on account of their starting so early would have been saved. It so happens that Pritchard and his men, starting a few moments earlier than the other party, arrived at the scene of the capture, as is claimed by their own affidavits, only five minutes before this regiment that had been on the trail for two or three days night and day.

Mr. DRIGGS. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Will this House say that because Pritchard's men happened to arrive there and succeed in making the actual capture a few moments before the other party arrived, therefore all this money should go to them? If so, place it upon that principle, and you will give every dollar of it to the little squad of men who actually made the capture and shut off Pritchard and his one hundred and twenty-eight men who were not there at the actual capture, but were thirty-three miles distant upon the banks of the river. We say in our award that no part of this reward for the capture of Jeff. Davis shall be given to the forty-five men belonging to Harnden's regiment that he left behind at Jefferson City.

Mr. DRIGGS. I wish to correct a misstatement the gentleman has made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman, and when the proper time comes I will yield again.

Mr. DRIGGS. I think the gentleman unintentionally misrepresents the facts in this case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. When I come to the proper time I will yield to the gentleman. There were different squads of Harnden's men in different sections of the country in pursuit of Jefferson Davis. Part of Pritchard's men were thirty-three miles distant patrolling the banks of the river to prevent the escape of Jefferson Davis. They were not present at all at the time of his capture. They were all engaged in the pursuit of Davis and making their best efforts for his capture. We have, therefore, attempted to divide this money equally among those who seemed to be most meritorious. From the nature of the case there is no one who can stand up and say, "I did more than another."

Mr. DRIGGS. I understand the gentleman to state that the affidavit read by my colleague admits there were only five minutes between the arrival of the Wisconsin party and the detachment of the fourth Michigan regiment. Let me say to the gentleman he is mistaken. It says distinctly they were there an hour or an hour and a half before the Wisconsin troops.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I am not mistaken. The affidavit sustains me. Here is what I said: General Harnden claims his men, if they had not been hindered by Pritchard's men and kept back, would have made the capture sooner than Pritchard's men. The affidavit states that Pritchard's men had actually made the capture five minutes before the sound of the guns was heard.

Mr. UPSON. The gentleman is mistaken about the action last session.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I think not. The then chairman of the committee [Mr. DELANO] is here and can correct me if I am wrong. He offered a substitute which was adopted. It only referred to the capture of Booth and had nothing to do with the capture of Jeff. Davis.

Mr. UPSON. I had examined the House Journal, and was of the impression the amendment was made after discussion and was objected to in the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. What becomes of my amendment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I did not yield for it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. DRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES POSTAL TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1415) to incorporate the United States Postal Telegraph Company, and to establish a postal telegraph system; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATIONS OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1416) to provide certain regulations as to the public debt; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

TERMINAL PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 380) relative to the Terminal Central Pacific Railway Company; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bills and joint resolution were severally referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to sundry pension bills, reported that the committee recommended that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 522) granting a pension to W. W. Cunningham;

A bill (H. R. No. 670) granting a pension to the widow and children of Andrew Holman; and

A bill (H. R. No. 770) granting a pension to John H. Finley.

The committee further reported that the Senate recede from its amendments to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 456) granting a pension to the minor children of Pleasant Stoops;

A bill (H. R. No. 521) to place the name of Solomon Zachman on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. No. 666) granting a pension to Henry H. Hunter;

A bill (H. R. No. 675) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of Cornelius L. Rice; and

A bill (H. R. No. 676) granting a pension to Thomas Connelly.

The committee further reported that the Senate recede from some of its amendments and the House recede from its disagreement to other Senate amendments to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 518) granting a pension to George F. Gorham, late a private in company B, twenty-ninth regiment Massachusetts volunteer infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 525) granting a pension to Jeremiah T. Hallett;

A bill (H. R. No. 661) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of William Craft;

A bill (H. R. No. 662) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of George R. Waters;

A bill (H. R. No. 663) granting a pension to Cyrus K. Wood, the legal representative of Cyrus D. Wood;

A bill (H. R. No. 664) granting a pension to the minor children of Charles Gouler;

A bill (H. R. No. 669) granting a pension to the widow and minor children of Myron Wilkow;

A bill (H. R. No. 677) granting a pension to the minor children of James Heatherly;

A bill (H. R. No. 771) granting a pension to John H. Lay;

A bill (H. R. No. 773) granting a pension to William H. McDonald; and

A bill (H. R. No. 825) granting a pension to John W. Hughes.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

DAMAGED ARMS AND ORDNANCE.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 292) directing the Secretary of War to sell damaged or unserviceable arms, ordnance, and ordnance stores was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment, which was to insert after the word "stores" the word "now," so as to read "now in possession of the War Department," was concurred in.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The House resumed, as the regular order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, which had been postponed till to-day.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. There are but two or three amendments—but one, I think, of any importance—to be acted upon. I will simply say—for I do not wish to provoke discussion—that that one is what is called the twenty per cent. proposition. It is to be reduced now from five to ten per cent. below the twenty per cent., making in all, as I am informed by the Department, about one third the amount contained in the former bill. I have simply one other word to say. Every employé of this House is now, under the various laws passed during this session, entitled to twenty per cent. additional compensation.

A MEMBER. Some of them forty.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I am speaking of the lowest. These civil employés who alone have been excluded, we now move to provide for in this bill. I will not make a speech. The House understands it so well it will act according to its own judgment. I demand the previous question on all the amendments.

Mr. KELSEY. I suppose I am entitled to a vote on some amendments that were proposed to this bill and were not adopted in Committee of the Whole. This bill was considered in Committee of the Whole by a general agreed consent order, and it was that where a quorum did not vote upon an amendment offered and it was not adopted by the committee a vote could be had upon it in the House. Am I right in that?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not exactly correct. The Chair does not rule in regard to what occurred in Committee of the Whole unless he happened to be present. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was in the chair and he overruled the very point of order and had the reporter's notes read as to the agreement made at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. KELSEY. I understand that I am entitled to a vote upon amendments which were proposed and not adopted in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. KELSEY. Then I raise the point of order that this bill has not been considered in Committee of the Whole at all.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to say a word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must decide the point of order.

Mr. KELSEY. I desire the privilege of stating my point of order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. May I say to the gentleman from New York that I understood the matter as he did, and made that point in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair overruled me, very much to my disgust, of course. [Laughter.] But I want to say that the point of order was decided in that way.

Mr. KELSEY. If I am not right in claiming the privilege of a vote on those amendments I make the point of order that this bill has never been considered in Committee of the Whole at all. It was not competent, as I claim, for the House to refer this bill to the Committee of the Whole and then constitute a Committee of the Whole out of a less number than a quorum. Both of those things were done by order of the House, if the ruling of the Chair is correct; and I now insist either that the bill shall be sent to the Committee of the Whole for consideration or that we shall have a right to vote in the House on the amendments that were then offered and were rejected when no quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on two grounds. The first is that under the rule, which will be found in the Digest, a point of order cannot be renewed after it has once been settled and decided even by suggesting additional reasons, and this is the precise point made by the gentleman from New York in Committee of the Whole. The second ground on which the Chair overrules the point of order is that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole reported the bill to the House with various amendments. That was entered on the Journal and the Journal was approved the next day. That is the record, and the gentleman cannot deny the record in sustaining the point of order. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. MULLINS. Another point of order. By what political right—

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of order.

Mr. MULLINS. The point of order is, how does the gentleman from Pennsylvania get his amendment in and cut off the other amendments that were pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered this amendment on Friday last. When the bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union he renewed the amendment which he had offered in the Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] stated that he reserved a point of order upon it, and the Chair stated that it could not be reserved, because the rule states that amendments of this character must be first considered in Committee of the Whole, and this precise amendment had been considered in Committee of the Whole and could, therefore, be offered in the House.

Mr. MULLINS. Then I ask that all the amendments that were adopted in Committee of the Whole to this amendment be carried with it.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields for that purpose, the gentleman from Tennessee can offer any amendments.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I do not distinctly understand the gentleman, and therefore I think we had better go on. [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. He understands too well to admit it.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were then concurred in.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I now ask unanimous consent to submit an amendment to this bill; to insert after line seventy-four the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to give validity to any treaty or part thereof, which otherwise would be invalid.

The bill under consideration contains this provision, to which I propose my amendment:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the balance due for surveys of land embraced in the Osage Indian reservation, and the Cherokee neutral lands, in the State of Kansas, under contracts dated, respectively, August 14 and 16, 1866, (the said sum to be returned to the Treasury out of proceeds of sales of said lands, as provided by treaties with said Indians,) $27,980 51.

The amendment I have submitted is designed to shut out any claim of a legislative recognition of the validity of sales of public lands made in pursuance of treaties with Indian tribes. I have constantly denied the validity of such sales, and I presented some of the reasons in a speech I had the honor to make on the 21st of March last. Since that time the House has sustained the opinions I then expressed by a joint resolution passed June 8, in these words:

Joint resolution relative to the lands of the Cherokee and Great and Little Osage Indians.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to withhold the issuing of patents to the purchasers of lands heretofore sold, or which may hereafter be sold, under and by virtue of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, concluded on the 19th day of July, 1866, and the treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage Indians, concluded on the 29th day of September, 1865, or under any Indian treaty which may hereafter be concluded, until otherwise provided for by law.

Again, on the 18th of June, the House denied the validity of such sales by a resolution adopted in relation to the Osage Indian treaty of May 27, which resolution is in these words:

"Resolved, (as the sense of this House,) That the objects, terms, conditions, and stipulations of the aforesaid pretended treaty are not within the treaty-making power, nor are they authorized either by the Constitution or laws of the United States; and therefore this House does hereby solemnly condemn the same, and does also earnestly but respectfully express the hope and expectation that the Senate will not ratify the said pretended treaty."

I think it may be said that so far as this House is concerned the purpose is settled to prohibit the sale of the public lands under treaties with the Indian tribes. The amendment I have offered is a mere affirmation of that doctrine, a provision by way of abundant caution, deaying that Congress shall give any legislative recognition of the validity of such sales.

The SPEAKER. The amendment requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think this amendment had better be considered in the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I would have no objection to the amendment if it did not look so ludicrous.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] agreed to allow my amendment to be offered in the House, and on the faith of that agreement I did not offer it in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman says that, all I have to say is that such was not my understanding with regard to it. I did not understand it in the same way at all. But as he has made the statement in the House, and it goes upon the record, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I renew the objection.

The next amendment was one offered by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to add to the bill the following:

City of Washington:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the chief engineer of the Army shall reimburse to the corporation of the city of Washington for expenses incurred in improving the property of the General Government in said city, under provisions of an act of May 5, 1864, and in accordance with the recommendations of the Secretary of War, in book of estimates of appropriations, pages 244 and 245, $296,943 88: Provided, That section fifteen of an act entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Washington and to repeal all acts heretofore passed for that purpose," approved May 15, 1820; and section three of an act approved May 5, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," are hereby repealed; and no improvements of the streets, alleys, avenues, or other property of the United States in the city of Washington shall hereafter be made until an appropriation shall have been made therefor, and such appropriation, when made, shall be expended under the direction of the chief engineer of the Army.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire how this amendment comes before the House?

The SPEAKER. It was offered on Monday last under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. If my memory serves me correctly this amendment was a part of the original bill. In Committee of the Whole, by the interposition of an objection, the proviso was stricken from the bill as being improperly there. An amendment was then moved to strike out all that part of the bill to which the proviso was attached, which amendment prevailed in Committee of the Whole. I would inquire if that amendment has been acted on by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has reported to the House all the amendments made by the Committee of the Whole. Those parts of a bill which are stricken out on points of order are never reported, because they should never have been in the bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Certainly; I am aware of that. But has the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, to strike out the part of the bill to which the objectionable proviso was attached, been submitted to and acted upon by the House?

The SPEAKER. All of the amendments reported to the Committee of the Whole have been concurred in by the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is this amendment divisible? It contains two distinct substantive propositions.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not divisible, having been offered under a suspension of the rules.

The amendment was then agreed to.

The next amendment was one submitted by Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, under a suspension of the rules, to add to the bill the following:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no contract shall be entered into for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement whatever, which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than the amount in the Treasury appropriated for the specific purpose, and no person shall be employed by any Department of the Government unless an amount of money shall have been previously appropriated sufficient to pay all such persons. And if any officer of the Government shall contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose, or shall employ any persons in any Department of the Government unless an appropriation sufficient to pay all such persons shall have been previously made, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years, and shall pay a fine of $2,000, and shall thereafter be deemed incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

Mr. MAYNARD. The penalty proposed by this additional section should be limited to acts knowingly or wittingly committed; not to those committed through ignorance or inadvertence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask consent to modify my amendment; so that the portion referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] shall read as follows:

And if any officer of the Government shall knowingly contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose, or shall knowingly employ any persons in any department of the Government unless an appropriation sufficient to pay all such persons shall have been previously made, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

No objection was made; and the amendment was modified accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. At the present time the whole body of the officers of the Government are running into the new fiscal year ending June 30, 1869. Now, under the strict letter of this amendment, would not each one of those officers be liable to punishment for continuing to exercise the functions of their offices during that portion of this new fiscal year for which no appropriations have yet been made?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Of course not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know about that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am surprised that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] should seek to defeat this amendment, to which no one else makes objection.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no desire to defeat it; I merely wish to have obviated an objection that may arise under it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is any objection of the kind it can be remedied in the Senate. I think it the most important provision of law that has ever been presented to Congress for its consideration.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois moved to reconsider the various votes taken on agreeing to the amendments; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] informs me that I mistook the purport of the amendment which he sought to offer a few moments ago. I withdraw my objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be again read, and if there be no objection will be considered as agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line seventy-four, insert the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to give validity to any treaty or part thereof which otherwise would be invalid.

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next question is upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as a new section:
Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid, to the same classes of officers and other persons in the civil service of the United States Government at Washington embraced in the joint resolution of Congress entitled "Joint resolution giving additional compensation to certain employees in the civil service of the Government at Washington," passed February 28, 1867, an additional compensation on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or where no salary is fixed by law, upon their pay respectively, from and after the 30th day of June, 1867, to the 30th day of June, 1868; including, also, such persons as have been employed in any capacity in any of the Departments, and the watchmen on the Dome of the Capitol and in the Capitol grounds, the inspector of marble, and the foreman of mechanics at work on the Capitol extension and the watchmen in said extension, whether inside or out, and to the employees of the jail; and to include not only those now in service, but those who have at any time during said year been in service, as follows:

To all those whose annual compensation does not exceed $1,400 an increase of fifteen per cent. upon the amount of their compensation.

To all those whose annual compensation does not exceed $1,600, but does exceed $1,400, an increase of twelve and a half per cent. thereupon.

To all those whose annual compensation does not exceed $1,800, but does exceed $1,600, an increase of ten per cent. thereupon.

And a sum sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BENJAMIN. On that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 66, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnes, Brooks, Cake, Chandler, Cobb, Dixon, Driggs, Egleckly, Eldridge, Farnsworth, French, Garfield, Grossbrenner, Golladay, Higby, Hinds, Hopkins, Jencks, Johnson, Thomas L. Stevens, Stone, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aukon, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—78.

So the amendment was rejected.

During the roll-call, Mr. ROSS said: On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD.] He would have voted for the amendment and I against it.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 420) to incorporate the Connecticut Avenue and Park Railway Company, in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 1068) to provide for certain claims against the Department of Agriculture; and

An act (H. R. No. 650) to amend act of 3d of March, 1865, providing for the construction of certain wagon-roads in Dakota Territory.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar. This is private bill day, and there are a number of bills on the Private Calendar which ought to be considered.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] has priority, under the rule, to be found on page 151 of the Digest, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union may be entertained on private-bill day; but the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House takes precedence."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 38.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. ELDRIDGE in the chair.

RICHARD CHENERY.

The first business upon the Private Calendar was Senate joint resolution No. 40, to provide for the payment of the claim of Richard Chenery.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is this objection day?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then the gentleman's vocation is gone. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that joint resolution be passed over for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNTIES FOR MISSOURI TROOPS

The next business upon the Private Calendar was House joint resolution No. 147, placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties.

Mr. McCLURG. The same subject has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it will come up in another shape. I move, therefore, that it be passed over.

The motion was agreed to.

IRON-CLAD CONTRACTORS.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was Senate bill No. 307, for the relief of certain Government contractors.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Let it be read.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Secor & Co., and Perine, Secor & Co., the sum of $115,539 01; to Harrison Loring, $38,513; to the Atlantic Iron Works, of Boston, Massachusetts, $4,852 58; to Aquilla Adams, $4,852 58; to M. F. Merritt, the sum of $4,852 58; to Tomlinson, Harteepee & Co., $15,171; to Harlan & Hollingsworth, the sum of $38,513; and to Poole & Hunt, the sum of $3,694 81; being the amount found to be due to each of the parties herein respectively named by the Secretary of the Navy under an act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery," approved March 2, 1867, which shall be in full discharge of all claims against the United States on account of the vessels upon which the board made the allowance, as per their report, under the act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, the circumstances of this case will be recollected by the members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. We had what was called an "iron-clad bill" that came before the Committee of Claims. It was before that committee at both sessions of Congress. The committee were of the opinion that it ought not to pass. It gave to these contractors twelve per cent. on the contract price for the vessels they built. The committee were of the opinion that if the Government had, by alterations of plans or delays, caused loss to these contractors it should be reimbursed to them. We believed the Government was bound to that extent. So far as the increase of price of material, &c., is concerned, which would apply to all the contractors of the country, we believed the Government could not be held bound. Accordingly, the Committee of Claims reported back that bill with a resolution, the terms of which were as follows: that a board should be appointed by the Navy Department, before which board should appear all these contractors, to ascertain whether any of the increased price of these various vessels had been caused by the Government on account of alterations or delays which had not been paid for by the Government; and if they could show that on account of the action of the Government, not provided for in the contracts, alterations had been made increasing the cost to the contractors, which had not been paid for, on that point this board should report to this Congress and this Congress would act upon it. The result was that the Navy Department appointed a board, notified all these various contractors—forty-eight in number—to appear before them, and, on the basis of that resolution, to show any claim they might have for additional compensation. They accordingly appeared, and after an examination it was found that but eight out of the forty-eight contractors were entitled to additional compensation, the aggregate amount being some two hundred thousand dollars. All the rest of the contractors being entitled to nothing.

The board made their report to Congress. The Senate examined it, acted upon and confirmed it by a joint resolution which, after having passed that body, came before the Committee of Claims of the House. That committee examined it and unanimously reported that the resolution ought to pass, and for this reason: those of us who opposed what was called the omnibus bill did so upon the ground that a resolution of the House upon the subject had been adopted. Now, that board has been appointed by the Navy Department, and the result of the action of the board is the joint resolution now before us. Believing it to be right and just, and upon the basis of the resolution which the committee of the last Congress reported, and which this House adopted, we unanimously report this joint resolution with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to put a question right here. I desire to know whether any portion of this appropriation is for extra pay for the iron-clads Catawba and Oneota?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No, sir; those contractors receive nothing in this bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I see the names of the contractors of those vessels in this bill. I ask the gentleman what vessels it is for which this extra compensation is allowed? One of the names I see is Secor & Co.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Swift & Co., I understand, made the vessels to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Secor is one of the parties.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Not at all; he is not connected with Swift & Co.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the gentleman will look at the testimony taken by the Retrenchment Committee in connection with the sale of these vessels he will find that Secor is a member of that firm.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state to this House that we have spent many days' time in the last Congress, and much time in this, in examining this matter, and Secor & Co. had nothing to do with Alexander Swift & Co., and nothing to do with these vessels. I know what the gentleman refers to, but it has no connection with this matter. Secor & Co. never were interested with Swift & Co. either directly or indirectly. All the gentleman can show, so far as Swift & Co. are concerned, is that they made a trade with the Government for these vessels and proposed to sell them to the Government of Peru, and that that Government, feeling that they were unacquainted with Swift & Co., and wanting some one to indorse them, got the indorsement of Secor & Co. Knowing that they were old manufacturers, they said to the agent of Swift & Co., "If you can get Secor & Co. to indorse the bond that you are to give for the performance of your contract, we will make the contract with you." Accordingly, Swift & Co. got the indorsement of Secor & Co. But, I repeat, Secor & Co. are not interested either directly or indirectly in either of these iron-clads nor with Swift & Co., and never have been.

But what I am saying is this: many of these contractors do not desire this resolution passed. Why? Because that under the original board the sum of $2,300,000 was awarded to these men as the cost of the vessels above the contract price, and the old omnibus bill of the Senate gave them $1,500,000.

Mr. DELANO. One million eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. These contractors agreed to go before the board appointed by the Navy Department and submit their claims on the basis of our resolution. They have done so, and the result of the action of that board is that forty out of the forty-eight get nothing. Accordingly the contractors generally would prefer that this bill should not pass, but the committee were of the opinion, as we had offered that resolution and agreed to stand upon it, and as the doings of this board seemed to be just, so far as they were concerned, that this money was due to these men and that we ought to report this bill. It is for the interest of the Government to act upon it and to stand by our own resolution, and I cannot see how any member of Congress—I care not who he is and where he comes from—who looks to the interests of the Government and knows the trouble and difficulty we have had with these cases, can fail to see the necessity of carrying out our contract and standing upon that resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman what is the difference between the original Senate bill and the present award? How much do we save between the two bills?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The original bill gave $1,500,000.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. One million eight hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Yes, $1,800,000; and this gives a little over two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the several sums hereby appropriated shall be accepted by the several parties in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States arising out of the construction of vessels by the several parties herein named.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield for that amendment. There is a provision attached to this bill by the Senate that if the contractors receive this award it is to be in full.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that is not very fully stated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. That question was discussed in the Senate.

Mr. PIKE. Let the last clause of the bill be read.

Mr. ALLISON. My idea is that if the contractors receive this amount it is to be a final settlement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I ask the Clerk to read the last clause of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Which shall be in full discharge of all claims against the United States on account of the vessels upon which the board made allowances as per their report under act of March 2, 1867.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. I want to say to the committee that in the Thirty-Eighth Congress this whole subject came before the Committee on Naval Affairs of which I was then a member. It was then an omnibus claim. All these iron-clad contractors combined together and presented a united claim of $7,000,000. We looked into these claims and we found the truth to be that they had made their contracts with the Secretary of the Navy, built their vessels and got their pay according to their contracts. Not only so, but they had afterward charged for extra work, and brought in their bills and received their pay for extra work. Now, what was this $7,000,000 for? It was for an alleged claim against the Government because the materials and labor which entered into these iron-clads had increased in price after they had made their contracts, and they, therefore, did not make as much money as they supposed they would. Now, if these claims that are about to be passed upon are for increased price of labor or increased price of materials, I object to paying them, because we shall never get through paying such claims. But if they are claims for delay on the part of the Government in enabling them to carry out their contracts, why then I will go with the gentleman in paying them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will recollect that the committee rejected these claims on the grounds which he has stated, and simply reported a resolution that if they could show that the action of the Government had caused delay, and that they had not been paid for the delay and the alterations which the Government had caused, and which were not provided for in the contracts, they might do so. And that is all this bill proposes to pay. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. PIKE. I merely wish to remind the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] of the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs at the time to which he has referred. He and I coincided and acted together, but a majority of the committee reported in favor of those claims.

Mr. SPALDING. Oh, I beg your pardon. In the first instance there was a majority with us, but from day to day they turned over to the other side.

Mr. PIKE. A majority of the committee, through Mr. Brandegee, of Connecticut, reported in favor of the claims to a very large amount.

Mr. SPALDING. At first they were opposed to them.

Mr. PIKE. I cannot say about that. I am only speaking of the report of the majority of the committee. The minority of the committee were quite willing to have accepted a proposition of this kind, and would have been glad to have got off in this way. Although they thought some amount was due, they did not think it was right to grant so large an amount. I would be glad to get rid of these claims by the passage of this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. DELANO. I feel anxious that this bill should pass; and I think if the House will listen to the history of this matter there will be no difficulty about it. There was originally introduced in the Senate, at the close of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, a resolution which was adopted—

Mr. PIKE. During the extra session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress...

Mr. DELANO. I am corrected. A resolution was adopted appointing a committee to inquire into the claims of certain contractors for the construction of iron-clads during the war. Under that resolution forty-eight contractors came forward and had their accounts and claims examined by the committee. And according to my recollection that committee reported in favor of appropriating about two million five hundred thousand dollars to satisfy these forty-eight claims. Besides those forty-eight claimants there stood behind them an indefinite number—I do not know how many more—who did not come before the first naval board established by the Senate. But they stood ready to come forward the moment a principle was adopted which would let them in.

As I said, the Naval Committee reported upon the claims of these forty-eight contractors to the amount of $2,500,000. A bill was introduced in the Senate, based on that report, which resulted in the passage by the Senate of a bill allowing about one million eight hundred thousand dollars to these forty-eight contractors. The $7,000,000 alluded to by my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] embraces the claims of the large number of contractors who stood back ready to come in with their claims whenever the principle was adopted which would allow them to come in. The bill appropriating $1,800,000 for the benefit of the forty-eight contractors came to this House and was referred to the Committee of Claims. Upon examination we found that it rested upon this theory: that, in consequence of the war, prices for labor and materials had advanced, and as the advance had been occasioned by the inflation of the currency by the action of the Government to put down the rebellion, therefore the Government was responsible for that result, and ought to pay enough more to meet the advance in prices.

The committee repudiated that theory, and adopted as a rule for all these cases substantially this: that where by action of the Government, causing a delay in the construction of a vessel, or an alteration in the form of the structure, any damage or loss had resulted to the contractor, or any increase of expense had ensued, then in those cases, and in those only, the Government would be responsible in justice and in equity. A joint resolution was introduced as a substitute for the Senate bill referred to us, in which we set forth the rule I have stated, and also directed the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a new commission to examine into the claims of these forty-eight claimants, and all others that might present claims on the basis I have stated. That commission was appointed and proceeded to act, and found that out of the forty-eight claimants to which I have alluded, there were only eight who had meritorious claims. And this bill is based on that report, making an aggregate of about two hundred thousand dollars. Now, it seems to me that it is right that this amount should be paid. It seems to me that it is judicious to pay it, because it will be saying to those contractors, "We live up to the principle which we have declared to be right." It seems to me that we will be also saying at the same time, when we pay this amount, that we do not intend to go back and re-examine those claims on the basis that they are entitled to damages for the increase of prices of labor and materials caused by the inflation of the currency.

I regard the passage of this bill as an act of justice in these cases and as necessary to protect the Government against the presentation of these claims hereafter. If we now recede from the contract that we virtually made when we established in the Thirty-Ninth Congress the rule that we would make compensation where damages had resulted from the action of the Government; if we fail to comply with that rule we open this whole matter, and these claims will be pressed upon us hereafter, when, judging the future from the past, no man can tell how much may be allowed. I have made a simple statement of facts, which I hope will induce the House to pass this bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] to yield to me that I may offer an amendment and make some remarks upon it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman five minutes. I cannot permit him to offer an amendment; but I am willing it shall be read.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I desire to offer is to strike from the bill all that portion relating to Secor & Co., Perine, Secor & Co., and M. F. Merritt. I will give my reasons for proposing to strike out the names of these parties.

It will be recollected that this House a short time ago instructed the joint select Committee on Retrenchment to investigate the sale of the iron-clads Oneota and Catawba. That investigation has been made, and the report of the committee in relation to the sale of those vessels has been laid before this House. I presume gentlemen have not given much attention to that report; but I will say that it discloses one of the most gigantic frauds ever perpetrated upon this Government.

One of the first things that the committee endeavored to ascertain was, to whom were those vessels sold? Ostensibly they were sold to the firm of Alexander Swift & Co. We desired to ascertain who constituted that firm. I send to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a part of the evidence upon that point.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Question. The question now simply is, Who are your associates in the firm? That is all I am now asking.

"Answer. You mean the firm of Alexander Swift & Co.? Mr. Merritt is not a member of that firm.

"Question. I ask who else besides yourself, Merritt, and Swift are concerned in the firm of Alexander Swift & Co., either as partners, or as holding the anomalous condition that you describe yourself and Mr. Merritt to hold?

"Answer. The firm of Alexander Swift & Co. was composed of Mr. Seth Evans and Mr. Swift. They started the manufacture of iron under that firm name several years ago, and it has been continued ever since. Mr. Evans went out I think in 1864, but the name of the firm has been continued right along. Nobody but Mr. Swift and myself have been since connected with the house of Alexander Swift & Co., proper, but I have not been a partner, as I have explained to you my position. As connected with Alexander Swift & Co. in the sale of these ships there are some other parties.

"Question. Associates?

"Answer. Yes, sir; associates.

"Question. Who are they?

"Answer. Do you insist upon my answering the question?

"Question. Certainly.

"Answer. Mr. Secor.

"Question. Of New York?

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. What is his first name?

"Answer. Zeno.

"Question. Anybody else?

"Answer. Charles and James Secor, I suppose, are associated with him in their business?

"Question. Anybody else?

"Answer. Not directly.

"Question. What do you mean by that?

"Answer. Mr. Swift's son has a little interest in the business, which I did not think of at the time; but there is no party of any account."

Mr. BENJAMIN. That testimony discloses that these Secors were members of the firm of Alexander Swift & Co., who, by means of a system of chicanery, the like of which has rarely been known in the history of this Government, got these two iron-clads from the Government for $755,000, when at the time of the purchase they had a contract to sell them for $2,000,000. These iron-clads are down in New Orleans today. They have been refused a clearance and cannot sail from that port. This committee has reported that sale was fraudulent and void. Now, sir, when we have a large unsettled account against Merritt and Secor for a large sum of money I do object to appropriating this sum to reimburse them, or rather to pay them an additional sum for their work, and that, too, when they have been the perpetrators of so great a fraud as this. I hope, therefore, I will be allowed to offer the amendment I have indicated, and I hope it will be adopted so as to strike out Secor and Merritt.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not yield for the amendment. As I have said already, Secor is not one of the firm at all. It has been so expressly stated again and again. Neither Secor nor Merritt is a member of the firm of Swift & Co. But so far as that matter is concerned it has nothing to do with this case whatever. I understand the only connection Secor & Co. had with that transaction, and so it was understood by the Government, was, in order to carry out the contract, they simply indorsed the bond and certified Alexander Swift & Co. were good men to carry out the contract, that they were reliable men. But it has nothing to do with this case. Nothing, sir, has been allowed on those vessels. The contractors of those vessels do not receive a dollar. But, sir, suppose what the gentleman says to be true, has that anything to do with this claim?

Mr. WELKER. Does not the bill the gentleman has reported pay Mr. F. Merritt

$4,852 58? I wish to ask what this allowance is made to Mr. F. Merritt for? With my colleague on the Committee on Retrenchment, I was not aware he was the builder of any boats to entitle him to this sum of nearly five thousand dollars.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. It is the allowance on an iron boat he built for the Government, not an iron-clad. This is the allowance on that boat.

Mr. WELKER. Has the gentleman the name of the vessel?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I have not. I have heard it but cannot now turn to the papers.

Mr. WELKER. I should like to have it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. This is a wholly separate matter. My opinion is, and I say it frankly, with all the gentleman's ingenuity he has failed to bring the least just charge against these gentlemen, Secor & Co. It is very easy in this House for any man to get up and assail the character of the best men and of the best firms of this country; but it is not so easy for those firms or for individuals holding high position in business to show those charges are all false. And now, sir, I say, from the information I have, that I do not believe there is a better, purer, abler, more enterprising firm in the whole country than that of the Messrs. Secor & Co. Notwithstanding all the gentleman has said I believe, from the information I have and from what I have seen, that it will turn out these men have acted purely and fairly in all their transactions with the Government. But I care not to go into matters now which neither directly or indirectly have anything to do with this bill. I wish to say, sir, that these contractors for iron-clads, these builders of iron-clads did more to put down the rebellion than almost any other class of men in the country. When we had no iron-clad boats and Farragut was appealing for them, Secor & Co. went to work and gave us the vessels by which we were able to take Mobile and Fort Fisher. Yet the gentleman gets up and produces charges against them. I say that I have the greatest confidence in these men. If they have done anything wrong I should like to see it. I protest against the gentleman doing them injustice.

Mr. PIKE. I have not a copy of the report, but have sent for it. I understand that we have in our possession the vessels themselves and the money for which they were sold.

Mr. BENJAMIN. We have the money but not the vessels. The Government refuses to clear the vessels.

Mr. PIKE. I understand we have the money, but declare the sale void on account of fraud, and the vessels are now at New Orleans. They are within our jurisdiction. What difficulty is there, that being the case, of retaining possession of those vessels and reimbursing our own expenses out of the transaction? I see no difficulty. Why go into some other transaction when we have a perfect Army under our own control in that transaction?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DAWES, as Speaker pro tempore, having taken the chair, Mr. ELDRIDGE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (S. No. 397) for the relief of certain Government contractors, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that when the House again resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole all debate on the pending bill terminate in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. ELDRIDGE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. MILLER. What I desire to ask is whether this bill proposes to pay anything more than the original contract price to these contractors?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. It proposes to pay for the increased cost in the construction caused by the action of the Government according to the report of the board of examiners.

Mr. MILLER. Nothing more than that increased cost?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. PILE. I understand the gentleman to say he believes the award of this naval board to be just and right. I desire to ask him if there were not fourteen light-draught monitors built, all of them after precisely the same drawings and specifications, the same kind of boats in every particular and with the same alterations made in each boat; and further, if this board did not allow an award to three of the contractors for those boats and reject all the others?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. There is not time to go into that. In saying this award is just, I speak so far as these men are concerned. I have no reason to suppose it was otherwise in regard to the other contractors. But it is unnecessary to go into that. I yield the remainder of the five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire only to put right one or two assertions so far as I know the facts. It has been asserted in the course of this debate that these iron clads were necessary to the prosecution of the war. I desire to say that the most gallant engagement fought by the Navy in the late war, where more risk was undergone and heavier armament met than anywhere else, at Fort St. Philip and Fort Jackson, on the Mississippi river, under Commodore Farragut, there was not a single iron-clad; and there was but one boat lost, and she was a merchant steamer simply fitted up as a naval vessel. One thing further, in justice to all. It is said that we are under great obligation to Secor & Co. I desire to say here that the country is under the greatest obligation to a member of this House, a member from New York, who advanced the money and paid the entire expenses out of his own funds in order to get the monitor built which met the Merrimac in Hampton roads.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Name him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is absent or I would not have said anything about it. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. He is present, [Mr. GRISWOLD.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I beg pardon; I did not know he was here. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I believe my amendment is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will offer his amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move to strike out the following:

To Secor & Co., Perrine, Secor & Co., the sum of $115,539 01.
To M. F. Merritt, the sum of $4,852 58.

The question being taken on the amendment it was disagreed to—ayes thirteen, noes not counted.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

L. MERCHANT AND COMPANY, ETC.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill

(H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co., and Peter Rosecrantz.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to Leander Merchant, of the firm of L. Merchant & Co., the sum of $109,412 81, the proceeds of six hundred and eighty-four bales of cotton, the private property of said firm, taken erroneously and without due authority by the agents of the United States civil and military authorities at Mobile, Alabama, in the month of April, 1865, shipped to New York, sold by the United States, and the proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury, the charges and expenses of the United States having been deducted therefrom; and to Peter Rosecrantz the sum of $39,253 10, the proceeds of two hundred and forty-one bales of cotton, the private property of said Rosecrantz, taken, sold, and appropriated at the same time and place, and in the same manner, the charges and expenses of the United States having likewise been deducted therefrom.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that that bill be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That bill appropriates a good deal of money. We ought to have some explanation of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read. The committee state that the claimants were natives and citizens of the State of Rhode Island previous to the late rebellion, but doing mercantile business at Mobile, Alabama, where their principal possessions were; and to protect their property until it could be disposed of they were obliged to remain in Mobile, after the secession of the State of Alabama, with the so-called southern confederacy. In disposing of their stocks of merchandise they received cotton in payment almost exclusively, until their property in this article amounted to nine hundred and twenty-five bales.

The evidence submitted in the case shows that in April, 1865, twelve days prior to the capture and military possession of Mobile by the United States forces, and when Federal troops were daily expected to appear before the city, the confederate authorities ordered all the cotton in the city of Mobile to be deposited in a designated place near the city and to be forthwith burned to prevent its capture by the United States Government. This order was carried into effect, but the very promulgation of it raised such an outcry for mercy and forbearance from the reduced and impoverished people of Mobile that General Dick Taylor, the rebel commander, was induced to modify its terms, and accordingly issued a general order permitting such persons as could procure transportation for their cotton, either by water or rail, to take it one hundred miles distant from Mobile, and beyond the reach of the Federal Army. With this exception the cotton at Mobile was to be burnt.

At this juncture, Captain Merchant, one of the claimants, succeeded in employing two steamboats and freighting them with six hundred and eighty-four bales of his own cotton, and two hundred and forty-one bales of the cotton of Peter Rosecrantz, and immediately steamed up the Alabama river, under charge of Rosecrantz, some thirty miles distant, where it was run into a small bayou or lake and secreted as well as possible until further directions should be given by Merchant. On the 12th of April the Federal forces occupied Mobile. On the 13th following, the claimant, Merchant, stated the circumstances of running off and secreting the two boat-loads of cotton to General Gordon Granger, the Federal commander, who upon full inquiry, and being satisfied of the loyalty of these parties, gave a permit to restore the cotton to Mobile and to protect the claimants in its ownership and possession. It was accordingly restored to claimants' warehouses, and guards placed about the building to protect it from rebel depredations at Mobile.

Immediately following this the whole of said cotton was taken possession of by Captain Samuel Lappin, assistant quartermaster of volunteers in charge of steamboat and water transportation at Mobile, and who was on duty shipping captured cotton from that port under the authority of the military commander and the supervising special agent of the Treasury Department. As soon as claimants were informed that their cotton was being loaded on vessels to be shipped away they remonstrated with Captain Lappin, and showed to him that their cotton was private property, brought to the city under a safe conduct from General Granger, and stored and to be protected under the permit and order of that officer, who was then absent from the city. Captain Lappin stated in reply that when he loaded the cotton he supposed it was a portion of that captured, and that as it was now mostly loaded he would furnish them with a bill of lading on the part of the United States, and they could proceed to New York, claim the cotton, and the agent there would undoubtedly turn it over to them. Accordingly, claimants procured insurance on the same, paying premium of $4,000 therefor, and proceeded to New York and claimed the amount as stated in their bill of lading. The Secretary of the Treasury declined to turn over the cotton to them at once, but had it stored in warehouses, when claimants again procured insurance on it, and awaited the final action of the Secretary. And finally the cotton was ordered to be sold, and the proceeds thereof to be separately accounted for; so that the claim could be more easily adjusted after it was thoroughly investigated.

The committee, after citing the testimony of General Granger as to the title to the cotton and his own action concerning it, say that the voluminous evidence submitted shows conclusively that few men suffered greater indignities and fiercer persecution on account of their loyalty to the United States than these claimants, and few did more to aid the cause of the Union than they. Every sacrifice seems to have been endured by them but the actual submission to the attempted coercion of marching in rebel ranks. Imprisoned and threatened with death, the halter prepared to facilitate that dread event, the age and feebleness of the parties, became their only protection. Their fortunes mostly confiscated and destroyed, the remnants of all they possessed are found in the nine hundred and twenty-five bales of cotton here in question. Now upward of seventy years of age, the claimants have neither hope for the future nor means of subsistence for the present, except in the justice of their Government, to which they appeal to restore to them their own and their all.

Under these circumstances, and from the considerations which follow, the Committee of Claims, after a most careful examination, have unanimously agreed to recommend the passage of the bill, restoring to claimants the value of the cotton taken and sold, deducting the charges and expenses of the United States as found and stated at the Treasury Department.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that motion. We may as well go through the Calendar.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Well, I withdraw the motion.

CAPTAIN A. G. OLIVAR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1366) for the relief of Captain A. G. Olivar.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Captain A. G. Olivar, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,010, being the full amount that the said Olivar had stolen from him the 13th of May, 1864, which was Government funds.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DENT, VANTINE AND COMPANY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1374) for the relief of Dent, Vantine & Co., for provisions furnished to the Indians in California during the years A. D. 1851 and 1852.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Dent, Vantine & Co. for provisions furnished to the Indians in California during the years 1851 and 1852, the sum of $25,327 30; and appropriates that amount for the purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope not. I hope this claim which has been hanging here for a year or two will now be considered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I hope we shall hear something about this bill before we rise.

The question was taken on Mr. KELSEY's motion; and it was agreed to—ayes 27, noes 18.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ELDRIDGE reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report to the House, with the recommendation that they do pass, the bill (S. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors, the bill (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co., and Peter Rosecrantz, and the bill (H. R. No. 1366) for the relief of Captain A. G. Olivar.

RAMSEY, HENDRICKS, and POMEROY.

UNMUSTERED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. BOYER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 288) amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army, approved July 26, 1866.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The first section of the joint resolution, which was read, provides that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army," approved July 26, 1866, shall be so construed and amended that, in all cases arising under the same, the persons to whom the commission shall have issued shall be considered as actually commissioned to the grade named therein, immediately upon the arrival of said commission at the headquarters of the regiment to which such person so commissioned belonged or was at the time attached, or, if a staff officer, at the headquarters of the department in which he was serving, with like effect as if such commission had been received into the actual possession of the person so promoted; provided, however, that a non-commissioned officer or private so promoted shall be considered as commissioned, within the meaning of said joint resolution, from the date when his commission was actually issued by competent authority, provided at the time he was performing the duties of the grade to which he was commissioned, or from such time after the issuing of his commission when he actually entered upon such duties.

The second section provides that this resolution shall not be construed to apply to cases in which, under the laws and Army regulations existing at the time, there could have been no lawful muster into service even after the actual receipt of the commission.

Mr. BOYER. I ask that the report be read.

The report accompanying the bill was as follows:

The committee in reporting the resolution amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army, approved July 26, 1866, have done so with the expectation that it will include most of those cases in which further relief should be granted on account of the delay or absence of regular muster into the military service.

The committee are aware that it is not practicable by the terms of any general law to provide for every meritorious case; but they are impressed with the belief that special legislation ought to be avoided unless in very exceptional cases, as always likely to involve great irregularity, mistakes, and uncertainty.

There is a large and somewhat varied class of claims, arising out of cases in which commissions were issued to persons who were either never mustered into service, or mustered in after long delay, for which they were not personally responsible. If all these claims were allowed it is estimated that it would require the appropriation of about twenty million dollars to pay them.

In many of these cases the claimants never performed any duty in the grades to which they were respectively commissioned, because by reason of capture, wounds, or sickness, they were either absent from their commands or unfit for actual service.

In other cases a long time elapsed from the same causes before the claimants could present themselves for muster agreeably to the regulation of the service, but the muster having finally taken place, back pay is claimed for the whole time lost between the commission and the muster.

In some instances there was no vacancy in the rank to which the promotion was made, and another person was filling the rank and drawing the pay, but absent on recruiting service, or on account of sickness or other cause.

In other cases the regiment or company in which the promotion was made had been reduced below the minimum, or was consolidated with some other regiment or company. In most of these cases your committee is of opinion that there is no sufficient ground for relief.

It must be remembered that in nearly all the cases of this description which come before Congress for special legislation, the muster could not take place because prohibited by some Army regulation in force at the time.

It is also to be borne in mind that the regimental and company organization of the volunteer forces was such that the Governors of States issued the commissions, and the United States paid the officers. General regulations for muster and pay were absolutely necessary for the protection of the General Government, and it by no means followed that because a person was commissioned he should be at once advanced to the rank to which he had been promoted, and mustered in and paid accordingly. Nor is it always equitable that a second lieutenant who does the duty of a first lieutenant, or a first lieutenant who acts as a captain, &c., should each be paid as of the higher rank in which the duties were performed. That one officer should often exercise the authority of a higher rank than that in which he is commissioned, is a common and honorable incident of the service, and does not generally carry with it any well-founded claim to increased pay and emoluments.

Still less is the equity in favor of a commissioned officer who while in captivity was promoted to a higher grade, but was unable by reason of his situation to receive his new commission, or to perform any of the duties it devolved upon him, which in the mean time were necessarily discharged, if discharged at all, by some other person.

The committee have, however, recognized as a class of persons entitled to additional relief those who, while performing the duties incident to the rank to which it was intended to commission them, were excluded from the muster solely because, by some accident over which they had no control, their commissions, actually issued, were not promptly received. And they have also considered themselves justified in making a slight discrimination in favor of non-commissioned officers and privates, promoted to be commissioned officers under the circumstances recited.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. PILE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate joint resolution No. 81, placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution provides that the troops recognized in an act entitled "An act making appropriations for completing the defenses of Washington, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1862, shall be placed on an equal footing with volunteers as to bounties, and that all laws relating to bounties shall be applicable to them as to other volunteers.

Mr. PAINE. Of course I have no desire to throw any obstacle in the way of the passage of any bill to-night that ought to pass. But inasmuch as this joint resolution does not show the real state of facts as they are, I would like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. SPALDING. We all know about it.

Mr. PILE. This joint resolution has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House. It has been twice examined by the Military Committee at previous sessions of Congress, and it has passed the House twice. It simply proposes to place certain classes of troops in Missouri upon the same footing with other volunteers. Those troops were mustered into the service, paid by the United States, and they served just as other volunteers, and it is a simple act of justice to them to place them upon an equal footing with other volunteers.

Mr. PAINE. Does this joint resolution allow bounty for any shorter period of service than is allowed to other volunteers?

Mr. PILE. Not at all.

The joint resolution was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. KETCHAM, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 1278, providing for the appointment of a commission to examine and report upon certain claims of the State of New York.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The first section of the bill, which was read, provides that the President shall appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who are not residents of the State of New York, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of New York in enrolling, organizing, uniforming, equipping, subsisting, quartering, supplying, transporting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Governor in pursuance of any request or proclamation of the President of the United States, or at the request or upon the order of the Secretary of War, since the 15th day of April, 1861, to act in concert with the United States forces in the suppression of the rebellion against the United States.

The second section provides that the commissioners so appointed shall proceed, subject to regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, at once to examine all the items of expenditure made by said State for the purposes herein named, or such portion thereof as yet remains unallowed or unadjusted, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, organizing, uniforming, equipping, subsisting, quartering, supplying, transporting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Governor in pursuance of any request or proclamation of the United States, or at the request or upon the order of the Secretary of War, since the 15th day of April, 1861, which may have been employed or used in suppressing the rebellion against the United States; and no allowance shall be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full concert and coöperation with the authorities of the United States and subject to their orders.

The third section provides that in making up said account, for the convenience of the accounting officers of the Government, the commissioners shall state separately the amounts expended, respectively, for enrolling, equipping, arming, subsisting, transporting, and paying said troops.

The fourth section provides that in the adjustment of accounts under this act the commissioners shall not allow for any expenditure or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States and the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War in similar cases.

The fifth section provides that so soon as said commissioners shall have made up said account and ascertained the balance, as herein directed, they shall make written report thereof, showing the different items of expenditure, as hereinbefore stated, to the Secretary of the Treasury, which report shall by him be laid before Congress for its consideration.

The sixth section provides that the commissioners to be appointed as aforesaid shall, before proceeding to the discharge of their duties, be sworn that they will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of New York, and that they will, to the best of their ability, make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof, as required by this act. They shall receive such compensation for their services as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding ten dollars per day for each commissioner.

Mr. MAYNARD. It seems to me that in forming this commission one member of the commission should be an Army officer, for reasons that I suppose will be obvious to every one.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest that the commission should consist of two persons, who are not citizens of the State of New York, and that there should be associated with them an Army officer of a grade not lower than colonel, to be detailed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. KETCHAM. This bill is very similar to acts heretofore passed in relation to the States of Missouri and West Virginia. It makes no appropriation of money, but simply appoints a commission to examine the war claims of the State of New York.

Mr. SPALDING. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] had better waive his point. The bill is very well guarded, indeed.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is very obvious that an Army officer would bring to bear upon the question information that other persons would not possess.

Mr. SPALDING. The report is to be made to Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. The Army officer would have the greater part of the information possessed by the commission; and then, so far as my acquaintance with the Army goes, their education has made them fair men, honest toward the Government and toward the citizen. I should much prefer to see the commission organized in this way.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move there be added one officer of the Army on the retired list, so as not to take any out of active service, not below the grade of colonel.

Mr. MAYNARD. I accept that; but I should think two were enough.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be, then, one of whom shall be an officer of the Army on the retired list.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not wish to see this bill pass without knowing there is some necessity for it. The gentleman from New York, who has it in charge, says it costs nothing.

Mr. KETCHAM. It authorizes the appointment of a commission to examine what claims there are of New York and to report the results of their examination.

Mr. SCOFIELD. While the gentleman says it costs nothing, it is to appoint a commission to go into New York to see whether they can find some one to make a claim against the Government.

Mr. KETCHAM rose.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Let me finish my sentence. It is an inquisition for claims, as I understand it. We are not satisfied with the claims sent on from the State of New York. We are afraid some one in that State has something against the Government which has not been paid. This is to hunt him up and to get him to send it on. We appoint a commission to wander through that State to advertise for military claims against the Government. When they have found out all they can they are to report the amount they think we owe them.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask whether such a bill as this was not passed to settle the claims of Pennsylvania to the extent of $700,000?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman asks me a question, and my friend answers it. The gentleman who asks it is mistaken, and the gentleman who answers it is equally mistaken. No such bill was ever passed for Pennsylvania. No such sum was paid to Pennsylvania. No such demand or claim was presented. At the time the rebel army entered into Pennsylvania in 1863, the States of Pennsylvania, New York, and adjoining States were called upon for a volunteer force to repel it by the President of the United States, assigning the quota to each State. The President telegraphed and the Secretary of War telegraphed to the Governor of Pennsylvania to raise those troops, and to pay them from the fund of Pennsylvania, and they would repay it as soon as they could ascertain the amount. A bill was passed to pay that amount. They paid the troops from New York and West Virginia at the time. They were paid directly by the War Department. The troops from Pennsylvania having been paid on the telegram of the President and Secretary of War, it needed a bill to authorize the United States to refund the money loaned. The loan had been made from the banks of Philadelphia.

Mr. SPALDING. What was the amount?

Mr. SCOFIELD. About seven hundred thousand dollars, as the gentleman from New York has stated. The gentleman asks whether it was an honest claim? It was not a claim of the State of Pennsylvania. The Governor had a telegram from the President and Secretary of War to raise the troops, and the banks of Philadelphia advanced the money. They said they would pay it as soon as they obtained the necessary appropriation.

Mr. MAYNARD. There seems to be a play upon terms. It is denied it was a claim.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It was a debt contracted by the United States and not a claim, and an appropriation was needed to pay it.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask whether there is not a law upon the statute-book for the settlement of these claims? There is such a statute for the settlement of such claims growing out of the war.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know we have such a law, but that does not compel any one to bring in their claims. Here we are going to send out a commission to wander over the State of New York to see whether they cannot find some one who has a forgotten claim.

Mr. KETCHAM. My friend misunderstands the object of this bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. When the gentleman gets through his hour, or the length of time he chooses to occupy, if there should not happen to be a quorum present, I desire to know whether I cannot get a chance to say something more. I want the gentleman to know that he need not be so rough to me. He should allow me a little courtesy, because I may be able to take some advantage of his discourtesy if a quorum should not be present when the bill comes to be acted upon.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to know if the Committee on Military Affairs recommend this bill.

Mr. KETCHAM. They do, unanimously.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to inquire whether the object of this bill is not to allow the Government of the United States to settle the claims that the State of New York presents to the Government on account of war expenses.

Mr. KETCHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. There is a law already on the statute-book expressly covering this very case, and under the law as it now stands various States have been settling their war claims from year to year. The State of Illinois is now doing it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think there is a misunderstanding on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] in regard to this bill. If my recollection is not at fault, we have provided for an examination of the claims of almost every State in this way, so that this involves precedents which have been pursued in other States. And the claim of the State of Pennsylvania although it took the form of a money demand, for money paid out by that State, was based upon precisely the same services rendered by that State that this claim presents. I remember in the case of Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa, similar bills were passed.

Mr. CULLOM. Does the gentleman say that the State of Illinois had a special bill passed for the settlement of these claims?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do say so. The appropriation in the bill that passed in 1862 had become exhausted and there was new legislation.

Mr. CULLOM. I undertake to say that the State of Illinois to-day has its agent here for the purpose of settling the claims of the State against the General Government on account of war expenses.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is another class of claims entirely. It is a class of claims where money was expended by the State of Illinois for the equipment and transportation of troops who were mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. What claim is this of New York?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know what is included in it, but I suppose the same class as was included in the Pennsylvania bill—for State troops not actually mustered into the service of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. Several States of the Union having claims against the General Government for moneys advanced for Army expenses and war expenses of various sorts which the State authorities believed the General Government ought to assume, have heretofore acted precisely in the way the State of New York now proposes to act, namely, to ask a commission to be appointed to examine these claims and report precisely in accordance with the custom that has been followed hitherto in reference to at least five States. This bill has been drawn with care. It provides that not a dollar should be paid except the expenses of the commission; that the commission shall have no power to settle the claims, but that it shall simply examine all the testimony on file, all the records in the case, and make a full report to Congress of what is good and what is bad—not that Congress is to be bound by the report of the commissioners, but for the purpose of laying the facts before Congress for its ultimate action. I do not know any possible ground upon which this request can be refused, unless we agree that what we have done in several precisely similar cases is wrong.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Can the gentleman name the States?

Mr. GARFIELD. I name the State of Missouri; I name the State of Iowa; I name the State of Illinois; I name my own State; and I name the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know the gentleman names one State that never had any such roving commission.

Mr. CULLOM. And so he does another.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Pennsylvania never had any such bill or anything like it, or any such commission.

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps their work was not done on the same system that this bill proposes, but that I myself have assisted the gentleman, since I have been a member of this Congress, in paying out of the public Treasury three quarters of a million of claims of the State of Pennsylvania arising out of the war I very well remember.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman has never assisted us in paying one dime to the State of Pennsylvania. The War Department had contracted a debt to the banks of our State by telegraph, and an appropriation was made to pay it. The claims were all audited by the Second Auditor. I have the act before me. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman before I sit down how the Committee on Military Affairs happened to find out that there were probably some persons in the State of New York who had claims against the General Government? What evidence had they before them?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that the committee of the last Congress of the United States had papers and a memorial from the State of New York before them, and drafted the bill which is now before this House and had it ready to be acted on, but the Congress expired before the committee could get the bill before the House. A bill based on the same memorial and the same papers came before the committee of the present Congress and was revised. We cut out several sections which we thought gave too large powers and restricted the operations of the commission, allowing them to settle nothing, but only to examine and report. We have reported the bill to the House in that form, and I cannot consent that the whole evening session shall be consumed in its consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. CULLOM. Why should not this bill be a general law covering all the States? If there is any special reason why a bill of this sort should pass at all why should not all the States of the Union be included in it, and thus save the trouble of passing special acts in favor of each State?

Mr. GARFIELD. In the first place, I suppose that not all the States of the Union have claims of this kind. Some of the great States, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, and some others along the border, made advances to the Government. The State of Ohio advanced $8,000,000 in money. I happened to be a member of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, and was one of those who voted for making that advance to the General Government when it was found with a bankrupt treasury at the beginning of the war.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What is this for?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is for miscellaneous claims, for advances made by the State, and claims of a nondescript sort that have been reported to the Department, and finally a memorial to cover the whole subject was sent to Congress, and the committee have answered that memorial by reporting this bill. I now yield for a moment to my colleague, [Mr. WELKER.]

Mr. WELKER. I wish to say one word in regard to the claims of Ohio. My colleague is mistaken when he says that a commission was created to hear all applications on behalf of Ohio for advances made during the war. It is true that a commission was appointed to investigate into the expenses of the calling out of our squirrel-hunters by the Governor at the time when Morgan made his raid into Ohio and Indiana. But all the other claims of Ohio were settled by the Department at Washington, and not through the instrumentality of a commission, as proposed by this bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether any claims of Ohio were settled by the Department excepting those that came within the regulations of the Army arising out of the expenses connected with troops mustered into the service?

Mr. WELKER. In reply to the gentleman I would say that every claim Ohio presented at the Department was settled there. I know that a great many claims might have been originated in Ohio, and I have no doubt that if a commission had been sent to Ohio to hunt up parties who may have had claims for damages a great many claims might have been got up.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman why all the claims of Ohio for the payment of the expenses connected with the calling out of the squirrel-hunters at the time of Morgan's raid were not paid at the Department?

Mr. WELKER. Because there were no laws or regulations that would reach that class of troops—"squirrel-hunters," as they were termed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I submit that the gentleman has answered the very question in this case; that the "squirrel-hunter" claims of the State of Ohio did not come within the regulations of the Army.

Mr. WELKER. Is not that the character of the claims coming from New York? I understand these claims to be for money advanced during the whole progress of the war.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that a part of this claim—I do not know whether all of it or not—grows out of the claims of the State of New York for expenses incurred in raising militia during the period of the invasion of Lee in Pennsylvania. Those troops were irregularly raised; they were not mustered into the service of the United States; they did not become United States troops; their accounts cannot be settled at the Department under existing regulations. Therefore this commission is asked, as I understand.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not desire to have the session broken up because of the absence of a quorum. I do not know whether there is a quorum in the Hall or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether a quorum is now present or not.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I would ask my colleague on the committee [Mr. KETCHAM] to allow this bill to be laid aside informally, so that we can proceed with other business of the committee.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the only way the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] can reach his object is to move to reconsider the vote ordering the main question, and have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question was taken upon the motion to recommit; and upon a division there were—ayes 60, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCOFIELD and Mr. KETCHAM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes sixty, noes not counted.

So the bill was recommitted.

DISABLED OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from the State of Kansas to use their influence to procure the enactment of a law by which officers and soldiers wounded or disabled in the late war shall be entitled to pensions from date of discharge or resignation, the same as if they had made application at that time, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

RETIRED OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 1378, to declare the meaning of the several acts in relation to retired officers of the Army.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The first section of the bill, which was read, provides that any officer of the Army who has been or who may hereafter be retired from active service under existing laws, and whose disability shall have been occasioned by sickness, injuries, or wounds incurred or received in the line of his duty as a commissioned officer in the volunteer service of the United States at any time since the 19th day of April, 1861, and previous to his appointment as an officer of the regular Army, shall receive, in the application of said laws, the same pay and allowances, and enjoy the same rights, privileges, and benefits of all kinds whatsoever as he would be entitled to receive and enjoy if such sickness, wound, injury, or other disability had been incurred or received while in the regular Army.

The second section provides that the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to revoke and declare null and void all orders of the War Department heretofore issued which are not in accordance with the provisions of the preceding section.

The third section provides that so much of section twenty-five of an act entitled "An act providing for the better organization of the military establishment," approved August 3, 1861, and so much of section twelve of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, as authorizes the assignment by the President of any officer of the Army who has been retired under the provisions of said acts, or any other acts, to any appropriate duty, is hereby rescinded; and hereafter retired officers of the Army, except in time of war, shall not be assigned to any duty other than at the Military Academy, at certain colleges and universities, as provided in section twenty-six of the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will explain briefly the provisions of this bill. There are but three sections, and it will take but a few minutes to explain them. There is now this difficulty under the law in regard to the retirement of officers: that such officers who have received wounds or have been otherwise disabled while in the volunteer service and afterward have been transferred to the regular service are not permitted by the retiring board to be retired upon the same terms as though they had received their wounds while in the regular Army. This is a manifest injustice which the bill now before us is designed to correct. In the second section of the bill it is proposed that officers who have been thus unjustly retired shall be restored. The third section is designed to prevent the abuse which is now growing up of officers getting themselves retired and then put into easy places on duty with restoration of their full pay. Those are the three points which the bill is designed to cover. I hope that it will be passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the first section of this bill, if I understand it and the gentleman's explanation of it, will open a door to the retirement of all the officers now in the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will remember that there is now a provision of law, that not more than seven per cent. of the officers of the Army shall be on the retired list at any one time. That restriction will obviate the difficulty which the gentleman apprehends.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to continuing a Veteran Reserve corps in the Army for the purpose of getting up a retired list. It seems to me that that would be a very expensive way of carrying on the military department of this Government.

I desire to say further, that if I understand correctly the last section of the bill, it provides that an officer who is retired shall not be detailed for duty except in time of war, or upon service in the Military Academy. Now, I do not see any good reason why an officer who has been placed on the retired list should not have an opportunity occasionally to perform, if he is able to do so, some duty. I do not see why he should not have an opportunity to be ordered to duty, if he desires it, and to receive full pay. A good many of the retired officers of the Army are now on duty. Under the existing law the Secretary of War has authority to detail for active duty an officer who has been retired, and such officer, while performing this duty, receives the full pay of his rank instead of the half pay to which a retired officer is entitled. I would like the gentleman to give us some explanation on this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill which I propose to offer to the House immediately after this shall have been disposed of proposes to make a very large reduction in the roster of the Army; and that bill provides that those who may be dropped from active duty in consequence of such reduction of the Army may be assigned by the Secretary of War to special duty, receiving full pay while so engaged. If officers retired in consequence of inability to perform duty are allowed to be put on duty we simply open the door to the continuance and increase of an evil which already exists to a considerable extent. Officers get up claims for retirement, make a persuasive array of their aches and pains, and thus secure positions on the retired list, and then, perhaps, after two or three months' relief, they obtain, through political or personal influence, an assignment to some pleasant duty, and thus again enjoy the full pay which they received before being retired, with the additional advantage of being in a comfortable place instead of in the field.

I have before me a record from the Adjutant General's office showing the number of persons who, under the present laws, have been retired, and are now upon the retired list. The list shows an exceedingly large number. It shows one hundred and forty-two officers upon the retired list: four major generals, seven brigadier generals, twenty-eight colonels, thirteen lieutenant colonels, twenty-nine majors, thirty-four captains, sixteen first lieutenants, four second lieutenants, two military storekeepers, and five chaplains; and of the entire number, seventy-seven are now on duty, more than one half on the retired list, and so far as I know, they are upon the most comfortable duty in the whole range of the Army service. Officers upon the retired list receive pay at the following rates: major general, $247 per month; brigadier general, $195; colonel, $177; lieutenant colonel, $158; major, $139; captain, $114; first lieutenant, $101; second lieutenant, $95; military storekeeper, $127; and chaplain, $114.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman state their full pay?

Mr. GARFIELD. This is their pay and allowances while unemployed, which is about half the pay of an officer on the active list. When employed they have full pay as if they were not retired. It is said that officers who received only a scratch in the Army, enough to make them a little lame, men in full and robust health, young men, men in the prime of life, good for forty years yet, are on the retired list. They can go to Europe and elsewhere, and through political influence by and by be put upon light duty at full pay. They can go into business and practice their profession while not on duty.

Now, sir, I wish to call attention to two extracts from the Army and Navy Journal. They will show the working of the present law for retiring officers in two cases where officers have been retired by the retiring board.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A board of examination having found Brevet Major William G. Edgerton, captain twenty-ninth United States infantry, 'incapacitated for active service, and that said incapacity is not the result of long and faithful service, of wounds or injury received in the line of duty, sickness, or exposure therein, or any other incident of service, but results from "dipsomania," produced by his own willful intemperance in the use of alcoholic drinks," the President directs that, in accordance with section seventeen of the act of Congress, approved August

3, 1861, he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowances, and that his name be henceforward omitted from the Army Register."

"A board of examination having found Brevet Colonel W. M. Kilgour, captain forty-first United States infantry, 'incapacitated for active service, and that said incapacity is the result of a gunshot wound received at the battle of Perryville, Kentucky, October 8, 1862, and that said incapacity existed before he was commissioned in the Army, July 23, 1866,' the President directs that in accordance with section seventeen of the act of Congress approved August 3, 1861, he be wholly retired from the service with one year's pay and allowances, and that his name be henceforward omitted from the Army Register."

Mr. GARFIELD. In the first case the officer having been found by the retiring board totally incapacitated, not in consequence of meritorious and long service, but of long continued dissipation, having become a confirmed "dipso-maniac," having had the delirium tremens, he was, by the operation of the law, dropped from the rolls of the Army, with one year's pay and allowances. That was according to the law; but here was another who was found to be totally incapacitated in consequence of a wound received while an officer of volunteers, at the battle of Perryville, at that time not in the regular Army, but in the volunteer service, but transferred to the regular Army some months subsequent, but in which he served faithfully until his wounds grew worse—this man, incapacitated by his wounds, was retired upon the same terms as the "dipso-maniac"—dropped from the rolls with one year's pay and allowances, whereas if he had been in the regular Army when he received the shot he would have been retired on half pay for life. Such a decision makes a wound in battle no more meritorious in a volunteer than delirium tremens in a regular. Precisely that kind of decision is being made perpetually by the board of retirement, notwithstanding it has again and again been declared in the law that in all matters of pay, emolument, and allowances, there shall be no distinction whatever between a volunteer and a regular officer. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As a matter cognate to this discussion I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language of the first section, which requires that a wound should be "incurred or received in the line of his duty as a commissioned officer in the volunteer service" in order that he may be retired as an officer in the regular Army. Now, if that remains in, if a private soldier got a wound in the course of his duty and became incapacitated from it, he cannot be retired as an officer.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee have simply followed the law as it now stands. We did not design to enlarge the scope of its action; but if the House chooses to amend that provision I shall have no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope it will be so amended.

Mr. GARFIELD. Make the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the words "as a commissioned officer," so as to allow a private who was incapacitated while a private and for gallantry and courage has been made an officer, to be retired.

Mr. PAINE. I suggest an amendment, which will probably accomplish the same object and be less objectionable, to strike out the word "commissioned" and add the words, "or enlisted man."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That will be just the same thing. It will then read "as an officer or enlisted man." That will accomplish the purpose exactly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will personally accept the amendment. I cannot do it on behalf of the committee, but I presume they will have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield for a question to my colleague.

Mr. MUNGEN. I observe that the first clause of the first section reads:

That any officer of the Army who has been or who may hereafter be retired from active service under existing laws, and whose disability shall have been occasioned by sickness, injuries, or wounds incurred or received in the line of his duty as a commissioned officer in the volunteer service of the United States at any time since the 10th day of April, 1861, and previous to his appointment as an officer of the regular Army, &c.

Now, I have a friend who is on the retired list, General Walker, of Ohio, who was a captain in the twelfth regulars, and held a commission as such before he was appointed colonel of the thirty-first Ohio volunteers. At the battle of Chickamauga, I believe, he was severely injured by a shell, and has been unable since to do even office business as a lawyer. Now, does not this bill cut off that officer from any benefit whatever?

Mr. GARFIELD. He was in the regular Army at the time he was disabled.

Mr. MUNGEN. Does not this bill prohibit him from the benefits of the bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all. Those officers of the regular Army, who were also officers of volunteers when they received their disabilities, can now by law be placed on the retired list. I know the officer to whom the gentleman refers. I entirely concur with what he says, and will do anything in my power to assist his friend.

Mr. MUNGEN. If the bill does not interfere with that case and other similar cases I have nothing further to say.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me two minutes?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say that it seems to me this is a very expensive method of protecting a wounded and disabled officer. If he is wounded in the service and is fortunate enough to get an appointment in the Army the next day he is retired on half pay, as a captain, if he is appointed captain. He is retired, say, on $150 a month. Another man wounded equally badly by his side, but not so fortunate as to get an appointment in the Army, is retired on a pension of twenty dollars a month. It seems to me either that we ought not to open the door to enlarge the retired list of the Army, or else that we ought to raise the pensions of our officers to the retired pay of the rank that they hold. There is a manifest impropriety and injustice in this thing. A man is killed outright and leaves a large family. His widow gets a pension of twenty, twenty-five, or thirty dollars a month, which is the highest she can get, even if her husband was a major general. A man who was wounded subsequently and appointed a major general is next day retired on $200 a month. Now, that is not fair; it is not just. I suppose my two minutes have expired. I am opposed to opening the door to enlarging the retired list of the Army. If a man has worn himself out in the service and grown old, then I am willing to retire him and let him go down gently to his grave.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say, in response to my friend from Illinois, that if we were now proposing new legislation on the subject his argument would be entirely germane, and perhaps I might agree with him. But we do not in this bill enlarge the law at all, except to abolish the distinction between volunteers and the officers of the regular Army. That is all; and the second section provides that in cases of such injustice as the one that I had read at the desk, the action of the board shall be reversed, and such persons shall be retired in accordance with the provisions of this law. Now, I hope that is an answer to the gentleman, because I would not be willing at this time to enlarge the scope of the law on that subject. But I refer the gentleman again to the fact that but seven per cent. of the officers of the Army can under the existing law be retired. I ask the previous question.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will do so.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not, I confess, examined this bill as carefully as I perhaps should have done, but I would like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether, under the present law, it is not at the option of the Secretary of War to retire seven per cent. of the officers of the Army without their being wounded?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the gentleman that that is not the law. An officer who has been in the service forty-five years he may retire at his option, but those persons who are sick or disabled he may order before a board, and on the recommendation of that board he may retire them. Other persons voluntarily, at their own request, may be allowed to go before a board. There are now three ways by which an officer may be retired by law, first by the order of the President when the officer has been forty-five years in the service, and then in the two ways I have mentioned.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course that answers satisfactorily in reference to that question; but it seems to me that, as stated by my colleague, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] unless there is some restriction placed on this section, it is rather an expensive manner or mode of pensioning a great many men who are now in the Army. I would suggest to the chairman for his consideration whether it would not be better to amend this section so as to provide that no officer shall be retired from the service of the United States unless by his own consent or who may be competent to perform duty. I desire to see this bill pass because I wish to see a change effected that will place men who have not heretofore been in the regular Army upon the same footing as those who have been in the regular Army. But there are a great many officers in the Army now who do not desire retirement, but under the manipulations that might be brought to bear by boards, injustice might be done them, such as we know has been done and as the very paragraph which has been read at the desk shows is done. Hence I desire to see the law changed and perfected in that particular. I do not desire to see men driven from the service and placed on the pension-roll against their will in order merely to make places for somebody else. There are a great many meritorious men now in the Army who have received wounds, and perhaps would not be as well qualified for severe service as men of perfect health. Yet they are well qualified to perform many of the duties that are incumbent upon commissioned officers in the Army. Now, if these men may be retired, under this bill, by the mere edict of the Secretary of War or by the report of a commission they may be made to give place to others who may desire to have their places. Hence I suggest that this section be amended by providing that no officer shall be retired against his will who is competent to perform services in the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would not object to that if it was not the law now, except as to officers over forty-five years of age.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it better to amend the first section of this bill by adding to it:

Provided, That no officer shall be retired against his will who may be competent to perform service in the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I will allow the amendment to be offered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House bill No. 1377, to reduce and fix the military peace establishment.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to offer some amendments to this bill; and first I will move to amend the eighth section.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will that preclude amendments to previous sections of this bill?

The SPEAKER. It will not; but the Chair would suggest that unless the amendments of the committee are such as will give rise to debate they better be acted upon first and incorporated in the bill.

Mr. PAINE. I know that some members of the House propose to offer amendments to this bill, which will, if adopted, be substitutes for, or come in conflict with, the amendments to be proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs. Therefore I think it would be much better to have this bill read by sections for amendment, and the committee's amendments can then be offered.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Ohio better report back this bill with these amendments incorporated in the text of the bill, so that they may be open to amendment like other portions of the text.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask that the amendments be read.

The amendments were read as follows:

Add to the seventh section the following:

Provided further, That if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, it is necessary for the continuance of garrisons at important forts and arsenals, and the protection of our Indian frontiers, to retain all or any portion of the artillery and cavalry force authorized to be mustered out of service or relieved on half pay by this act, it shall be lawful for him to do so until the further action of Congress.

Amend the eighth section by adding to it the following:

And provided, That not more than one third of the officers of each grade in the regiments known as the Veteran Reserve corps, nor more than one third of the officers belonging to the regiments of colored troops, shall be placed on the list of officers to be relieved from duty under the provisions of this section; but upon application of any officer whose rank would retain him in active service the Secretary of War may place such officer upon the list in lieu of the officer oldest in commission of the same grade who would otherwise be placed on said list under the provisions of this act.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from Ohio presents this last amendment as coming from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. When was it considered by the committee?

Mr. GARFIELD. If my colleague insists on his point of order, I will say that all the amendments I am now offering, save one, were considered and acted on by the committee, and as to that one I have obtained from all the members of the committee with whom I have had an opportunity to consult consent to report it. It has happened unfortunately that I have had no opportunity to consult with the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. It happens, also, that the gentleman has not consulted a quorum of the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust that the explanation I have made will be a sufficient apology to the gentleman; if not, I will withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana makes the point of order that this amendment has not been agreed on by the committee, and if the gentleman from Ohio states that it has not been, then the amendment must be withdrawn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have obtained the consent of every member of the committee whom I have been able to see; but as I understand my colleague on the committee to insist upon his point of order, I withdraw the amendment. I will not ask the reading of further amendments which I was about to present. In order to facilitate and hasten the consideration of the bill, I will waive any general remarks on my part, and will ask that the bill be considered in the House section by section, as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. That course will be adopted if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The first section was read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the office of General of the Army shall be continued until a vacancy shall occur in the same, and no longer; and on the occurrence of a vacancy all laws and parts of laws creating or regulating said office shall cease and determine.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to amend by striking out all of this section after the enacting clause. I am in favor of the reduction of the Army; yet I am also in favor of preserving the harmony of its organization. I do not see why we should not continue the office of general as well as that of major; and particularly is it inadvisable to discontinue this office while we have so many distinguished soldiers who have rendered eminent service to the country during the late rebellion. Besides, there are laws imposing duties upon the General of the Army; and this section contains no provision imposing those duties upon any other officer. I am in favor of preserving the present organization of the Army. I desire this section stricken out, so that if there should be, by any soon-coming event, a vacancy in the office of General of the Army, the Lieutenant General may succeed to the position, some other worthy officer taking the place of the present Lieutenant General. I therefore hope this section, unless there be some good reason for preserving it, will be stricken out.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the reason for introducing this section was, first and chiefly, to reduce the Army, to make that reduction effective and possible, and at the same time to save as far as possible the rights, honor, and dignity of every officer in the Army. If they had begun at the bottom and reduced it only among the lower officers they would be justly chargeable with unfairness; but they have reduced it throughout.

There is another consideration. The offices of General and Lieutenant General of the Army were never known in this country, except in two instances, before. The office was created for General Washington. The office of Lieutenant General was subsequently revived for General Scott. In both instances they were personal, and intended as personal decorations for citizens of the United States who had performed great and distinguished services for the country. For precisely similar reasons they were recently revived to decorate two eminent citizens who have rendered great and distinguished services to the nation, and it is thought the same custom should prevail henceforward, and when the offices are vacated by the persons for whom they were intended, they should cease and determine, leaving the whole subject to the action of Congress when it may see fit to revive the offices for similar services to the country. There is still another consideration which had great weight with the committee. We did not feel it safe to allow the present Executive to fill the vacancy as he might choose to fill it. Who knows the person he might select as the successor of either of the two great captains who now fill the offices? This was of great and paramount weight with the committee. We did not think it safe or proper to leave such a power with the present President of the United States. We therefore thought it best to follow the custom which has prevailed hitherto, and leave the office to cease and determine with its present holder. I trust we shall have the hearty approval of the House for this legislation.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to insert after the last word "and the duties thereof shall devolve upon the officer next in rank."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That will not effect the result. It will still provide that all laws or parts of laws regulating said office shall cease and determine.

Mr. LOGAN. I move, then, to strike out "or regulating;" so it will then read, with the words added which I have indicated, as follows:

The office of the General of the Army shall be continued until a vacancy shall occur in the same, and no longer; and on the occurrence of a vacancy all laws and parts of laws creating said office shall cease and determine, and the duties thereof shall devolve upon the officer next in rank.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to amend the section, and it will necessitate the striking out of the amendment just adopted. I move to insert the word "dis" before "continued," and to strike out so it will read:

The office of General of the Army shall be discontinued, and all laws or parts of laws creating or regulating said office shall cease and determine.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should not have proposed this amendment or any amendment to this bill but for the remarks made by the distinguished chairman of the committee. He has announced to this House and the country it is the object of the committee to reduce the Army and to reduce the expense of the military establishment, but he has carefully avoided in this bill the turning out of a single soul who wears shoulder-straps. In consequence of this fact I doubt the sincerity of it. I wish to test the sincerity of the committee, and I shall continue to test it all through this bill, providing in the next section for the abolition of the office of Lieutenant General, and in the following section reducing the major generals to four, and in the subsequent section the number of brigadier generals to eight. If the committee is in earnest, if it is their sincere desire to reduce the military force and save the Treasury of the country and the tax-payer, what is to prevent this reduction at the present time?

What great service is the General of the Army rendering to this country at the present time? When he was acting as Secretary of War ad interim the country went on as smoothly as it is going to-day, when he is traveling with his family on leave. The General of the Army issued not a single order by virtue of his office as such for three or four months, and yet the country was safe.

What is the Lieutenant General of the Army doing by virtue of his office? Not one thing that could not be done as well without the office. Now, as to the General and the Lieutenant General of the Army, I certainly have no attack to make upon those distinguished individuals. But I do attack the offices that were created to reward them for the distinguished services they have rendered to the country. They should have been paid in some other way, not by giving them these offices, which, if gentlemen crawl on their bellies before the men who achieve such positions, will in the end, as I remarked, destroy the liberties of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and ask for a vote.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Illinois, to strike out all of the first section except the enacting clause; and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the office of Lieutenant General of the Army shall be continued until a vacancy shall occur in the same, and no longer; and on the occurrence of such vacancy, all laws and parts of laws creating or regulating said office shall cease and determine.

Mr. ALLISON. The same amendment that was made to the first section should apply to this. Strike out the words "or regulating" and add at the end "and the duties thereof shall devolve on the officer next in rank."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I propose an amendment to this section for the same reason that I proposed it to the other section. I move to add the syllable "dis" before "continued;" to strike out all thereafter down to and including the word "vacancy;" and to insert before the word "all" the word "and;" and to strike out the words just added at the end of the section; so that it will read:

That the office of Lieutenant General of the Army shall be discontinued, and all laws and parts of laws creating said office shall cease and determine.

That will legislate the Lieutenant General out of office immediately, and let him enjoy his rural comfort with General Grant on his farm.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no brevet appointment of General or Lieutenant General shall be made after the passage of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the words "of General or Lieutenant General," so that it will read, "that no brevet appointment shall be made after the passage of this act." Brevet appointments are for meritorious services in battle or in great emergencies during war. They do not belong to a peace establishment of an army. They are now so thick that the only distinction is that a man has never had a brevet.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest to add the words "except in time of war."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am content with that.

Mr. PIKE. I suggest another amendment—"for services in war."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest in opposition to the amendment—though I do not very much oppose it, but quite agree in the general with what the gentleman has said—that in the bill in relation to the rules and articles of War which passed the Senate last night, and which we hope to be able to pass before this session ends, it is provided that no brevet shall be conferred except in time of war and for one year thereafter, and then only in consequence of special meritorious services during the war. It seemed to the committee that it would be wiser to make that standing provision, which would cover them both in peace and in war, and would be better than to say absolutely that there shall be no brevets.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When that comes in it will repeal this, and it will be all right.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "except in time of war." I understand the rule to be now at the War Department that brevet appointments in worthy cases are given so that the brevet rank may run as high as the actual rank in the field; that is, where an officer was a brigadier general and was subsequently appointed a major or captain in the regular Army he may have a brevet as high as brigadier general. It is a satisfactory recognition of very many worthy officers now in the Army.

Mr. LOGAN. Many of them have not smelled gunpowder.

Mr. PIKE. Many of them have. I know of one case in which I applied the other day, a very worthy case, and I know of several other instances. And it seems to me very ungracious for us to refuse such a very simple recognition as this of the value of services rendered during the war.

Mr. LOGAN. If you will make it "for services in the front of the enemy," I will have no objection.

Mr. PIKE. I will change my amendment, and move to insert the words "for gallant and distinguished services in presence of the enemy."

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask both gentlemen to accept in lieu of their amendments the amendment which I send to the desk, which has been carefully prepared as one of the Rules and Articles of War.

The Clerk read as follows:

Commissions by brevet shall only be conferred in time of war or within one year thereafter, and for distinguished conduct and important services in presence of the enemy, which shall bear date from the particular action or service for which the officer was breveted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I accept that.

Mr. PIKE. I do not like the word "important." I suggest the words "distinguished and meritorious."

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would like to know if the service rendered by the person to whom the gentleman from Maine referred was not "important?"

Mr. PIKE. It was. He is now a colonel in the regular Army, and he could not have got that position unless he had rendered important services.

Mr. GARFIELD's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The Clerk then read the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no vacancies shall hereafter be filled in the office of major general until the number of major generals shall be less than four, and thereafter there shall be but four major generals.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out all after the enacting words of that section, and to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall hereafter be but three major generals, and the officers who shall retain their positions as such shall be designated by the General of the Army without regard to seniority, and all others shall be mustered out of service within sixty days after the passage of this act.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The reason, Mr. Speaker, why I offer that amendment is this: before the war we had but one major general in the United States Army; that was Major General Scott, by brevet Lieutenant General; then we had General Wool, who was brevet major general; and between the two they governed an army of seventeen thousand men, and governed it very tolerably well. Then came the war, and now we have a General, a Lieutenant General, and five major generals, and we have seven general headquarters in this District of Columbia to take care of the District only, with full staffs. The President, the Commander-in-Chief, is one, the General of the Army another, the Secretary of War still another, the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau is another, General Hancock, commander of the military division, is another, General Emory, the commander of the department of Washington, is another, General Wallace, the commander of the garrison of Washington, is another; there are, therefore, seven general headquarters to take care of this District in time of peace, and, I believe, from twelve to fifteen generals on duty here in various ways. A friend suggests nineteen. I always understate in my statements.

Now, sir, that being so, I desire that we shall come down somewhere near a peace establishment, and I know of no man better situated to designate who shall hold these commissions of major generals than the General of the Army.

I propose to follow up this amendment by an amendment providing that, instead of ten brigadier generals, there shall be only six, to be selected in the same way. This bill provides for only twenty-five thousand soldiers, and three major generals and a lieutenant general are amply sufficient to take charge of twenty-five thousand men; and those are twice as many general officers as are employed with a like number of troops in the best European armies. A friend near me says that he would give them six months. Why? Did you give any six months to the volunteer generals after they were no longer wanted? When you get through with them they go out at once. The most of them knew, too, where to go. We of the volunteer service asked no favors. I am willing to give those officers sixty days after this act shall pass. They have all been educated, with one exception, at the expense of the Government. They were given a first-rate education at the expense of their country. They are all wanted as engineers of railroads and on other public works. They can all be employed and be of some use, which they are not now, although that is not their fault. I hope, therefore, my amendment will be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. MULLINS. I do hope they will.

Mr. GARFIELD. In the first place, it is a very ungracious task which the Committee on Military Affairs have felt it their duty to perform, to cut down so large a number of persons in official positions as this bill proposes; and particularly in the case of persons who have performed so distinguished services as have been performed by the officers embraced in this section. There are five major generals now in the Army: Halleck, Meade, Sheridan, George H. Thomas, and Hancock. Now, to require the General of the Army to select two of them to be stricken from the rolls, to let the burden, and especially what odium there might be in that selection rest upon the General of the Army, I think would not be treating him fairly, nor would it be treating fairly the officers who now occupy these positions. Without undertaking to debate this matter further, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I modify my amendment so that it shall read "on the 1st day of January next," instead of "sixty days after the passage of this act."

The question was on the amendment, as modified.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word for the purpose of saying a word in reply to what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I do not look upon this as being so great a hardship as some men seem to consider it. A great many men might have considered it a hardship, after they had served as generals in the Army for four years, and lost their business at home, to be mustered out at a day's notice.

But I presume none of them did so consider it. If we intend to reduce the Army, if that is our intention in good faith—and I hope that we do intend it—it is not right for us to commence by cutting off the private soldiers, and leaving the great army of generals drawing their pay of $3,000, $5,000, or $6,000 a year each, with staffs around them drawing as much more.

It is wrong to have in service officers for whom we have no use. This bill proposes to reduce the Army to twenty-five thousand men. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. GARFIELD] was himself at one time a general in the Army; and I should be glad if he would tell me by what rule of the Army it will require a general, a lieutenant-general, four major generals, ten brigadier generals, and twelve staffs to command twenty-five thousand troops. Both he and I in our military experience, have known that number of men to be commanded by a far less number of generals without any major generals whatever except at the head. There is no necessity in time of peace for such a body of officers as this bill proposes. These officers ought not to consider it a hardship that their services are dispensed with. No man ought to consider it a hardship that, when the country does not require his services, it shall say so. I know that when my country required my services no longer I was informed of the fact, and that was enough for me. It ought to be enough for everybody in such a position. It was enough for many men who are now on this floor.

I do not know what is the present number of our Army; but this bill proposes that when the number of officers shall be reduced those relieved from duty shall be put on a retired list. I am not in favor of that. I am in favor of mustering out of service those officers for whose services the Government has no occasion. There is no more justice in putting an unnecessary officer on half pay than there is in putting upon half pay a private who is no longer needed. This bill contemplates that the privates shall be mustered out. They are to be turned loose without a dollar, for there is not one in a thousand who has a dollar within a few weeks after receiving his pay. The privates are to be turned loose upon the country without occupation, while at the same time you propose to retain in service almost an army of general officers for whom the country has no occasion. No man who is truly a patriot will, when his services are dispensed with, in order to reduce the burdens of the people, and because those services are no longer required, say, "I have done service for my country and my country has forgotten me; and in its forgetfulness has inflicted disgrace upon itself and a great wrong upon me." No man with proper self-respect and proper love for his country will say that. For these reasons I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. The theory of this bill is that supernumerary officers shall be retained until vacancies occur in their grade, and that subordinate officers below the rank of brigadier general shall be placed upon a list to be relieved and put upon half pay. I am in favor of mustering out of service such major generals and brigadier generals as we have no further occasion for. If we are to adopt the rule that supernumerary officers throughout all the lower grades of the Army shall be mustered out, it certainly would not be proper to retain the supernumerary major generals and brigadier generals. Hence I shall regard the vote upon this amendment as a test of the sense of the House upon the question whether these supernumeraries shall be retained or whether all supernumeraries shall be mustered out. There is, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN], a distinction between the position of the officer and that of the private soldier in this respect: the private soldier is enlisted for a term of years, and his pay is not supposed to be such as to make it especially desirable on his part to remain in the service, while the position of the officers is a position for life—a position for which they have prepared themselves by years of study.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Do not their commissions run during the pleasure of the President?

Mr. PILE. They do; but the practical construction of that, as the gentleman very well knows, is that unless the officer is guilty of some misconduct for which he is amenable under the rules and articles of war, and is sentenced to dismissal by a court-martial, the President cannot dismiss him. Though the commission nominally runs during the pleasure of the President, it is a commission for life unless the officer by misconduct renders himself liable to dismissal by the judgment of a court-martial.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Congress cannot control this subject?

Mr. PILE. Certainly, Congress has power over the whole subject. It can abolish these officers; it can do away with the army entirely; but the President has no such power.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CARY. I move to strike out the word "General" and to insert "the President of the United States." Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why this duty should be devolved upon the General of the Army any more than upon the Lieutenant General; but I do see a manifest propriety in it being assigned to the President of the United States, he being the Commander-in-Chief. I am not disposed to occupy my five minutes. It seems to me the propriety of the amendment is apparent.

Mr. MUNGEN. I ask my colleague to yield me the remainder of his time.

Mr. CARY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MUNGEN. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts in extending the operation of this law to the 1st of January—and I should like to know whether that is not the fact—it is to save General Grant, provided he should not be elected President by the people of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. MUNGEN. Does this leave General Grant and Lieutenant General Sherman in their present positions?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. MUNGEN. I would as soon leave them out as any private soldier.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. One of them will go out next March.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to oppose the amendment. Mr. Speaker, it seems to be a foregone conclusion that there is to be some reduction of the Army. When we do come to a decision of that sort it seems to me we should approach the subject with a consideration looking to all the interests involved both of public and private citizens affected by our action. Now, sir, it strikes me the mode proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] would be an exceedingly harsh one. I do not pretend to say Congress may not abolish the office of major general, or reduce the number of major generals. I am inclined to think hereafter in our Army three will be enough in any organization we propose to keep up. But what is the amendment? That hereafter there shall be three major generals; that is, after the 1st of January next, and those three shall be designated by the General of the Army. I suppose there are to be three selected from the present five, but the amendment does not say so.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, it does.

Mr. SCHENCK. The selection, then, is to be made from the present five major generals. Who are they? Halleck, Meade, Sheridan, Thomas, and Hancock. I am not an especial admirer of General Halleck. I have regarded him always as a paper general, if I may make a criticism of that kind. I do not suppose any one would think of excluding Meade, Sheridan, or George H. Thomas; and I confess I should be unwilling to see a harsh measure of this kind extended to General Hancock, for while I never have believed, if he had been the fortunate or unfortunate man selected for defeat with any of the chances tendered to him by the convention at New York, he would or would not have made much of a President; yet he has proved himself a respectable soldier. Now, these five men entered in boyhood the public service in the profession of arms and have continued up to this time. They have been put upon an increased establishment as compared with what existed before the war. It is now proposed that they shall be thrust out of service in their comparatively old age in this manner, without provision. I object to it. If there has been any wrong in promoting them, in advancing them until we have more of these officers than we need, the wrong has not been theirs. They are not to be blamed for the natural ambition of getting advancement. If there has been any wrong the wrong has been in Congress making this provision for them. Now, after Congress has done this, it seems to me the least thing we could do would be to let them down in some graceful way, considering who they are and what they have done.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. In five minutes' time one has not much to spare.

Mr. LOGAN. Does not the gentleman from Ohio know that quite a number of officers who were educated at West Point, and served in the Army as major generals and brigadier generals, have been compelled to return to the positions of captains and lieutenants?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly I do; but that does not make the slightest reply to my argument. These men are now regularly in the service by the action of Congress, obtaining advancement as it has been held open to them, and this amendment proposes to thrust them out without provision, without half pay, without retirement, with only the general declaration, "Begone, we have no further need of your services." I am not ready for that. I prefer that we shall gradually let ourselves down from that point to which we extended our legislation, if we are to take a back track upon it; and in letting ourselves down, that while we take care of the public interest, we shall at the same time try not to do any injustice to those who served the country.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARY.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I propose to perfect the text.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out "four" in both instances where it occurs and insert "three;" so that the section will read:

That no vacancies shall hereafter be filled in the office of major general until the number of major generals shall be less than three, and thereafter there shall be but three major generals.

I only say in support of this that I fully concur in the remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] as to the principle of reducing the Army; and, entertaining that view, I move to reduce the number of major generals to three.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to oppose the amendment. Now, sir, let us see what is proposed. We cannot strike out anybody here who does not find a friend to uphold him. We cannot strike out any provision in the Army bill without disturbing the gentleman who is the author of it; for he always stands by his child. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the provisions of the bill. It proposes to keep these men in office until they die. They never resign. They are of an average age of perhaps forty-five. They are good for thirty years longer. Now, it is proposed to pass a measure called a bill for the reduction of the Army. If we pass this bill as it stands it will be no reduction, but a reductio ad absurdum.

Now, let us see further about the argument that these officers shall not be discharged. In the first place General Halleck left the Army before the war and went into the law to serve his own interests after he had been educated at the public expense. I have nothing to say against him. But when he was in the Army he wrote two or three military books. I do not pretend to say whether he is a man to be selected to be discharged or not. I am not going to discuss personally any of these officers. I only say that if we cannot begin here with our reduction—with these general officers—if there is not nerve enough in this Congress to stand up here and now, you might as well throw this bill into the fire and go home.

What is our proposition? To strike out these generals? Out from what? Simply because they are no longer needed for the service. Seven years ago some of them were captains, quartermasters, and right glad to have those positions. At the end of six years what do we propose to say to them? "We say we do not want to saddle the people of the country with your salaries any longer." My friend from Ohio agrees they are not needed; the Military Committee agrees also; but it is said we must let them down easy. Sir, who will let the tax-burdened people down easy? Why should we pension these men? We have educated them all, given them a thorough education, and I was about to say if they cannot make a living, what are our poor volunteers to do who left their homes and their colleges, with their education unfinished, and went into the war, and having fought it through were then thrust out of the Army without education, without preparation, without position, without any saving clause whatever, many of them without arms or without legs, and with gaping wounds? You gave them fifteen dollars a month at most, but when you come to the man who is receiving $12,000 or $15,000 a year you must treat him very gently. Why? Because he has somebody here to speak for him.

Now let us have it understood, if we propose to pass this bill let us begin with the powerful men, these major generals, and deal with them first, not harshly, but simply say to them, "Your services are no longer needed; you have done well; we give you full recognition of your services; we have done so by continuing you in your places more than three years after the war is ended with nothing for you to do; we have had to make military provision for you by giving you commands, but from this time you, as military officers, with your staffs or military households are to cease."

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment, and to say simply before making a motion, that it is the opinion of the committee that these officers—

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw the amendment to enable the gentleman to renew it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew it. It will take some time to reduce the Army as provided in this bill, and during that time a large number of experienced officers are certainly needed in the large departments we now have and the extended number of posts. There are nearly twelve hundred separate military posts now occupied by troops of the United States. And in addition to the reasons given, we thought it would be violent and almost in bad faith to strike down the officers at once.

Having said these few words, I move to close debate on this section.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, (renewed by Mr. GARFIELD,) and it was agreed to.

The question was next on the motion of Mr. CARY, to amend the substitute for the section offered by Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by striking out "General of the Army" and inserting "President of the United States."

Mr. BOYER demanded the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 13 in the affirmative and 71 in the negative.

So (one fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BOYER. I would inquire if a quorum voted?

The SPEAKER. It does not need a quorum. By constitutional provision one fifth of those present can order the yeas and nays. If there were only fifteen members present three could order the yeas and nays.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, as a substitute for the fourth section.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will ask if the gentleman will not consent to let the vote be taken to-morrow when we have a fuller House. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can attain his object by moving to reconsider if the amendment shall be adopted.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The Clerk then read the fifth section, as follows.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no vacancy shall hereafter be filled in the office of brigadier general until the number of brigadier generals shall be less than eight, and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the section by striking out the word "eight," in the two places where it occurs, and inserting "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out all after the enacting words of the section and to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall be but six brigadier generals, and the officers who shall retain their commissions as such shall be designated by the General of the Army without regard to seniority, and all others shall be mustered out of service on the 1st day of January next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not care to debate it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do. I propose to oppose it. Mr. Speaker, all the answer that I need to make to what is insisted upon by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and others in reply to what I have before said of the injustice of this summary mode of proceeding considered in a proper light, they have answered themselves by going for the first two sections of the bill. By their votes they admit that a General is not needed in the organization proposed for the Army. By their votes they also admit that a Lieutenant General is not needed. But, by their votes they say that in the case of the General they will wait until a vacancy occurs and then there shall be no future General appointed; and by their votes they say that in the case of the Lieutenant General, they will let him continue in office until a vacancy occurs and then no successor shall be appointed. The very principle, therefore, for which I contend as being the principle that pervades this bill, they themselves have sustained in the first and second sections of the bill. If it be right as to the General, if it be not wrong as to the Lieutenant General, then surely and on principle it is as right and as far from wrong as applied to major generals or to brigadier generals.

Mr. LOGAN. We want a head of the Army.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman says we want a head of the Army. Suppose that be so; if you abolish your General you have the Lieutenant General for the head of the Army; if you abolish the Lieutenant General you have the senior major-general; if you abolish the major generals you have the senior brigadier general; and so on. Therefore that consideration is entitled to no weight. Do what you may, you still have a head of the Army; muster out or retain, in either case there would be some officer remaining senior to all the rest. So that does not answer my proposition. All I contend for is this: enter upon your business of reducing the Army, and if these men are to be put aside, who have retained their positions under your laws, with advancement provided for them, some little provision ought to be made for them in their old age, either in the shape of half-pay, or else apply to the brigadier and major generals the same principle that you apply to the General and Lieutenant General in this bill. I will not assume that it was because it was supposed it might, perhaps, be unpopular to apply such a rule to the general or Lieutenant General that it is not applied to them; or that it was applied to these others because it was supposed it would reach a class of officers among whom would be found, in the first grade, one or two over whose removal we would shed no tears, or, in the second grade, five or six over whom none of us would weep. Yet it does look so.

Now, if we do not want a General, if we do not want a Lieutenant General, why not apply your rule of at once reducing the Army by getting rid of these still higher officers, who, if anything, are wanted still less than those of the lower grades? The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] that you would not then have a head to the Army, is no answer to the proposition, because, reduce the Army as you may, there would still be some officer senior to all the rest who would be the accepted head of the Army. It must be, therefore, that it is not thought advisable to apply the same rule to one class of officers that you propose to apply to the others, yet I cannot understand why the distinction should be drawn. I am not opposing the reduction of the Army. I am not seeking to preserve what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] seems to think my own peculiar child. I have my own opinion in regard to the reduction or the enlargement of the Army. I have my own opinion in regard both to the officers and the privates. I will not enter into a controversy as to who sympathizes most or least with the privates. I leave that for every soldier who ever served under me to decide for himself.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend the amendment pro forma by striking out the last word. This is not a new dilemma for us to be in. After the late war with Great Britain, Scott and Gaines were both major generals. They claimed rights against each other, which finally led to an open quarrel between them. To compose that quarrel, John Quincy Adams hunted up General Maccomb, who was almost paralyzed, and put him in command, in order to have a senior officer to compose the difficulties between Scott and Gaines. He also made two great military departments—the department of the East and the department of the West, and put Scott in one and Gaines in the other, so as to keep them apart; and to keep the peace between them. That went on until Maccomb died. Then came the Mexican war. After the Mexican war, the same trouble arose between Wool and Scott. Scott was made Lieutenant General by brevet—he being at the time a major general—and Wool was made a major general by brevet. That composed all difficulties there, and gave an acknowledged head.

Now, sir, the reason we did not strike down the General was that some of us have a reasonable expectation that there will be a vacancy in the course of a few months in that office; and then there being a vacancy in the office of General, it would not only be removing him for three months, if we put him on the same ground as to vacating his office with the major general.

We come, then, to the position of Lieutenant General. That officer we keep so that there may be a head to the Army—an acknowledged head with authority in his own right—not an accidental head that any President may over-throw or whose orders any President may reverse by relieving him. This is our reason for retaining the office of Lieutenant General; and this was a sufficient reason if we had no other. So we do keep the Lieutenant General until there is a vacancy.

Mr. SCHENCK. We are always to keep him, according to that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The answer to that is a very plain one. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We are now making a peace establishment for the present. We think that in the course of forty years there may be a necessity for a change. The difficulty is that gentlemen here do not want any change, if I may say so, under forty years. Now, we have ten brigadier generals. I propose six in my amendment. Why? Having three major generals, there should be two brigades and two brigadier generals to a division. My own belief is that one major general is sufficient and two brigadier generals for the whole Army. But, if I should propose that it would be considered very harsh; and I have to do the best I can when I cannot do as I would. Therefore, I have agreed to propose three major generals and six brigadier generals, a great number.

Now, I do not admit the force of the argument of my friend, the chairman of the committee, when he says that there are twelve hundred posts. There ought to be nine hundred and fifty less. And I will venture to say that none of these generals have seen one third of those posts within the last year. That being so they are absolutely of no use. Why, then, should we pension them? If you will pension your judges, if you will pension your collectors of internal revenue, especially if you will pension all the civil officers of this Government when they get to a certain age and you turn them out, then I may vote for pensioning these military officers. That is the English system, I know; and I fear we are fast verging toward it. When men are once fastened on the country it is very hard to get rid of them. But our theory of Government has been that a man is called into the service of the Government when we want him, and that he goes out when we get through with him.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in answer to what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] I desire to say that his argument in favor of retaining the Lieutenant General, if good at all, is good in favor of always having a Lieutenant General, so as to have a recognized head of the Army, not an officer who can be assigned by the President of the United States at his pleasure.

One word in regard to the section now under consideration. There are now ten brigadier generals. We have many different kinds of military duty to be performed, requiring officers of considerable rank. If the proposition presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts should prevail, we shall then have but six brigadier generals in the Army; and with our great extent of country, with the military departments and the districts within those departments, we should not have a general officer to command each leading department and sub-department.

In addition to that, let me say once for all that it has been the purpose of the Committee on Military Affairs to reduce the Army as much as we thought the condition of the country required, while at the same time we have endeavored to avoid all invidious personal distinctions and all personal injustice. And it seems to me that if we require the General of the Army to determine which of his comrades in arms shall be dropped from the Army and which retained, we shall impose upon him a duty which we ought not to ask him to perform.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then put it on the President.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is proposed to put it on the President of the United States, I ask whether gentlemen on this side of the Hall are willing that the President shall perform that duty at his discretion?

One word further. The profession of arms is recognized throughout the world as peculiar in this: that when a man has adopted it as the profession of his life, he becomes, after a time, unfitted for other pursuits. Not so in any other department of the Government to anything like the same extent. A man who lives many years in the Army cannot go to business. He is out of the range of employments which belong to civil life. It seems to me, therefore, to be a just principle recognized in England, recognized in France, recognized in all the civilized nations of the world, that an officer of the army shall be treated with some special regard in reference to his tenure of office.

I shall be sorry, sir, to see any attack upon the Army of the United States, which I believe to-day has no peer on the face of the earth; an Army made up of men who have won fame on many battle-fields, and in a manner most honorable to our country. They took their places in the Army as now constituted with the distinct understanding that they were fixed and permanent places. Why, sir, in the bill which passed when my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, it was declared in the title that it was an act "to fix the military peace establishment of the United States." Every man who took position under that law understood it was a part of the fixed and permanent establishment. Every man now holding a commission in the Army holds it as he understood at the beginning as a commission which shall not be affected except by decision of court-martial upon his own merits or demerits. Now, to say that these commissions shall be vacated, that these men shall be thrown out, is to violate all the customs of civilized nations, and all the customs of our own during all our history.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope by unanimous consent all further debate on this section will be closed.

Mr. PAINE. I hope not; I wish to say a word.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following:

There shall be but six brigadier generals after the 31st day of March 1869, and the officers who shall retain their commissions as such shall, after the tenth day of March, 1869, be designated by the President of the United States without regard to seniority, and all others shall be mustered out of the service on the 31st of March, 1869.

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I hope I should never for one moment be willing to say or do anything upon this floor or elsewhere which would seem to involve a want of appreciation of the services of the officers and enlisted men of the Army of the United States, but I cannot for one consent that any particular class of officers should be picked out and allowed upon this floor to monopolize the fruits and results of all the honor and all the merit which attached to the entire Army during the war. I cannot be satisfied to hear my friend behind me [Mr. GARFIELD] say, when so many men served gallantly and meritoriously in the last war, that a few men shall be picked out and made the recipients of the honors and benefits which we are so ready and willing to accord to the great Army which crushed the late rebellion. Let us give honor where honor is due. Let us give to these men now in the Army the honor that is due to them, but for heaven's sake do not let us shower down upon their heads all the honor won by the volunteer and regular officers and soldiers from the beginning of this war to the end.

And let us not for one moment forget the provisions of the eighth section of this bill, in which the gentleman himself proposes to put upon half pay all junior officers of the Army who shall be thrown out of full commission as the result of the consolidation of regiments from sixty down to forty-one. Let us not forget that the gentleman himself adopts in this bill the very principle he now deprecates. He says that when a man enters the Army as General Halleck did for the second time he enters it for life, and so understands it, and yet he proposes to cut out the officers of nineteen regiments who happen, indeed, to be junior in rank, but who, I venture to say, won their commissions, in a large majority of cases, on the field of battle itself.

Mr. GARFIELD. We do not cut out those men at all.

Mr. PAINE. The committee retires them from active service on half pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. No: we do not retire them. They are simply relieved temporarily, until vacancies occur.

Mr. PAINE. Call it by whatever name you will, they are virtually robbed of their commissions and left mere pensioners in the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are withheld from duty.

Mr. RAUM. There is a provision in this bill which authorizes the Secretary of War to detail these officers on special service.

Mr. PAINE. I am aware of that; it is a proviso in the eighth section.

Mr. RAUM. That proviso will certainly put very nearly all these officers on active duty.

Mr. PAINE. I cannot yield any longer. The sole effect of that is to neutralize, so far as it goes, the whole plan of reduction.

But I must ask the attention of the House to one great fallacy into which my friend has fallen. He says that when these officers entered the Army they were justified in the understanding that it would become to them a permanent position. Sir, the Constitution of the United States stands directly across the track of the gentleman when he makes that assertion. The Constitution provides that appropriations for the Army shall be limited to two years; and if we do not know it from our study of the history of the convention which framed that instrument, yet Thomas Jefferson has told us and James Madison has told us that that provision was incorporated for the express purpose of guarding against semblance of anything like permanency in the military establishment; placed there for the express purpose of affording to either branch of the Legislature an opportunity in every period of two years to abolish the Army of the United States in spite of the other branch of the Legislature and in spite of the President by withholding appropriations for its support.

Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman desire to retain all those officers?

Mr. PAINE. Oh, no.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I would not rise now but for what seems to be a very probable misunderstanding, if not misrepresentation, on the part of my friend from Wisconsin. I perfectly recognize what the gentleman says, that the Constitution of the United States provides that no appropriation for the Army shall last for more than two years. The purpose of that provision is that the civil shall always control the military establishment of the Government, and the provision is made so as to give either branch of Congress the power to control the military establishment. But I wish to know if the gentleman means, by the interpretation of the Constitution he has given, to intimate that it was ever presumed that the Congress of the United States would abolish the Army altogether?

Mr. PAINE. I will answer the gentleman that it was the design of the framers of the Constitution to put it in the power of the Senate alone or of the House alone at any time in two years to abolish the Army of the United States in spite of the other branch or in spite of the President.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I have said that myself just now. But does the gentleman suppose it was the purpose or intention of Congress ever to use that power absolutely to abolish the Army?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What is the use of having it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose every gentleman will agree that the halcyon day will never come, the glorious age will never arrive, when we will not need to keep an Army; and while we do keep it the Congress of the United States, I suppose, will endeavor to retain its valuable officers and its men of experience.

Now, one word in reply to the gentleman's suggestion that I have intimated that all the wisdom and glory of the late great struggle was concentrated in the regular Army, I am not behind any gentleman in my admiration of the great body of citizen soldiers who won the victory and saved the nation. But I desire to say that while there are thousands of noble men, not now in the Army, who did their part as worthily as any who are in it, yet our present Army has in it more history, more glory, and the record of more heroism and patriotism than any other Army that ever existed in time of peace; and I for one, though I am compelled by the necessities of the country to put the knife to the Army and reduce it nearly fifty per cent., will not by my voice or vote consent that we shall strike down by the brutal force of numbers half the official staff of the Army, only to be under the necessity of reappointing them in less than six months. By papers from the Secretary of War which I now hold in my hand, it is shown that the Army, by the reduction now going on by usual casualties, will by the 1st of July next have reached twenty-eight thousand men. Officers are resigning fast. Many who received wounds and became partially incapacitated during the war are becoming invalids. Many are leaving the Army for other reasons. All that is needed is that we simply let these patriotic men hold their positions on half pay or in regular active service for a few months, and the Army will reduce itself.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. PAINE. I will withdraw my amendment if the gentleman will renew it. I want a vote upon it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will renew it.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it in order to move to adjourn? I suggest to the gentleman who has charge of the bill that it is now nearly half past ten o'clock. We have been here for three hours. I dislike to make the motion without his consent.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] closes his remarks a motion to adjourn will be in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I will give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire if this bill will come up to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will be the unfinished business immediately after the reading of the Journal.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

On motion of Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) in relation to the Rock Island bridge were taken from the Speaker's table.

Page 2, line thirteen, after "sixty-six" insert "And provided, also, that in no case shall the expenditure on the part of the United States exceed $1,000,000."

Add the following new section:
SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That any bridge built under the provisions of this resolution shall be constructed so as to conform to the requirements of section two of an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to establish them as post roads," approved July 23, 1866.

AMENDMENTS TO PENSION BILLS.

On motion by Mr. VAN WINKLE, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the following bills of the Senate:

REGISTRATION OF FOREIGN VESSELS.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1119, reported from the Committee on Commerce. It is a bill of about twenty lines, and will not occupy any time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1119) for the registration or enrollment of certain foreign vessels was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of registry or enrollment and license to the schooner Bob, of Saint Andrew, New Brunswick; and to the following named Canadian-built vessels, to wit: the schooner Royal Albert, of Oakville; the bark John Breden, the schooner Prince Alfred, and the brigantine Orkney Lass, all of Kingston; the schooner George Henry, of Toronto; the schooner Annexation, of Port Hope; and the schooner Emperor, of Saint Catharines; also to the barges Champlain and Hochelega, of Quebec; the bark Monarch, the brig Sea Gull, and the schooner Smith and Post, all of Oakville; the schooner Welland, of Saint Catharines; the schooner Governor, of Montreal; the schooner L. S. Shicklana, of Saint Catharines; the schooner Victoria, of Toronto; those vessels being owned by citizens of the United States, and having been at all times employed upon the waters of the lakes; but there is to be paid upon each of the foreign-built vessels a tax equal to the internal revenue tax upon the materials and construction of similar vessels of American build.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 567) relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance. I presume it will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the duties and powers of Commissioner of the Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees shall continue to be discharged by the present Commissioner of the bureau, and in case of vacancy in the office occurring by reason of his death or resignation, it is to be filled by appointment of the President on the nomination of the Secretary of War, and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no officer of the Army is to be detailed for service as Commissioner or to enter upon the duties of Commissioner unless appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all assistant commissioners are to be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau. In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate the duties of Commissioner are to be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled. According to the section, the Commissioner of the bureau, on the 1st day of January next, is to cause the bureau to be withdrawn from the several States within which the bureau has acted and its operations discontinued as soon as it may be done without injury to the Government. But the educational department of the bureau and the collection and payment of moneys due the soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, is to be continued as now provided by law until otherwise ordered by act of Congress; but the provisions of this section are not to apply to any State which shall not, on the 1st of January next, be restored to its former political relations with the Government of the United States, and be entitled to representation in Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. When did that bill receive its second reading? Did it receive its second reading to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read the first and second time. The question now is on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to make some observations in opposition to this bill. It has been called up pretty suddenly. I will read the first section:

That the duties and powers of Commissioner of the Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees shall continue to be discharged by the present Commissioner of the bureau, and in case of vacancy in said office occurring by reason of his death or resignation, the same shall be filled by appointment of the President on the nomination of the Secretary of War, and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no officer of the Army shall be detailed for service as Commissioner or shall enter upon the duties of Commissioner unless appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all assistant commissioners shall be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau. In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate, the duties of Commissioner shall be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled.

Now, Mr. President, that is a subterfuge to make another encroachment upon the appointing power of the President.

All assistant commissioners shall be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau.

That selects the Commissioner himself as the appointing power. The Constitution provides that Congress may authorize the heads of Departments to appoint subordinate officers, but it nowhere authorizes Congress to give the power of nomination to an inferior of the head of a Department. But, sir, the last provision in this section is the one that is most exceptional in its principles:

In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate the duties of Commissioner shall be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled.

The express provision of the Constitution is that where vacancies in any office occur during the recess of the Senate the President shall have the power to fill them. Here is an important office, not important for its duties to the country or to the Government, not important for the necessity of the office, but important in a political point of view. Here is a sort of political adjutant general denominated the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and this portion of the section provides that in the event of that commissionership becoming vacant by the death of the Commissioner during the recess of the Senate, the President shall not exercise his constitutional function and power to fill the vacancy. That is doing by indirection and obliquely what the Senate cannot do directly. It is worse than that; it is attempting by this bill to strip the President of his plainright of making an appointment pro tempore, for the time, in the event of a vacancy occurring. Sir, will this party in Congress never pause? Will it never stop in its aggressive march upon the President of the United States in his constitutional power? Will it know no suspension in its efforts to break up the division of powers made by the Constitution, and absorb all the powers of the President? I should suppose that it ought to be somewhat appeased by its great though temporary success; but instead of that its appetite seems to be whetted by that upon which it feeds. It only seeks to gormandize upon and absorb one executive power in order to increase its appetite and its capacity to move on upon another.

Mr. CONNESS. That is savage!

Mr. DAVIS. Well, this is a most savage bill in a small way. Not satisfied with having crammed down its capacious maw the great and vast constitutional powers which were secured by the Constitution to the President, the little remnant of presidential power which has been left by its aggressions upon the President of the United States it seems determined in its voracity to wrest from the proper constitutional officer, and to exercise it itself, or that some of its minions, instead of the President, shall exercise the power. Let me read this clause:

In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate, the duties of the Commissioner shall be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled.

If the bill proposed to abolish the office on the death of the Commissioner it would be right enough; but it continues the office after the death of the Commissioner, and it provides how the Commissioner shall be appointed; in other words, it directs that the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau shall himself act as Commissioner. Does any gentleman contend that Congress has any power to pass such a bill? Suppose such a provision as that was offered in relation to the other departmental officers of the Government. Take, for instance, the Adjutant General, the Commissary General, the Quartermaster General. Suppose a bill in relation to those and all other similar offices was passed, that in the event of one of those offices becoming vacant by the death of the incumbent, it should be filled by some named officer until it could be filled during the next session of the Senate according to the direction of the act. Can gentlemen say that that would be proper, legitimate, or constitutional legislation?

The object of this provision cannot be disguised, and it could not be concealed if it was attempted to be disguised. It is purely an electioneering office, an officer maintained at the cost of the Treasury of the United States, and the object is to continue it under its present auspices in the interest of the party in power until after the next presidential election. Therefore, this clause provides that in the event of the office becoming vacant by the death of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau before the next session of Congress, another officer known to be in the interests of the party in power shall assume the exercise of the duties of that office, and in that way the President is to be excluded from his plain constitutional power to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the incumbent during the recess of the Senate.

Sir, the provision is outrageous; it has no authority whatever; and Congress is not competent to pass a law that will oust the President of his right to fill an office made vacant by the death of the incumbent during the recess of the Senate, and to fill it itself by its own direction, and by the designation of another officer who shall make the appointment pro tempore an ad interim appointment. Sir, we have lately heard a great deal said about ad interim appointments, and pro tempore appointments. This bill provides for an ad interim appointment. What functionary of the Government has the constitutional power to make an ad interim appointment under an act of Congress? The President; because he has the sole appointing power in the absence of the Senate, and the sole nominating power when the Senate is in session. In relation to all other offices, the laws have made an explicit general provision that in the event of their becoming vacant during the recess of the Senate, the President shall have the power to make ad interim appointments to them. Here this fertile and advancing party is improving and expanding upon that idea; and, instead of allowing to the President, as the general appointing power of the Government, the right to fill the vacancy thus created, it proposes to fill it itself; and thus obliquely and indirectly to deprive the Executive of the power of making the appointment ad interim.

Now, sir, protesting against this section, I will move to amend it by striking out all after the word "Senate" in line sixteen of the first section to the end of the section, and inserting "said office shall thereupon cease and determine;" so as to make the clause read:

In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate said office shall thereupon cease and determine.

Mr. CONNESS. To pass that would be a premium on taking the life of the Commissioner.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. The bill ought to be amended; but if this amendment is voted down, it can be done afterward. I think I can suggest an amendment that will remove the difficulty.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 3, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, McCleery, and Vickers—3.
NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Howard, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, and Trumbull—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to amend the bill in the thirteenth line by inserting after the words "assistant commissioners" the words "agents, clerks, and assistants," making the bill far more perfect than it would be otherwise. The clause will then read:

All assistant commissioners, agents, clerks, and assistants shall be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the proviso to the second section should be stricken out. It defeats the object of the section. The object of the section is to continue the educational department of the bureau, and the collection and payment of moneys due the soldiers, sailors, marines, or other heirs. It provides that that work shall be continued, and it ought to be continued whether the State is represented or not; but if the proviso is allowed to remain, it defeats that. It is the best provision of the bill, and it ought to be continued in those States not represented. There may be three or four States that will not be represented here, and we ought to continue the system of paying bounties and helping the colored soldiers of that section.

Mr. HOWARD. That proviso is manifestly an oversight, and it ought to be stricken out. I hope it will be stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. I move, then, to strike out the proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe, standing solitary and alone, I shall call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill. I beg pardon; I see one friend in his seat, [Mr. VICKERS.] I frankly admit that I generally have to rely upon the courtesy and magnanimity of our opponents in this Chamber to sustain me in calling for the yeas and nays. I ought to call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of this bill; but the men who profess to act with me are not here to enable me to secure the yeas and nays, or to vote and put themselves properly upon the record. That is not my fault. I shall stand up here, or endeavor to stand here, in opposition to all such measures.

Mr. HOWARD. We are very anxious to have the yeas and nays on this side of the Chamber for the purpose of enabling the honorable Senator from Kentucky to put himself on the record.

Several SENATORS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONNESS. I only desire to say that I am very much astonished at my friend from Kentucky who has labored us so much from time to time for passing these Freedmen's Bureau bills, that now, when we have a bill before us providing for its abolishment and discontinuance, he abuses that bill with might and main.

Mr. DAVIS. You do not dispose of it quite so soon as I would wish. To be sure I wish the gentlemen many years of life: I do not want them to die naturally; but I do not care how soon this concern dies officially.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the bill the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Harlan, Howard, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, McCreery, and Vickers—3. ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Salisbury, Sprague, and Sumner—20.

So the bill was passed.

DISMISSED ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 201) declaratory of the law in regard to officers cashiered or dismissed from the Army by the sentence of a general court-martial.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC ROAD THROUGH A RESERVATION.

Mr. WILSON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) donating a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation for the exclusive use of a public road.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that a strip of land one hundred feet in width along the southern boundary of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation, in the State of Kansas, extending from the Missouri river to the western boundary thereof shall be set apart for the perpetual and exclusive use of a public road.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported the bill with an amendment, to add to it the following words:

And the said road shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls or other charges upon the transportation of any property, troops, or mails of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the chairman who reported the bill, whether this is to be a road built by private parties. I understand that this is a grant of land for the purposes of a common road, with the guarantee that the Government shall not be charged for its use. What is the condition of the company or persons who are to undertake to make the road? Are they to get a gift of this land, and then private persons to be charged for its use?

Mr. WILSON. I will, in reply, call on the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. ROSS,] who introduced the bill, and who knows all about the facts of the case, and can state them with more precision than I can.

Mr. CONNESS. I will state to the Senator from Kansas what my inquiry was. The bill proposes to make a gift of land for the purpose of establishing a public road to be established for that purpose, and forever securing the free use of it to the Government. I inquire by whom the road is to be established and built, and whether private persons are to be charged tolls, or under what condition it is to be used?

Mr. ROSS. The design is what the bill expresses—a public road for the purposes of the Government as well as of citizens. It is upon land owned by the Government, and is to be free.

Mr. CONNESS. That is all I desire to know.

Mr. ROSS. The company make the road running through the reservation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1227) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis;

A bill (H. R. No. 1320) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co., and Peter Rosecrantz;

A bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1306) for the relief of Captain A. G. Olivar;

A bill (H. R. No. 1370) to fix the time for holding the terms of the United States district court in Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1378) to declare the meaning of the several acts in relation to retired officers of the Army;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 288) amendatory of joint resolution for the relief of certain officers of the Army, approved July 26, 1866;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 310) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to the loyal citizens of the State of Arkansas; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to grant an American register to Hawaiian brig Victoria.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river, upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-Shooting Association, in the District of Columbia, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. D.

BALDWIN of Massachusetts, Mr. M. WELKER of Ohio, and Mr. A. J. GLOSSBRENNER of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

EDWARD B. ALLEN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up House bill No. 1080, for the relief of Edward B. Allen.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It is a direction to the Paymaster General of the Army to pay to Edward B. Allen, of the State of Indiana, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the full amount of the pay and emoluments of a captain of infantry from the 18th day of August to the 1st day of November, 1862.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will make a brief statement for about a minute about this case, and then if the Senator from California, [Mr. COLE,] who reported adversely upon it, desires its recommittal, I shall have no objection. The facts that I state I believe are known personally to my colleague, who was the Governor of the State at the time.

Captain Allen was elected captain of his company and went into the service; but he was not commissioned, and therefore did not receive his pay as a commissioned officer. Perhaps he did not desire to take his commission, because at the time he was holding a lucrative county office, the office of county auditor, and it was supposed if he did not take the commission and went into the war and discharged the duties, the county office would not be disturbed; but the supreme court of the State decided that the taking of the command without a commission took away his county office. That is a fact which was not known to the committee at the time they made their report.

If upon this statement of the facts, the committee desires the recommittal of the bill, I have no objection to it; but it seems to me, as the bill is so inconsiderable, it might as well be passed. The other House passed it, knowing these facts which were not communicated to the committee of this body. It is simply to give him the pay of the command that he actually had. He went into the field and commanded a company, and was an able officer. His pay was not allowed him at the Department because he had no commission, and he had not a commission because he held a county office, which county office, worth three or four thousand dollars a year, he lost because he took the command.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the Senator if he drew the pay for the county office during any part of the time for which this bill is reported?

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; the litigation came up, and it went to the supreme court, and the supreme court decided that he was not entitled.

Mr. HARLAN. For any part of it?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose not. The exact details I cannot give. The supreme court decided that the taking of the command lost him his county office.

Mr. COLE. The committee to whom this bill was referred had less objection to paying this very small amount claimed by Mr. Allen for his proper services than to establishing a precedent. But as stated by the Senator from Indiana, it was not at the time known to the committee that the party was deprived of the civil office that he was occupying. That did not appear in the papers referred to the committee, and the report of the committee was based upon the presumption, among others, that he was at the time occupying a civil office and receiving compensation for that. I will not insist upon a reference of the case to the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I had personal knowledge of this transaction at the time it took place. It was some time ago. I take it my colleague has stated the facts correctly. Mr. Allen did not receive actually a captain's commission at the time with a view of holding on to and receiving the emoluments of the office of county auditor; but the supreme court decided that accepting the command was equivalent to receiving a commission. He therefore lost the office of county auditor, and having no commission he got no pay for his services in the Army. I think he ought to be paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPANY F, EIGHTEENTH INFANTRY.

Mr. THAYER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 281) authorizing the issue of clothing to company F, eighteenth regiment United States infantry, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and I ask for its present consideration. It is a resolution of but a few lines, and will occupy only the time required in reading it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It is an authority to the Secretary of War to issue to the thirty-three enlisted men of company F, eighteenth regiment United States infantry, clothing in lieu of and equal in amount to that lost by them in crossing the North Platte river, in June, 1866, as shown and recommended in the report of the board of survey convened under Special Orders No. 3, headquarters post Fort Bridger, Utah, of date of January 24, 1867.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to submit a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which I send to the desk to be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 603) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, having met after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective House, as follows:

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
T. A. HENDRICKS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will make a general statement in regard to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me call the Senator's attention to one point before he begins. The provision in regard to advertising, as it appears to me, as I heard the latter part of it read, by implication clearly authorizes the publication of such advertisements in other papers than those named, "unless selected by the head of a Department."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Clerk to read the latter part of that provision, and I call the attention of the chairman to it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no advertisement to any State, district, or Territory, other than the District of Columbia, Maryland, or Virginia, shall be published in the papers designated, unless, at the direction first made of the proper head of a Department.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, sir, it appears to me clearly, by implication, they may publish them, "if not directed by the head of a Department," that is under other circumstances, in any other paper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This report presents the bill very much as it came from the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate and as it was perfected by the Senate when it was returned to the House of Representatives. It is substantially that. I will name the general exceptions in which it differs, and then I will notice what the honorable Senator from California has drawn my attention to.

The first material exception to the statement I have made that this is substantially the bill as it was left by the action of the Senate is the appropriation for the execution of the laws in regard to loans. The Senate proposed to appropriate $1,600,000. This report leaves it at $1,250,000.

Then the Senate agreed to appropriate $8,000,000 for the expenses of the internal revenue. The House proposition was $6,000,000. The committee of the Senate and the Senate concurred in raising it to $8,000,000. This report puts it at $6,000,000 upon the ground that there has been a large deduction in the taxes, or rather in abatement of the taxes, which will necessarily tend to decrease the expenses, and then, as we understand, the large reduction in the force renders it probable that $6,000,000 will answer for the expenses of that Department this year.

There is one particular to which I think I ought to call the attention of the Senate, and that is the Department of Education. It will be noticed that the original establishment of the Department as a Department of Education is to cease at the close of the present fiscal year, that is June 30, 1869; but provision is made for a Commissioner, who is to be transferred to the Interior Department, and subject to the directions and authority of the head of that Department, and his duties are to be those of the present Commissioner.

Pretty much all the other amendments relate to the clerks in the several Departments. They are limited; but it is of no great consequence, I suppose, that I should detail the amendments in regard to those matters.

Now, in regard to the question to which the Senator from California adverts, the understanding of the committee is that all laws, treaties, and advertisements required by law to be published in the States of Virginia and Maryland, and the District of Columbia, are to be published in the papers which are authorized by law to make this publication.

Mr. CONNESS. I am satisfied.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the Senator is satisfied that the objection is not sound, and therefore, that unless some Senator desires a further explanation, I will say no more.

The report was concurred in.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 1354) to provide for the issue of arms for the use of the militia.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts, I move to postpone the unfinished business and all prior orders and take up the special order for one o'clock to-day, the funding bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form and of such denominations as he may prescribe, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States, after twenty, thirty, and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say: the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent. which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes; and the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption, payment, or purchase of, or exchange for, an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States, other than the existing five per cent. bonds and the three per cent. certificates, and may be issued to an amount, in the aggregate, sufficient to cover the principal of all outstanding or existing obligations as limited herein, and no more, but not to exceed $700,000,000 dollars shall be of the issue redeemable in twenty years.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there is hereby appropriated out of the duties derived from imported goods the sum of $135,000,000 annually, which sum during each fiscal year shall be applied to the payment of the interest, and to the reduction of the principal of the public debt, in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, or as Congress may hereafter direct; and such reduction shall be in lieu of the sinking fund contemplated by the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States" approved February 25, 1862.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the holder of any lawful money of the United States, to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple of $1,000, may convert the same into bonds for an equal amount, authorized by the first section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and any holder of any of the bonds provided for in the first section of this act, may present the same to the Treasurer of the United States and demand lawful money of the United States for the principal and accruing interest thereon, and the Treasurer shall redeem the same in lawful money of the United States, unless the amount of the United States notes then outstanding shall be equal to $400,000,000; and such bond shall not be so redeemable after the United States have resumed the payment of coin for their notes.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms, anything in the several acts relating to United States notes to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the general subject of funding the public debt. I did that in January last, and have no desire to repeat the argument I then submitted to the Senate. I am willing to stand on what I then said. My position has only been strengthened by the debates since that time.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I hope he will tell us wherein the first section of this bill differs from the law of 1866, the present authority of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the question of the Senator when we proceed to consider the details of the bill.

Recent events, however, show the importance, the absolute necessity of making some movement toward the reduction of the interest on the public debt, with a view to lighten the burdens of the people. The Chicago convention pledged the Republican party to make vigorous efforts to reduce the rate of interest on the public debt. The platform is familiar to all. The majority of the House of Representatives, comprising men of both parties, and the recent Democratic convention at New York, propose to lessen the burdens of the public debt by taxing the income from it. This subject is exciting a great deal of attention and anxiety among the people. There is a universal demand that the burden of the public debt, which now bears six per cent. in gold, shall be reduced as rapidly as possible, either by funding it at a lower rate of interest, or by taxing it in some form or other by the States or by the national Government.

These are questions that I do not propose now to discuss at any length. My convictions are that the States cannot tax the Government securities. The loan laws expressly prohibit this. The United States has been in debt since the foundation of the Government, and no party ever proposed to tax the Government securities until the Democratic party proposed to do it. The courts have always held that there is no power in a State government to tax the Government securities. It is inherent in the nature of our Government. The power to borrow money is a power necessary to the existence of the Government, and no subordinate authority can affect that power. It is not necessary to discuss these questions further than to refer to the cases, and that I have already done.

Nor can the United States impose a discriminating tax against Government securities. The United States may impose the same tax on the income derived from Government securities that it does on other incomes. There can be no objection to that. It is done by the English and other Governments. But the United States cannot make a discriminating property income tax against Government securities. Such a thing would be a plain and palpable violation of the tenor of the loan acts.

It ought never to be tolerated or thought of by any one. I was very much gratified, and I think that is the opinion of the whole Senate, at the prompt action of the Committee of Ways and Means on the proposition sent to them by the House of Representatives.

The only way, in my judgment, to reduce the burden of the public debt is by selling our bonds at a lower rate of interest and redeeming existing bonds according to the spirit and terms of the law under which they were issued. It can be done now. The state of the money market is such that we can do it now. I have no doubt that a simple offer now made to the bondholders will induce many of them to accept bonds at a lower rate of interest, and thus, without disturbing or affecting the public credit, reduce the rate of interest considerably.

Upon another point. I have no doubt, I said here in January last, that the Government of the United States have now the right to pay the principal of the five-twenty bonds, as they mature or become redeemable, in the lawful money of the United States. We have no power and no right, without violating public faith, to issue any more greenbacks, because the law under which our bonds were negotiated limits the amount of greenbacks to $400,000,000, and we cannot violate that stipulation by increasing the quantity of greenbacks or lawful money. But so fast as this money comes into the Treasury of the United States, either by taxes or by new loans, we have a right to apply those taxes or that money to the payment of the principal of the public debt, precisely as we have a right to apply it to the payment of pensions or salaries, or any other expenditure of the Government. The law makes no such discrimination in favor of bondholders. The only discrimination that is made is in regard to interest. That is expressly provided to be paid in gold coin. In regard to the principal there is no stipulation as to the five-twenty loan. There is a stipulation in regard to the ten-forty loan, and no one proposes to violate it. But the committee do not present that question. It is a question upon which there is a difference of opinion among men of all parties. We do not wish to present that question by the bill, nor does the bill present the question.

This bill is simply an authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the bonds of the United States of a specific character at a price that will enable him to redeem dollar for dollar the outstanding six per cent. bonds of the United States. It is so carefully prepared that the Secretary has no authority to sell except as he is able to redeem an equal amount, dollar for dollar, of existing bonds. So that the question upon which there is a difference of opinion among us as Republicans and as Senators about the power of the United States to pay off the bonds as they mature in lawful money does not arise.

My own deliberate judgment, however, is that we have the right to do it; and that, unless this conversion is made in a reasonable time by the voluntary action and interest of the bondholders, that power will be exercised. The state of the money market shows that this is the general opinion of the commercial world, because the difference between the ten-forties and five-twenties does not exceed three or four per cent. I have no doubt that a proposition to give to the holders of these bonds a bond bearing five per cent. interest payable in twenty years will be accepted by them; or if not, the Secretary may go into the markets of the world and sell these new bonds at a price that will enable him to take up and buy in the open market the five-twenty bonds; so that the question about which there is a difference of opinion will be postponed. If the state of the money market will not allow him to do this, the bill does no harm.

This bill contains four distinct propositions, all of which ought to go together. The first is that a bond bearing a lower rate of interest may be exchanged or sold to redeem a bond bearing a higher rate of interest. The second proposition is that a specific sum of $135,000,000 in gold shall be set aside for the payment of the interest on the public debt, and for the redemption of the principal. If this is allowed its uninterrupted course, it will pay off the whole national debt in thirty-five years. The effect of a fixed appropriation operates as a sinking fund. As the interest is diminished by funding, the amount to be applied to the principal increases. The reduction proposed on the first five-twenty loan of $500,000,000 will operate as a saving to the United States of $269,912,460 by the year 1898, when it becomes payable. I will append a carefully prepared table to these remarks showing this in detail.

The next proposition is that the holder of a greenback shall stand on precisely the same footing as the holder of a bond; that whatever privilege is conferred upon the holder of a bond shall be conferred upon the holder of a greenback; that the holder of a United States note may go and present it at the Treasury and demand a bond for it, and that the holder of a five-twenty bond may go and present it at the Treasury and demand a new bond for it. By this simple provision we answer the demagogical cry so prevalent in the country that one kind of currency is provided for the poor man and another for the rich man, because we place the United States note on a precise footing with the most favored security now offered in the market. Unless this is done the man who is compelled to receive your United States note, which is, after all, a promise of the Government to pay on demand, is placed in a more disadvantageous position than the person who holds your bond payable in the long future. This provision is inserted for the purpose of making an equality between the bondholder and the noteholder, to remove the discrimination between them. All discriminations between different kinds of debt, between note-holders and bondholders are anti-republican, and should be dispensed with as rapidly as possible.

The last section of the bill is simply the bill that the Senate have already unanimously passed, providing that the people may, if they choose, trade in gold. Under the existing laws merchants are compelled to buy large amounts of gold to pay duties, and yet they cannot make a legal contract, according to the construction of some of the courts, payable in gold. The result is, that they are embarrassed. Frauds may be committed. Contracts made upon the basis of gold must be enforced by the courts in lawful money. This section simply restores to the people the right to trade as they please, to do as they please, and authorizes the courts to enforce those contracts according to their letter and spirit. This section has been objected to, I believe, by the Senator from Minnesota because it might enable the rich man to demand a gold contract for the purpose of raising the rate of interest. Such a contract would be usurious, and would not be enforced.

Mr. RAMSEY. How does the Senator know that? It is not so upon the face of the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the contract is made upon the basis of paper money, and the stipulation to pay in gold is merely used as a device or means to extort usury, it is a usurious contract and will not be enforced. This section only applies to contracts hereafter made that are based upon gold values—to be paid in gold in the future, and therefore it is perfectly just and right. Indeed, my own opinion is, that under the legal-tender clause there is nothing to prevent the enforcement of contracts based upon gold being enforced in gold; but there is a difference of opinion on that point in the legal profession, and many of the courts have held that a contract payable in gold, based upon gold, where gold was lent, may be enforced now in the lawful money of the United States, creating an injustice which is as wrong as would be a forfeiture of a portion of the debt.

Now, Mr. President, these principles are involved in this bill. I believe that the public judgment demands that we should take some steps, this much at least, toward equalizing the position of the noteholder and the bondholder and toward reducing the interest of the public debt. At this late period of the session I do not intend to renew the discussion of last January; but if Senators wish fuller information on the subject than I now choose to give them, they will find in the remarks made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and by myself, statistical information that will enable them properly to answer most of the questions that would naturally arise in this debate. It is scarcely worth while at this period of the session to repeat these arguments, especially by those who participated in the former debate:

Table A.

Thus by exchanging with the holders of $500,000,000 of five-twenties of 1862 the country is saved:

1. Till the maturity of the five-twenties in 1882..... $101,764,085
2. From 1882 till the maturing of a new thirty-year bond..... 168,148,875

Total saving till 1898..... $269,912,450

It is thus plain that more than half of the $500,000,000 would be self-extinguished by 1898. The other half would be redeemed by the strict application and operation of the one per cent. out of customs receipts, which is stated in the act of 1862.

The same principles and figures will apply to the five-twenties of 1864 and 1865, except that the country would gain two and three years more savings in the diminution of interest.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill before the Senate opens the whole question of financial reconstruction. I do not know but that the Senator from Ohio would prefer to proceed with the amendments or the consideration of details, but if not disagreeable to him at this stage, I should like to proceed with its discussion in some of its more general aspects.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that I shall be very glad to hear him upon the general proposition, but this amendment now offered is the careful result of the frequent deliberations of the Committee on Finance, and I do not know that the members of that committee desire to change a single word of it. We desire that the Senate shall not adopt any amendments to this amendment unless they appeal themselves clearly to their judgment, because the amendment, as it is now offered, is the result of our deliberate consideration, and the striking out of a word, or any material alteration might very seriously change the meaning of the bill. We have no proposition to make and no amendment to offer except this.

Mr. SUMNER. If I should not interfere, then, with the plans of the Senator, I will proceed now.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. After a tempest sweeping sea and land, strewing the coast with wrecks; and tumbling houses to the ground, nature must become propitious before the energy of man can repair the various losses. Time must intervene. At last ships are launched again and houses are built, in larger numbers and fairer forms than before. A tempest has swept over us, scourging in every direction; and now that its violence has ceased we are occupied in the work of restoration. Nature is already propitious, and time, too, is silently preparing the way, while the national energies are applied to the work.

To know what to do we must comprehend the actual condition of things and how it was brought about. All this is easy to see, if we will only look.

FINANCIAL QUESTION A PART OF THE POLITICAL.

It is a mistake of too constant occurrence to treat the financial question by itself, without considering its dependence upon the abnormal condition through which the country has passed. The financial question, in all its branches, depends upon the political, and cannot be separated from it. I might use stronger language. It is a part of the political question, and now that reconstruction seems about to be accomplished, it is that enduring part which still remains.

THE REBELLION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES, POLITICAL AND FINANCIAL.

Our present responsibilities, whether political or financial, have a common origin in that vast rebellion, when the people of eleven States, maddened by slavery, rose against the Nation. As the rebellion was without example in its declared object, so it was without example in the extent and intensity of its operations. It sought nothing less than the dismemberment of our Nation and the establishment of a new power with slavery as its quickening principle. The desperate means enlisted by such a cause could be encountered only by the most strenuous exertions, in the name of country and of Human Rights. Here was slavery, barbarous, brutal, vindictive, warring for recognition. The tempest or tornado can typify only feebly the ravage that ensued. There were days of darkness and despair, when the national existence was in peril. Rebel armies menaced the Capitol, and slavery seemed about to vindicate its wicked supremacy.

Looking at the scene in its political aspects, we behold one class of disorders; and looking at it in its financial aspects, we behold still another; both together constituting a fearful sum total, where financial disorder mingles with political. Turn, first, to the political, and you will see States, one after the other renouncing their relations with the Nation, and constituting a new government, under the name of confederacy, with a new constitution, making slavery its corner-stone; all of which they sought to maintain by arms, while, in aggravation of these perils, Foreign Powers gave ominous signs of speedy recognition and support. Look, next, to the financial side, and you will see business in some places entirely prostrate, in others suddenly assuming new forms; immense interests destroyed; property annihilated; the whole people turned from the thoughts of peace to the thoughts of war; vast armies set on foot, in which the youthful and strong were changed from producers to destroyers, while life itself was consumed; an unprecedented taxation, commensurate with the unprecedented exigency; and all this followed by the common incident of war in other countries and times, first, the creation of a national debt, and, secondly, the substitution of inconvertible paper as a currency. In this catalogue of calamities, political and financial, who shall say which was the worst? Certainly, it is difficult to distinguish between them. One grew out of the other, so that they belong together and constitute one group, all derived ultimately from the rebellion, and directly depending upon it. So long as slavery continued in arms, each and all waxed in vastness; and now, so long as any of these remain, they testify to this same unnatural crime. The tax-gatherer, taking so much from honest industry, was born of the rebellion. Inconvertible paper, deranging the business of the country at home and abroad, had the same monstrous birth. Our enormous taxation is only a prolongation of the rebellion. Every greenback is red with the blood of fellow-citizens.

To repair these calamities, political and financial, the first stage was the overthrow of the rebellion in the field, thus enabling the Nation to reduce its armaments, to arrest its accumulating debt, and to cease anxiety on account of foreign intervention so constantly menaced. Thus relieved, we were brought to a resting place, and the nation found itself in condition to begin the work of restoration.

POLITICAL RECONSTRUCTION.

Foremost came the suppression of slavery, in which the rebellion had its origin. Common prudence, to say nothing of common humanity, required this consummation, without which there would have been a short-lived truce only. So great a change necessarily involved other changes, while there was the ever-present duty to obtain from the defeated rebels, if not indemnity for the past at least security for the future. It was impossible to stop with the suppression of slavery. That whole barbarous code of wrong and outrage, whose first article was the denial of all rights to an oppressed race, was grossly inconsistent with the new order of things. It was necessary that it should yield to the Equal Rights of All, promised by the Declaration of Independence. The citizen, lifted from slavery, must be secured in all his rights, civil and political. Loyal governments, republican in form, must be substituted for rebel governments. All this being done, the States, thus transformed, will assume once more their ancient relations to the Nation. This is the work of political reconstruction, constituting the new stage after the overthrow of the rebellion.

FINANCIAL RECONSTRUCTION DEPENDS ON POLITICAL.

Meanwhile there has been an effort and a longing for financial reconstruction also—sometimes without sufficiently reflecting that there can be small chance for any success in this direction until after political reconstruction. Here also we must follow nature, and restore by removing the disturbing cause. This is the natural process. Vain all attempt to reconstruct the national finances while the rebellion was still in arms. This must be obvious to all. Vain also while slavery still domineered. Vain also while Equal Rights are without a sure defense against the oppressor. Vain also while the Nation still palpitates with its efforts to obtain security for the future. Vain also until the States are all once more harmonious in their native spheres, like the planets, receiving and dispensing light.

Nothing is more sensitive than credit, which is the essential element of financial restoration. A breath will make it flutter. How can you expect to restore the national credit, now unnaturally sensitive, while the Nation is still uneasy from those rebel pretensions, which have cost so much? Security is the first condition of financial reconstruction; and I am at a loss to find any road to it, except through political reconstruction. All this seems so plain, that I ought to apologize for dwelling on it. And yet there are many, who, while professing a desire for an improvement in our financial condition, perversely turn their backs upon the only means by which this can be accomplished. Never was there equal folly. Language cannot picture it. Every denial of Equal Rights—every impediment to a just reconstruction in conformity with the Declaration of Independence—every pretension of a "white man's government" in horrid mockery of self-evident truths declared by our fathers, and of that brotherhood of mankind declared by the sermon on "Mars' Hill"—is a bar to that financial reconstruction without which the Rebellion still lingers among us. So long as a dollar of irredeemable paper is forced upon the country, the Rebellion still lives—in its spurious progeny.

Party organization and Presidential antagonism have thus far stood in the way, while at each stage individual perverseness has played its part. The President has set himself obstinately against political reconstruction; so also has the Democratic party. Others have followed, according to the prejudices of their nature; and so the national finances have suffered. Not the least of the offenses of Andrew Johnson is the adverse influence he has exerted on this question. All that he has done from the beginning has tended to protract the rebellion and to extend the disorder of our finances. And yet there are many not indifferent to the later, who have looked with indifference upon his criminal conduct. So far as their personal interests depended on an improved condition of the finances, they have already suffered; but it is hard that the country should suffer also. Andrew Johnson has postponed specie payments, and his supporters of all degrees must share the responsibility.

Such is my confidence in the resources of our country, in the industry of its people, and in the grandeur of its destinies, that I cannot doubt the transcendent future. Alas! that it should be interrupted by unwise counsels, even for a day. Financial reconstruction is postponed only. It must come at last. Here I have no panacea that is not as simple as nature. I know of no device or trick or medicine by which this cure can be accomplished. It will come with the general health of the body politic. It will come with the renovated life of the Nation, when it is once more complete in form, when every part is in sympathy with the whole, and the rebellion, with all its offspring, is trampled out forever. In such a condition of affairs, inconvertible paper would be an impossibility, as much as a bill of sale for a human being.

FAITH TO BE KEPT WITH THE NATIONAL FREEDMEN.

Meanwhile there are certain practical points which must not be forgotten. Foremost among these I put the absolute dependence of the national finances upon the faithful performance of all our obligations to the national freedmen. Pardoned rebels will never look with complacency upon the national debt, or the interest which testifies semi-annually to its magnitude. Their political colleagues at the North will be apt to sympathize with them. Should the scales at any time hang doubtful it is to others that we must turn to adjust the balance. Therefore, for the sake of the national finances, I insist that the national freedmen shall be secured and maintained in Equal Rights, so that local prejudices and party cries shall be unavailing against them. You who have at heart the national credit, on which so much depends, must never fail to cherish the national freedmen, treating their enemies as if they were your enemies. Every blow at them will rebound upon yourselves.

DIMINUTION OF TAXATION AND SPECIE PAYMENT BOTH NECESSARY.

In dealing with the financial question there are two other points of ever-present importance. First, the necessity of diminishing, so far as practicable, the heavy burden of taxation so oppressive to the people; and, secondly, the necessity of substituting specie for inconvertible paper. Here are two objects which when accomplished will add infinitely to the wealth and happiness of the country, besides being the assurance that the Nation has at last reached that condition of repose so much longed for.

THE PUBLIC FAITH MUST BE SACREDLY PRESERVED.

Before considering these two points in detail, I venture to remark that there is one condition preliminary in character and equally essential to both, through which taxation will be lightened and specie payments will be hastened. I refer to the Public Faith, which must be sacredly preserved above all question or suspicion. The word of our Nation must be as good as its bond; and nobody must attempt to take a title from either. Nothing short of universal wreck can justify any such bankruptcy. Let the Public Faith be preserved, and all that you now seek will be easy.

A virtuous king of early Rome dedicated a temple in the capitol itself to a Divinity under the name of Publica Fides, who was represented with a wreath of laurel about her head, carrying ears of corn and a basket of fruit—typical of honor and abundance sure to follow in her footsteps. In the same spirit another temple was dedicated to the god Terminus, who presided over boundaries. The stones set up to mark the limits of estates were sacred, and on these very stones there were religious offerings to the god. The heathen maledictions upon the violator were echoed also by the Hebrews when they said, "Cursed be he that removeth his neighbor's landmark, and all the people shall say, Amen." (Deut., ch. xxvii., v. 37.) In those early Roman and Hebrew days there was no national debt divided into bonds; there was nothing but land. But a national bond is as well-defined as a piece of land. Here, then, is a place for the god Terminus. Every obligation is like a landmark not to be removed without curses. Here also is a place for that other Divinity, Publica Fides, with laureled head, and hands filled with corn and fruit.

Public Faith may be seen in the evil which springs from its loss and in the good which overflows from its preservation. It is like honor, and yet once lost, more than dishonor is the consequence; once assured, more than honor is the reward. It is a possession surpassing all others in value. The gold and silver in your Treasury may be counted; it stands recorded, dollar for dollar, in the national ledger, but the sums which the unsuspected credit of a magnanimous Nation can command are beyond the record of any ledger. Public Faith is more than mines of silver or gold. Only from Arabian story can a fit illustration be found, as when, after all human effort had failed, the genius of the lamp reared the costly palace and stored it with beauty. Public Faith is in itself a treasury, a tariff, and an internal revenue, all in one. These you may lose; but if the other is preserved it will be only for a day. The Treasury will be replenished; the tariff will be renewed; the internal revenue will be restored. With Public Faith as an unfailling law, the nation, like Pactolus, will sweep over golden sands, or, like Midas, it will change into gold whatever it touches. Keep, then, the Public Faith as the "open sesame" to all that you can desire; keep it as you would keep the philosopher's stone of fable, having which you have all.

And yet, in the face of this plain commandment, on which hangs so much of all that is most prized in national existence, we are called to break faith. It is proposed to tax the national bonds, in violation of the original bargain on which the money was lent. Sometimes the tax is to be by the Nation and sometimes by the States. The power to do this wrong you may possess; but the right never. Do what you will, there is one thing you cannot do: you cannot make wrong right. It is in vain that you undertake to set aside the perpetual obligation which you have assumed. Against every such pretension, whether by speech or vote, there is this living duty, which will survive Congress and politician alike. Puny as the hand of a child is the effort to undo this original bargain. The Nation has promised six per cent. interest, payable semi-annually in coin, nor more nor less without any abatement, and then having bound itself, it proceeds to guard against the States by declaring specifically that the bonds shall be "exempt from taxation by or under State authority." Such is the bargain.

There it is; and it must continue unchanged, except by the consent of the parties, until the laws of the universe tumble into chaos.

The rogue in Shakespeare exclaims, "What a foolish honesty! and trust, his sworn brother, a very simple gentleman!" In equal levity it is said, tax the bonds, although, by the original bargain on which the money was obtained, amid the trials of war, for the safety of the Nation, it was expressly stipulated that these bonds should not be taxed. Nevertheless, tax the bonds. Of course, by taxing the bonds, the bargain is brutally broken; and this, too, after the Nation has used the money. Such a transaction in common life, except where bankruptcy had supervened, would be intolerable. A proud nation justly sensitive to national honor, as the great Republic, through whose example liberal institutions are commended to mankind, cannot do this thing.

The proposition to tax the bonds, in open violation of the original bargain, is similar in spirit to that other enterprise, which, under various discordant ensigns, proposes to pay the national bonds with inconvertible paper. Here at once and on the threshold Public Faith interposes a summary protest. On such a question debate even is dangerous; the man who doubts is lost. The money was borrowed and lent on the undoubting faith that it was to be paid in coin. Nothing to the contrary was suggested, imagined, or dreamed, at the time. Behind all forms of language and even all omissions, this obligation stands forth, in the nature of the case, explained and confirmed by the history of our national loans and by the official acts of successive Secretaries of the Treasury interpreting the obligations of the Nation.

NO PAYMENT OF BONDS BY GREENBACKS.

So much stress is laid upon the language of the five-twenties that I cannot let it pass. The terms employed were precisely those in previous bonds of the United States where the principal was paid in coin; some of which are still outstanding. Had there been any doubt about the meaning it was fixed by the general understanding and by special declarations of responsible persons speaking for the Nation. On 26th May, 1863, Mr. Harrington, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in an official letter, says: "These bonds will, therefore, be paid in gold." On 16th February, 1864, Mr. Field, also Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, writes: "I am directed by the Secretary to say that it is the purpose of the Government to pay said bonds, like other bonds of the United States, in coin at maturity." On 18th May, 1864, Mr. Chase, at the time Secretary of the Treasury, wrote: "These bonds, according to the usage of the Government, are payable in coin." Mr. FESSENDEN, while Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report to Congress, expressed the same conclusion; and his successor, Mr. McCulloch, in a letter of 15th May, 1866, says: "I regard, as did also my predecessors, all bonds of the United States as payable in coin." There are also numerous advertisements from the Treasury and from its business agents, all in the same sense.

Here is a succession of authorities embracing high functionaries of the United States, all concurring in affixing upon these bonds the obligation to pay in coin. As testimony to the meaning of the bonds, it is important; but considering that all these persons represented the national Treasury, and that they were the agents of the Nation for the sale of these very bonds, their representations are more than testimony. Until their authority is disowned by Congress and their representations discarded, it is difficult to see why their language must not be treated as part of the contract, at least in all sales subsequent to its publication. The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] apparently feeling the pressure of this argument, explicitly says that "Congress never acquiesced," thus admitting the force of acquiescence, if it could be shown, and he then adds that Congress "was not in session when any portion of this loan was sold." Congress adjourned on the 17th of July, 1863; but the letter of Assistant Secretary Harrington of the 26th May, antedates this adjournment nearly two months, during which time Congress might have set aside this explicit representation that the bonds would be "paid in gold." It did no such thing, and the sales were proceeded with. It must not be forgotten that these original sales were mainly to bankers and brokers and in large amounts for the purpose of resale to small purchasers seeking investments. It was in reply to parties interested in these resales that the subsequent letters of Assistant Secretary Field and of Mr. Chase were written, pledging the Nation to payment in coin. At the date of these important letters Congress was in session, and although the opportunity was constant, there was no protest against the meaning thus authoritatively affixed to these obligations. The bonds were in the market, advertised and sold daily, with a value established by the representations of these national agents; and Congress did not interfere to set aside these representations. By subsequent acts, similar loans were authorized and nobody protested. There was the supplementary clause of 3d March, 1864, for the issue of eleven millions of these bonds to cover an excess subscribed above the amount authorized by the original act. This was debated in the Senate on the 1st March, 1864; but you will search the Globe in vain for any protest. Then came other acts, at different dates, by which the loan was further enlarged to its present extent, and all the time these representations were uncontradicted. Against them there was no act of Congress, no protest, nothing. If this is not "acquiescence," then I am at a loss to know how acquiescence can be shown. Therefore do I insist that these representations are a part of the contract by which the Nation is bound.

It is said that, in the five-twenties bonds, there are words promising interest in coin, but nothing with regard to the principal. Forgetting the contemporary understanding and the official interpretation, and assuming that at maturity the bond is no better than a greenback, it becomes important to know the character of this obligation. On its face a greenback is a promise to pay a certain number of dollars. It is paper, and it promises to pay "dollars." Here is an example which I take from my pocket: "The United States promise to pay to the bearer five dollars." Not five dollars in paper, or in some other substituted promise; but "five dollars," which can mean nothing else than the coin known over the world with the stamp of Spain, Mexico, and the United States, being a fixed value, which passes current in every zone and at the antipodes. The "dollar" is an established measure of value, like the five-franc piece of France, or the pound sterling of England. As well say that, on a promise to pay so many francs in France, or so many pounds sterling in England, you could honestly acquit yourself by handing over a scrap of printed paper, inconvertible in value. This could not be done. The promise in our greenbacks carries with it an ultimate obligation to pay the silver dollar, whose chink is so familiar in the commerce of the world. The convertibility of the greenback is for the present suspended; but when paid, it must be in coin. To pay with another promise is to renew, and not to discharge the debt. But the obligation in our bonds is to pay "dollars" also, whenever the bonds are paid; it may be after five years, or, in the discretion of the Nation, not till twenty years. But when paid it must be in "dollars." Such is the stipulation; nor could the addition of "coin" or "gold" essentially change this obligation. It is contrary to reason that a bond should be paid in an inferior obligation. It is dishonest to force inconvertible paper without interest in payment of an interest-bearing obligation. The statement of the case is enough. Such an attempt disturbs the reason and shocks the moral sense.

Between the bond and the greenback, there is an obvious distinction, doubly-attested by the act of Congress creating them both; for they were created together. This distinction appears, first, in the title of the act, and, secondly in its provisions. According to its title it is "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof and for funding the floating debt of the United States." In brief, greenbacks were made a legal tender, and authority was given to fund them in these bonds. This appears in the very title of the act. Now the object of funding is to bring what is uncertain and floating into a permanent form; and accordingly greenbacks were funded and placed on interest. The bonds were a substitute for the greenbacks; but the new theory makes the greenbacks a substitute for the bonds. To carry forward still further the policy of the act, it was provided that the greenbacks might be exchanged at once for bonds; and then, by the act of 11th July, 1862, it was further provided that these very greenbacks "may be paid in coin," at the direction of the Secretary, instead of being received in exchange for bonds;—thus treating the bonds as the equivalent of coin. The subsequent repeal of these provisions does not alter the testimony to the character of these bonds. Thus, at every turn, we are brought to the same conclusion. The dishonor of these obligations, whatever form it may assume, and whatever pretext it may adopt, is nothing but repudiation.

ALL REPUDIATION DISHONORABLE.

The word repudiation, now so generally used to denote the refusal to pay national obligations, has been known in this sense only recently. In the early dictionaries of our language, it had no such signification. According to Dr. Johnson, it meant simply "divorce," "rejection," as when a man put away his wife. It began to be known in its present sense when Mississippi, the State of Jefferson Davis, dishonored her bonds. From that time the word has been too familiar in our public discussions. It was not unnatural that a State mad with slavery should dishonor its bonds. Rejecting all obligations of humanity and justice, it easily rejected the obligations of Public Faith. Slavery was in itself a perpetual repudiation, and slave-masters were unblushing repudiators. Such an example is not fit for our Nation at this great period of its history.

It is one of the calamities of war, that, while it compels the employment of large means, it blunts the moral sense and breeds too frequently an insensibility to the obligations incurred. A national debt shares for the time exceptional character of war itself. Contracted hastily, it is little regarded except as a burden. At last when business is restored and all things assume their natural proportions it is recognized in its true character. The country accommodates itself to the pressure. This time is now at hand among us, if not arrested by disturbing influences. Unhappily the demands of Public Faith are met by higgling and chaffering, and we are gravely reminded that the "bloated bond-holders" now expect more than they gave; forgetting that they gave in the darkness of the war, at the appeal of the Nation, and to keep those armies in the field through which its existence was preserved; forgetting also that among these bond-holders, now so foully stigmatized, were the poor, as well as the rich, all giving according to their means. It was not in the ordinary spirit of money-lending that those contributions were made. Love of country entered into them and made them more than money. If the interest was considerable, it was only in proportion to the risk. Every loan at that time was a contract of bottomry on the Nation, like money lent to a ship in a strange port and conditioned on its arrival safe at home; so that it failed entirely, if Slavery, by the aid of Foreign Powers, established its supremacy. God be praised! the enemy has been overcome. It remains now that we should overcome that other enemy, which hardly less malignant than war itself, would despoil the Nation of its good name and take from it all the might of honesty. And here to every citizen, and especially to every legislator I would address those incomparable words of Milton in his sonnet to Fairfax:

"O, yet a nobler task awaits thy hand,
(For what can war, but endless war still breed?)
Till truth and right from violence be freed,
And Public Faith clear'd from the shameful brand
Of public fraud."

FOLLY OF REPUDIATION.

The proposition to pay bonds in greenbacks becomes futile and fatuous, when it is considered that such an operation would be nothing more than the substitution of greenbacks for bonds, and not a payment of anything. The form of the debt would be changed; but the debt would remain. Of the twenty-five hundred millions which we now owe, whether in greenbacks or bonds, every dollar must be paid, sooner or later, or be ignobly repudiated. By paying the interest of the bonds in coin, instead of greenbacks, the annual increase of the debt to this extent is prevented. But the principal remains to be paid. If this be attempted in greenbacks, it will be by an issue far beyond all the demands of the currency. There will be a deluge of greenbacks. The country must suffer inconceivably under such a dispensation. The interest on the bonds may be stopped by the substitution; but the currency will be depreciated infinitely beyond any such dishonest saving. The country will be bankrupt. Inconvertible paper will overspread the land, to the exclusion of coin or any chance of coin for some time to come. Farewell, then, to specie payments. Greenbacks will be everywhere. The multitudinous mice that swam the Rhine and devoured Bishop Hatto in his tower were not more destructive. The cloud of locusts described by Milton as "warping on the eastern wind" and "darkening all the land of Nile," were not more pestilential.

DIMINUTION OF TAXATION.

I am now brought to the practical question, to which I have already alluded, how the public burdens shall be lightened. Of course, in this work the Public Faith, if kept sacred, will be a constant and omnipresent agency, powerful in itself and powerful also in its reinforcement of all other agencies.

ECONOMY.

It will not seem trivial if I insist on systematic economy in the administration of the Government. All needless expenditure must be lopped off. Our swollen appropriations must be compressed. Extravagance and recklessness, so natural during a period of war, must give way to moderation and thrift. All this, without any denial of what is just or beneficent. The rule should be economy without niggardliness. Always there must be a good reason for whatever we spend. Every dollar, as it leaves the national Treasury, must be able to exhibit its passport. Doubtless, the Army and Navy can be further reduced without detriment to the public service. Beyond this great saving there should be a constant watchfulness against those schemes of public plunder, great and small, from which the Nation has latterly suffered so much. All those things are so plain as to be little more than truisms.

SIMPLIFICATION OF TAXATION.

Another help will be found in the simplification of our system of taxation, so that it shall be less complex and shall apply to fewer objects. In Europe taxation has become a science, according to which the largest possible amounts are obtained at the smallest possible inconvenience. Instead of sweeping through all the highways and by-ways of life, leaving no single thing unvisited, the English system has a narrow range and visits a few select articles only. I see no reason why we should not profit by this example, much to the convenience of the Government and of the citizen. The tax-gatherer will never be a very welcome guest; but he may be less of an intruder than now. A proper tax on two articles, whisky and tobacco, with proper securities for its collection, would go far to support the Government.

THE DIMINUTION OF INTEREST ON THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Still another agency will be found in some proper scheme for a diminution of the interest on our national debt, so far as this can be done without a violation of Public Faith; and this brings me to the very bill now before the Senate.

All are anxious to relieve the country from recurring liabilities, which come round like the seasons. How can this be done best. First, by the strict performance of all existing engagements, so that the Public Faith shall be our inseparable ally; and, secondly, by funding the existing debt in such ways as to provide a reduced rate of interest. A longer term would justify a smaller interest. There may be differences as to the form of the substitute; but it would seem as if something of this kind must be done.

Immediately after the close of the war, as the smoke of battle was disappearing, but before the national ledger was sufficiently examined to justify a comparison between liabilities and resources, there was a generous inclination to proceed at once to the payment of the national debt. Volunteers came forward with their contributions for this purpose, in the hope that the generation which suppressed the rebellion might have the added glory of removing this great burden. This ardor was momentary. It was soon seen that the task was too extensive, and that it justly belonged to another generation, with aggrandized population and resources, in presence of which the existing debt, large to us, would be small. Here the census has its instructive lesson. According to the rate of increase in past years, our population will advance in the following proportion:

In 1880.....	56,967,216
In 1890.....	76,677,872
In 1900.....	103,208,415
In 1910.....	138,918,528

The resources of the country, already so vast, will swell in still larger proportions. Population increasing beyond example; improved systems of communication expanding in every direction; and the mechanical arts, with their infinite activities, old and new—all these must carry the Nation forward beyond any present calculation so that the imagination tires in the effort to grasp the mighty result. Therefore, to the future we may tranquilly leave the final settlement of the national debt, meanwhile discharging our own incidental duty, so that the Public Faith shall be preserved.

Here is a notable difference between the United States and other countries, where population and resources have arrived at such a point that future advance is very gradual. With us each decade is a leap forward; with them it marks a gradation sometimes scarcely appreciable. This difference must not be forgotten in the estimate of our capacity to deal with a debt larger than that of any European Power except England. But we must confess our humiliation, as we find that our debt, with its large interest in coin, secured by mortgage on the immeasurable future of the Nation, is less regarded abroad than the English debt, with its smaller interest and its more limited security. Our sixes will command only seventy-four per cent. in the market of London, while the three per cent. consols of England are freely bought at ninety-four per cent. One of our bonds brings twenty per cent. less than an English bond, although the interest on it is one hundred per cent. more. I know no substantial reason for this enormous difference, except in the superior credit established by England. With the national credit above suspicion, our debt must stand as well, and, as our multiplying resources become known, even better still. Thus constantly are we brought to the same lesson of Public Faith.

In spite of the general discredit of our national stocks abroad, Massachusetts fives, payable in 1894, sell at the nominal price of $4, with the pound sterling at $4 44, equal to 94½ in our gold with the pound sterling at $4 83. There can be no other reason for this higher price than the superior credit enjoyed by Massachusetts; and thus again is Public Faith exalted. Why should not the Nation, with its infinite resources, surpass Massachusetts?

THE FUNDING BILL.

The bill before us proposes a new issue of bonds redeemable in coin after twenty, thirty, and forty years, with interest at five per cent. four and one half per cent., and four per cent. in coin, exempt from State or municipal taxation and also from national taxation, except the general tax on income; these bonds to be used exclusively for the conversion of an equal amount of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, except the existing five per cent. bonds and the three per cent. certificates. These proposed bonds have the advantage of being explicit in their terms. The obligations of the Government are fixed clearly and unchangeably beyond the assaults of politicians.

A glance at the national debt will show the operation of this measure. The sum total on the 1st of February, 1868, according to the statement from the Treasury was $2,504,845,878, being in round numbers twenty-five hundred millions. Out of this may be deducted legal-tender and fractional notes, as currency, amounting to $388,405,505, and several other smaller items. The following amounts represent the portions of debt provided for by this bill:

Six per cent., due 1881.....	$283,766,600
Six per cent., five-twenties.....	1,308,483,850
Seven and three-tenths Treasury notes convertible into five-twenty bonds at maturity.....	214,953,850
	$1,897,200,300

This considerable sum may be funded under the proposed bill.

THE PUBLIC FAITH AGAIN.

If this large portion of the national debt, with its six per cent. interest in coin, can be funded at a less interest, there will be a corresponding relief to the country. But there is one way only in which this can successfully be accomplished. It is by making the Public Faith so manifest that the holders will be induced to come into the change for the sake of the longer term. All that is done by them must be voluntary. Every holder must be free to choose. He may prefer his short bond at six per cent. or a long bond at five per cent. or a longer at four and a half per cent., or still a longer at four per cent. This is his affair. There must be no compulsion. Any menace of compulsion will defeat the transaction. It will be nothing less than repudiation with a certain loss of credit, which no saving of interest can repay. You must continue to borrow on a large scale; but who will lend to the repudiator, unless at a destructive discount? Any reduction of interest without the consent of the holders will reduce your capacity to borrow. A forced reduction of interest will be like a forced loan. While seeming to save interest, you will lose capital. Do not be deceived. Any compulsory conversion is only another form of repudiation. It is tantamount to this declared crime. It is the same misdeed, taking still another shape—as Proteus was the same fleethen god in all his various transformations. It is repudiation under an alias.

Happily the bill before us is free from any such damning imputation. The new bonds are authorized; but the holders of existing obligations are left free to exercise their judgment in making the change. I am assured by those, who, from practical acquaintance with business, ought to know, that these bonds will be rapidly taken for the five-twenties.

FUNDING BILL AGAIN.

The same bill, in its second section, sets apart $125,000,000 annually to the payment of the interest and the reduction of the principal of the national debt: and this is to be in lieu of a sinking fund. This is an additional security. It is another assurance of our determination to deal honestly.

The third section of the same bill is newer in its provisions, and, perhaps, more open to doubt. But, though uncertain with regard to it in the beginning, I have found that it commended itself on careful examination. On its face it provides for a system of conversion and reconversion. The holder of lawful money to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple of $1,000, may convert the same into the funded debt for an equal amount; and any holder of the funded debt may receive for the same at the Treasury lawful money, unless the notes then outstanding shall be equal to $400,000,000. If bonds in the funded debt shall be worth more than greenbacks, the latter would be converted into bonds, according to the ordinary laws of trade. The latest relation of these two is as follows: $100 greenbacks equal seventy-one dollars gold; $100 five per cent. equal seventy-six dollars gold. If the greenbacks are convertible into the five per cent., they will, of course, be converted while the above relation continues. This must be so long as the national credit is maintained abroad and the demand for our securities continues there. By this process our greenbacks will be gradually absorbed and those that are not absorbed will be lifted in value. It would seem as if bonds and greenbacks must both gain from this business, and with them the country must gain also. Here would be a new step to specie payments.

The bill closes with a provision authorizing contracts in coin, instead of greenbacks, according to the agreement of parties. This authority is in harmony with the other provisions of the bill, and is still another step toward specie payments.

NECESSITY OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

I am now brought to the last branch of this discussion, in which all the others are absorbed; I mean the necessity of specie payments, or, in other words, the necessity of coin in the place of inconvertible paper. Other things are means to this end. This is the end itself. Until this is accomplished financial reconstruction exists in aspiration only and not in reality.

The suspension of specie payments was originally a war measure, like the suspension of the habeas corpus. It was so declared by myself at the time it was authorized. Pardon me if I quote my own words in the debate on the bill:

"It is a discretion kindred to that under which the habeas corpus has been suspended so that citizens have been arrested without the forms of law: kindred to that under which an extensive territory has been declared to be in a condition of insurrection, so that all business with its inhabitants is suspended; kindred to that which unquestionably exists, to obtain soldiers, if necessary, by draft or conscription instead of the free offering of volunteers; kindred to that under which private property may be taken for public uses; and kindred, also, to that undoubted discretion which sanctions the completest exercise of the transcendent right of self-defense."

As a war measure, it should cease with the war, or so soon thereafter as practicable. It should not be continued a day beyond positive exigency. While the war lasted, it was a necessity, as the war itself. Its continuance now prolongs into peace this belligerent agency and projects its disturbing influence into the most distant places. Like war, whose greatest engine it was, it is the cause of incalculable evil. Like war, it troubles the entire nation, deranges business and demoralizes the people. As I hate war, so do I hate all its incidents and long to see them disappear. Already in these remarks I have pictured the financial anarchy of our country, the natural reflection of the political; but the strongest illustration is in a disordered currency, which is present to everybody with a dollar in his pocket.

The derangement of business may be seen at home and abroad. It is not merely derangement; it is dislocation. Everything is out of joint. Business has its disease also, showing itself in opposite conditions; shrunk at times, as with paralysis; swollen at times to unhealthy proportions, as with elephantiasis. The first condition of business is stability, which is only another form of security; but this is impossible when nobody can tell from day to day the value of the currency. It may change in a night. The reasonable contract of to-day may become onerous beyond calculation to-morrow. There is no fixed standard. The seller is afraid to sell; the buyer afraid to buy. Nobody can sell or buy a farm; nobody can build or mortgage a house, except at an unnatural hazard. Salaries and all fixed incomes suffer. The pay of every soldier in the Army, every sailor in the Navy, every office-holder from the President to the humblest postmaster is brought under this tyrannical influence. Harder still, innocent pensioners, wards of the Nation, must bear the same doom. Maimed soldiers, bereaved widows, helpless orphans, whose cup is already full, are compelled to see their scanty dole shrink before their sight till it seems ready to vanish in smoke.

A greenback is a piece of paper with a promise on its face and green on its back, declared to be money by act of Congress, but which the Government refuses to pay. It is "failed paper" of the Government. The mischief of such a currency is everywhere, enveloping the whole country and penetrating all its parts. It covers all and enters all. It is a discredit to the national name, from which the Nation suffers in whole and in detail. It weakens the Nation and hampers the citizen. There is no national enterprise which it does not impede. The Pacific railroad feels it. There is not a manufacture or business which does not feel it also. There is not a town, or village, or distant place, which it does not visit.

A practical instance will show one way in which individuals suffer on an extensive scale, being generally those who are least able. I follow an ingenious merchant, Mr. Atkinson, of Boston, whose figures sustain his conclusion, when I insist that our present currency, from its unstable character, operates as an extra tax of more than one hundred millions annually on the labor and business of the country; and this vast sum is taken from the pockets of the people, not for the support of the Government, but to swell the unreported fund out of which the excesses of the present day are maintained. There are few business men, who would not put the annual loss in their affairs, from the fluctuation in the currency, somewhere from one to five per cent. One per cent. is the lowest. Mr. Hazard, of Rhode Island, puts it at two per cent. Now, the aggregate sales in the fiscal year ending June, 1867, were over eleven thousand millions ($11,000,000,000) in currency, excluding sales of stocks or bonds. One per cent. on this prodigious amount represents a tax of one hundred and ten millions, paid annually by consumers, according to their consumption and not in any degree according to their ability. This is one instance only of the damages annually paid on account of our currency. If we estimate the annual tax at more than one per cent. the sum total will be proportionally larger. Even at the smallest rate, it is many millions more than all the annual expenses of our Government immediately preceding the rebellion.

Fluctuations in the measure of value are as inconvenient and fatal as fluctuations in the measures of length and bulk. A dollar which has to-day one value and to-morrow another is no better than a yard, which has to-day one length and another to-morrow, or a bushel, which has to-day one capacity and another to-morrow. It is as uncertain as "Equity," measured by the varying foot of successive chancellors, sometimes long and sometimes short, according to the pleasant illustration of Selden in his Table-Talk. Such fluctuations are more than a match for any prudence. Business is turned into a guess, or a game of hazard, where the prevailing anarchy is overruled by accident:

"Chaos umpire sits,
And by decision more embroils the fray,
By which he reigns; next him high arbiter Chance governs all."

In such a condition of thing, the gamblers have the advantage. The stock exchange becomes little better than a faro bank. By such scenes the country is demoralized. The temptation of excessive gains leads from the beaten path of business. Speculation, without money, takes the place of honest industry, extending from the stock exchange everywhere. The failed paper of the Government teaches the lesson of bankruptcy. The Government refuses to take up its notes, and others do likewise. These things cannot be without a shock to public morals. Honesty ceases to be even a policy. Broken contracts prepare the way for crime, which comes to complete the picture.

Our foreign commerce is not less disturbed, for here we are brought within the sphere of other laws than our own. Gold is the standard of business throughout the civilized world. Until it becomes again the standard among us we are not, according to the familiar phrase of President Lincoln, "in practical relations" with the civilized world. We are States out of the great Union. Our currency has the stamp of legality at home; but it is worthless abroad. In all foreign transactions we are driven to purchase gold at a premium, or to adopt a system of barter, which belongs to the earlier stages of commerce. Corn, wheat, and cotton are exchanged for the products we desire, and this traffic is the coarse substitute for that refined and plastic system of exchanges which adapts itself so easily to all the demands of business. Commerce with foreign Powers is prosecuted at an incalculable disadvantage. Our shipping, which in times past has been the pride of the Nation, whitening every sea with its sails, is reduced in number and value. Driven from the ocean by pirate flags during the rebellion, it cannot struggle back to its ancient supremacy until the accustomed laws of trade once more resume their rule.

HOW TO ARRIVE AT SPECIE PAYMENTS.

There are few who will deny the transcendent evil which I have set forth. There are few who will advocate inconvertible paper as currency. How shall the remedy be applied? On this question, so interesting to the business and good name of the country there are theories without number; some so ingenious as to be artificial rather than natural. What is natural is simple; and I am persuaded that our remedy must be of this character.

The legal-tender note, which we wish to expel from our currency, has two different characters; first, as mere currency, for use in the transactions of business; and, secondly, as real value from the assurance that ultimately it will be paid in coin, according to its promise. These two different characters may be sentimentally expressed as availability and convertibility. The notes are now available without being convertible. Our desire is to make them convertible; in other words, the equivalent of coin in value, dollar for dollar. On the 1st of June last past these notes were $388, 645, 801 in amount.

Discarding theories, however ingenious, and following nature, I call attention to a few practical points before reverting to those cardinal principles applicable to this subject, from which there can be no appeal.

First. The present proposition for funding is an excellent measure for this purpose, being at once simple and practical; not that it contains any direct promise for the redemption of our currency, but because it places the national debt on a permanent footing at a smaller interest than is now paid. By this change three things, essential to financial reconstruction, are promoted; economy, stability, and national credit. With these once established, specie-payments cannot be long postponed.

Secondly. Another measure of immediate value is the legalization of contracts in coin, so that henceforth all agreements made in coin may be legally enforced in coin or its equivalent. This would establish specie payments wherever parties desired, and to this extent begin the much-desired change. Contracts in coin would increase and multiply, until the exception became the rule. There would for a time be two currencies; but the better must gradually prevail. The essential equity of the new system would be apparent; while there would be a charm in once more looking upon familiar faces long hidden from sight, as the hoarded coin came forth. Nor can any possible injury ensue. The legalization is applicable only to future contracts, as the parties mutually agree. Every citizen in this respect would be a law to himself. If he chose in his own business to resume specie payments, he could do so. There would be a voluntary resumption by the people, one by one. But this influence could not be confined to the immediate parties. Beyond the contagion of its example, there would be a positive necessity on the part of the banks, that they should adapt themselves to the exigency by the substitution of proper commercial equivalents; and thus again we take another step in specie payments.

Thirdly. Another measure of practical value is the contraction of the existing currency, so as to bring it on a par with coin, dollar for dollar. Before alluding to any of the expedients to accomplish this precious object, it is important to arrive at some idea of the amount of currency of all kinds required for the business of the country. To do this, we may look at the currency before the rebellion, when business was in its normal condition. I shall not occupy space with tables, although they are now before me, but content myself with results. From the official report of the Treasury, it appears that, on the 1st of January, 1860, the whole active circulation of the country, including bank circulation, bank deposits available as currency, specie in bank, specie in Treasury, estimated specie in circulation, and deducting reserves, amounted to $542,097,264. It may be assumed that this sum total was the amount of currency required at the time. From the same official tables, it appears that, on the 1st of October, 1867, the whole active circulation of the country, beginning with greenbacks and fractional currency, and including all the items in the other account, amounted to $1,245,138,193. Thus from 1860, when the currency was normal, to 1867, some time after the suspension of specie payments, there was an increase of one hundred and thirty per cent. Omitting bank deposits for both years the increase was one hundred and forty six per cent. Making due allowance for the increase of population, business, and Government transactions, there remains a considerable portion of this advance, which must be attributed to the abnormal condition of the currency. I follow various estimates in putting this at sixty or seventy per cent., representing the difference of prices at the two different periods, and the corresponding excess of currency above the requirements of the country. Therefore, for the reduction of prices, there must be a reduction of the currency; and this must be to the amount of $300,000,000. So it seems, unless these figures err.

Against the movement for contraction, which is commended by its simplicity and its tendency to a normal condition of things, we have two adverse policies; one the stand-still policy, and the other, worse yet, the policy of inflation. By the first the currency is left in statu quo—stationary—subject to the influence of other conditions which may operate to reduce it. Better stand still than move in a wrong direction. By the latter the currency is enlarged at the expense of the people—being at once a tax and a derangement of values. You pamper the morbid appetite for paper money and play the discarded part of John Law. You blow up a bladder, without thinking that it is nothing but a bladder, ready to burst. As the volume of currency is increased the purchasing power of each dollar is reduced in proportion. As you add to the currency you take from the dollar. You do little more than mark your goods at higher prices and imagine that they have increased in value. Already the price is too high. Do not make it higher. Already the currency is corrupted. Do not corrupt it more. The cream has been reduced to skimmed-milk. Do not let it be reduced to chalk and water. Let there be national cream for all the people.

Obviously any contraction of the currency must be conducted with caution, so as to interfere as little as possible with existing interests.

It should be understood in advance, so that business may adapt itself to the change. Once understood, it must be pursued wisely to the end. I call attention to a few of the expedients by which this contraction may be made.

1. Any holder may have liberty to fund his greenbacks in bonds, as he may desire, so that, as coin increased, they would be merged in the funded debt and the currency be reduced in corresponding proportion.

2. Greenbacks when received at the Treasury may be canceled, or they may be redeemed directly, so far as the coin on hand will permit.

3. Greenbacks may be converted into compound-interest notes, to be funded in monthly installments, running over a period of years, thus reaching specie payments within a brief period.

4. Another expedient, more active still, is the application of the coin on hand to the payment of greenbacks at a given rate, say $6,000,000 a month—selecting for payment those holders who present the largest amount of five twenties for conversion into the long bonds at a low rate of interest, or shall pay the highest premium on such bonds.

I mention these as expedients, calculated to operate in the same direction—without violent change or spasmodic action. Under their mild and beneficent influence the currency would be gradually reduced, so that the final step when taken would be hardly felt. With so great an object in view, I do not doubt its accomplishment at an early day, if the Nation only wills it. "Where there is a will there is a way," and never was this proverb truer than on this occasion. To my mind it is clear that, when the Nation wills a currency in coin, then must this victory over the Rebellion be won; provided always that there is no failure in those other things on which I have also dwelt as the conditions precedent of this final victory.

CONCLUSION.

How vain it is to expect financial reconstruction until political reconstruction has been completed, I have already shown. How vain to expect specie payments, until the Nation has once more gained its natural vigor, and it has become one in reality as in name. Let this be, and the Nation will be like a strong man, in the full enjoyment of all his forces, coping with the trials of life.

There must also be peace within our borders, so that there shall be no discord between President and Congress. Therefore, so long as Andrew Johnson is President, the return to specie payments is impossible. So long as a great party, called Democratic, better now called Rebel, wars on that political reconstruction, which Congress has organized, there can be no specie payments. So long as any President, or any political party, denies the Equal Rights of the freedman, it is vain to expect specie payments. Whoso would have equity must do equity; and now, if you would have specie payments, you must do this great equity. The rest will follow. When General Grant said, "Let us have peace," he said also, "Let us have specie payments." Among all the blessed gifts of peace there is none more certain.

Nor must it be forgotten, that there can be no departure in any way from the requirements of Public Faith. This is a perpetual obligation, complete in all respects and just as applicable to the freedman as to the bondholder. Repudiation in all its forms, direct or indirect, whether of the freedman or the bondholder, must be repudiated. Both are under the same safeguard, and there is the same certain disaster from any repudiation of either. Unless the Public Faith is preserved, you cannot fund your debt at a smaller interest; you cannot convert your greenbacks; you cannot comply with the essential terms of reconstruction. Amid all surrounding abundance you are poor and powerless, for you are dishonored. Do not say, as an apology, that all should have the same currency. True as this may be, it is a cheat when used to cover dishonor. The currency of all should be coin, and you should lift all the national creditors to this solid platform rather than drag a single citizen down. A just Equality is sought by leveling up instead of leveling down. In this way the national credit will be maintained, so that it will be a source of wealth, prosperity, and renown.

Pardon me, if now, by way of recapitulation, I call your attention to three things in which all others center. The first is the Public Faith. The second is the Public Faith. The third is the Public Faith. Let these be sacredly preserved, and there is nothing of power or fame, which can be wanting. All things will pay tribute to you, even from the uttermost parts of the sea. All the sheaves will stand about, as in the dream of Joseph, and make obeisance to your sheaf. Good people, especially all concerned in business, whether commerce, banking, or labor—our own compatriots or the people of other lands—will honor and uphold the Nation which, against all temptation, keeps its word.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that we cannot get through with this bill to-day, and as it is desirable to have an executive session I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not let us proceed with this bill a little longer?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is after three o'clock on Saturday afternoon; and there is some business that ought to be done in executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. We can have an executive session later in the day, say at half past four.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We cannot get through the executive business by beginning the executive session at half past four.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays. We might just as well go on a little longer with this bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McCreery, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Willey, Williams, and Yates—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sherman, and Stewart—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Corbett, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Frothinghuyson, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Norton, Rice, Saulsbury, Sprague, Thayer, Wade, Welch, and Wilson—13.

So the motion was agreed to.

After more than two hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College the votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been organized, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1284) to change and more effectually secure the collection of internal taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to amend the tax on banks, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and has appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. SAMUEL HOOPER of Massachusetts, and Mr. W. E. NIBLACK of Indiana, managers at the same on its part.

ELECTORAL VOTES OF LATE REBEL STATES.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized.

The amendments were read. They were in lines four and five, to strike out the words "and which States are not now represented in Congress;" in line fifteen, to strike out the word "and" and insert "nor," and to add to the resolution the words, "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any State which was represented in Congress on the 4th day of March, 1867;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, &c., That none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral votes be received or counted from any of such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation, nor unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government, and such State shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any State which was represented in Congress on the 4th day of March, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems to me that the amendments put the resolution in a shape which the Senate several times voted down. The objection to the resolution as it originally stood was that it embraced States which had already been admitted to representation. That was the point upon which the discussion arose in the Senate, and the Senate repeatedly voted down this very proposition.

Mr. DRAKE. No.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; I think, in substance, the very same thing. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THAYER] made a motion which saved the States of Arkansas and Florida by providing that the resolution should apply only to those States not now represented. The Senator from Nebraska moved the amendment so as to confine the resolution to those States not represented; and that was satisfactory to the Senate. The very difficulty we had in this body was that the original resolution reflected upon States already represented in Congress, and it was making a distinction, which many thought invidious, between the States of Arkansas and Florida and the States of Illinois and New York and Nebraska; and hence the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska was adopted by a very decided vote of the Senate. Now, the House of Representatives has stricken out that very provision which made the resolution satisfactory to the Senate. As there was so much trouble about it, I think it would be best to non-concur.

Mr. CONKLING. I was going to make that suggestion, that we non-concur and ask for a conference.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move, if it be in order, that we non-concur in the House amendments and ask for a conference. I think that will be the better way, and then we shall arrive at a conclusion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A motion to concur has precedence, and I make that motion. I have looked at the amendments of the House. Aside from the feeling of my friend from Illinois who has had it all the time—it has been chronic with him; and therefore it is to be expected that he will continue it—I think the resolution as amended by the House of Representatives comes nearer to harmonizing all the views that the Senate had than any other would. It leaves out the names of these States just as they were left out last night, and makes the sweeping declaration that none of the States which have been in rebellion shall be considered as having been restored out of the rebellion so as to vote until they shall have reached the point through the instrumentality of our reconstruction measures where they will be entitled to admission; that is, until they shall have adopted their new constitutions under the authority of Congress, submitted them to Congress for approval, have them approved, and then have ratified the fourteenth article; and then, in order not to include Tennessee in that, which was admitted before with a constitution formed prior to the 4th of March, 1867, the proviso is added. I do hope that on this mere question of form we shall not baffle with the House of Representatives, but concur in their amendments at once.

The question being put on concurring in the House amendments; there were, on a division—yeas 20, nays 12.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to have the yeas and nays on concurring in the House amendments. I think an important principle is involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is too late.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think it is too late.

Mr. EDMUNDS. * After the vote has been taken and announced?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate does not want to give me the yeas and nays, be it so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not have thought of suggesting that objection if the Senator had not been so exceedingly nice. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senate will not give me the yeas and nays, be it so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was about to make a motion to adjourn; but if the Senator from Illinois wants the yeas and nays, of course I shall not make the motion now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make no objection.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Harlan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Williams, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conkling, Davis, Ferry, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of Tennessee, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Vickers—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Chandler, Connors, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Frothinghuyson, Grimes, Howard, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Welch, Willey, and Wilson—23.

So the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 11, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was partially read, when, on motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, the further reading was dispensed with.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN VIRGINIA.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1370) to fix the time for holding the terms of the United States district court in Virginia.

The bill was read. It provides that the terms of the United States district court for the district of Virginia shall be held as heretofore at Richmond and Norfolk, and that the terms in Staunton shall be held on the second Tuesday of April and October, and at Wytheville on the fourth Tuesday of April and October in each year.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CAKE asked and obtained leave of absence for two days.

COURT OF CLAIMS—ARKANSAS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with a substitute, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 310) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to the loyal citizens of the State of Arkansas.

The substitute, which was read, provides that the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," is hereby extended to loyal citizens of the State of Arkansas, anything to the contrary notwithstanding in the act to declare the sense of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," passed February 19, 1867.

The substitute was agreed to; and the joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE OVER MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 355, authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

No objection was made; and the bill was taken from the table and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] to offer an amendment.

Mr. LOAN. I move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, a corporation created by the laws of the State of Kansas, to build a bridge over and across the Missouri river at St. Joseph, Missouri; and all the rights and privileges conferred by sections one, two, four, and five, of this act are hereby extended, so far as they are applicable to the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, and the restrictions, limitations, and conditions contained in said sections are hereby made applicable to said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAWAIIAN BRIG VICTORIA.

Mr. AXTELL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 331) to authorize the issue of an American register to the Hawaiian brig Victoria; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the derelict Hawaiian brig Victoria, said vessel being now owned by a citizen of San Francisco, California.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. LYNCH. I hope some reason will be given why this joint resolution should be passed.

Mr. AXTELL. This is a Hawaiian brig which was wrecked in our waters and abandoned; but it does not come under the provisions of any general law by which an American owner of the vessel can obtain an American register. The Committee on Commerce had before them a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury explaining all the facts, and after examination the committee agreed unanimously that I should be allowed to report this joint resolution to the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I will not oppose the passage of this joint resolution. What I object to is the Committee on Commerce singling out one or two cases where any of their own number are interested and excluding others. Some of us have introduced applications for registers of vessels as favorable as this can possibly be, and we hear nothing from them. I have nothing further to say except that I shall vote for the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if there should be a morning hour to-day the Committee on Commerce will be called for bills of a private nature.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. AXTELL] to yield to me for a moment that I may say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. AXTELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] that if he will at any time bring before the Committee on Commerce a case similar in principle to that now reported by the gentleman from California it will probably receive the same favorable consideration that this has received. I will say that the cases which have been submitted to the committee by the gentleman from Ohio are not cases deserving the favorable consideration of the committee; and so long as such cases come before us, and so long as the Committee on Commerce shall be constituted as it now is, the gentleman from Ohio must expect that adverse reports will be made. The case now reported is one which would fairly come within the provisions of the act of 1852, if the vessel had been wrecked on our coast. In point of fact, much more than the amount called for by that statute has been expended upon the vessel, which was an abandoned vessel, not a wreck. In other respects, the case would fairly come within the purview of that statute.

Mr. SPALDING. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] I will say that I cannot tell whether the cases which have been referred by me to the Committee on Commerce deserve the favorable consideration of that committee; but I do say that they deserve the favorable consideration of all men of patriotism and good sense.

Mr. ELIOT. In the judgment of my most excellent and excitable friend from Ohio.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. AXTELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SINKING FUND.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to report for the action of the House a bill to carry into immediate effect the fifth section of the act of 1862, February 25, providing that the coin received for duties on imports shall, after paying interest on bonds and notes, be applied to the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States within each fiscal year, to be set apart, with the accruing interest, as a sinking fund.

2. That the said committee are also instructed to provide in said bill for the establishment of a board of commissioners of the sinking fund, to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Vice President of the United States, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be, without additional compensation, to make from time to time such lawful rules and regulations as may be necessary for the management of said sinking fund.

3. That said committee are further instructed to provide in said bill that all money which may accrue from taxes that may be imposed upon the bonds or coupons of the public debt shall be, from time to time, appropriated to the increment of the sinking fund, and that all special funds held under the several Departments of the Government and not covered into the Treasury of the United States, be forthwith transferred and charged to the commissioner of the sinking fund, for the purposes thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-Shooting Association in the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the House, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Messrs. HARLAN, CONKLING, and VICKERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. No. 107) in relation to the Maquoketa river in the State of Iowa.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1099) for the relief of Wait Talcott.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested: Joint resolution (S. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized; and

A bill (S. No. 589) to establish certain post roads.

WASHINGTON TARGET ASSOCIATION.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the House will reciprocate the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-Shooting Association in the District of Columbia.

No objection being made, it was so ordered; and Messrs. BALDWIN, WELKER, and GLOSSBRENNER were appointed conferees on the part of the House.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the business unfinished at the adjournment last evening, being the bill (H. R. No. 1377) to reduce and fix the military peace establishment.

The pending section was the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no vacancy shall hereafter be filled in the office of brigadier general until the number of brigadier generals shall be less than eight, and thereafter there shall be but eight brigadier generals.

The pending question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. PAINE (renewed by Mr. LOGAN) to the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts.

The amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

There shall be but six brigadier generals; and the officers who shall retain their commissions as such shall be designated by the General of the Army without regard to seniority; and all others shall be mustered out of service on the 1st day of January next.

The amendment of Mr. PAINE was to substitute for the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, the following:

There shall be but six brigadier generals after the 31st day of March, 1869; and the officers who shall retain their commissions as such shall, after the 10th day of March, 1869, be designated by the President of the United States without regard to seniority, and all others shall be mustered out of service on the 31st day of March, 1869.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to submit a modification of my amendment. I have only changed the phraseology and not the substance.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

After the 31st day of March, 1869, there shall be only six brigadier generals; and the President shall, within ten days preceding said date, designate, with regard to seniority, the best six brigadier generals to remain in commission; and the others shall be mustered out of the service of the United States at said date, or within ten days thereafter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust that amendment will be voted down; and I will say a few words, as a good many members are now here who were not present last evening. The purpose of the committee is not to strike down absolutely any Army officers. The amendments proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] muster out officers absolutely, reducing them to a greater extent perhaps than the Committee on Military Affairs deem necessary, beginning with major generals and going down to the lowest grade. It seems to me if we undertake this kind of policy we will inaugurate invidious legislation. It puts it upon the President of the United States to take the list of ten brigadier generals, some of the most distinguished generals ever in our Army, and select four who are not the best and order them to be mustered out absolutely. That is an invidious and difficult task to impose upon any President of the United States. Every one mustered out is to be mustered out upon the express condition that he is not ranked among the best brigadier generals in the service. It puts a stain, and it cannot be otherwise, upon the name and honor of every man who is mustered out. If the present President should be in power, and he should act on political grounds, then this side of the House would have good reason to feel aggrieved at his action. If, on the other hand, a President should be in power who was a Republican, and should do the same, this side of the House would feel justly aggrieved. I am unwilling to go into these political distinctions. I am unwilling to put upon the President of the United States a task so invidious as to declare who are not the best brigadier generals in a list of ten. Therefore, I trust the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I renew it. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I ask the attention of the House for a moment. The whole question is, shall we reduce the Army, or shall it not be reduced? The bill of the committee provides that there shall be no reduction in the number of generals until it is accomplished by death or resignation, or by dismissal for cause. I am very anxious there should be a reduction of this Army, and I wish to begin with the generals. The amendment I offered puts it in the hands of the General to select. I am content it shall be done by lot, if you please, or in any other way to justly and fairly get rid of them when they are not wanted by the country. They cost, each one of them with his complement, $20,000 every year; and they are to be imposed upon the country when the committee themselves say some of them are useless, because they provide in their bill for less than eight; and the House last night agreed to the amendment to strike down the major generals to three out of five. This is in exactly the same proportion. I say again I am willing they should be struck out by lot; but I thought it was best to allow the selection to be done by the General of the Army.

Now, sir, when you pass this so-called bill to reduce the Army you pass what, in my judgment, is an "electioneering dodge" and nothing else. Talk about reducing! Why, sir, you have not reduced a man until you come to the privates, and you do not in fact reduce any there. The simple question is, are we in earnest? If we are not then we will vote to keep these men in. Otherwise strike them out in some way or other, because the committee agree they are not wanted and the country agree they are not wanted. The question is, is there any way to get rid of them?

I want for a moment to recur to what was said by the chairman of the committee last evening on this topic. He said he would never consent to do this "by the mere brutal force of numbers." I have heard that phrase before. We have been told that we conquered the South by the "brutal force of numbers." We established great political right of freedom to all men by the "brutal force of numbers," and by the brutal force of numbers I trust we are to protect ourselves from unnecessary expense. It is agreed that these officers are not needed now, yet this bill provides that they shall remain in their places useless so long as they and each of them shall live, because it is invidious to make any discrimination among them.

Now, the amendment of my friend from Wisconsin, which I am bound to renew, but which I hope will be voted down, puts that over till next March for the action of the President who shall be chosen. That is speculating on the chances of the election. Now, I propose that these men shall be mustered out after six months and that the General of the Army shall select those who, in his judgment, are the best officers. Every general in the Army has had to do this very thing during the war. We had to consolidate regiments, and there were sent down orders mustering out the supernumerary officers. It is invidious, I agree, but it is necessary to get rid of these officers in some way, and I know no better way than this to do it.

Mr. PAINE. I renew the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it requires the consent of the House to withdraw an amendment. If there is no objection the amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] will now renew it.

Mr. PAINE. I quite agree with my friend from Massachusetts as to the main principles involved in his amendment; that is to say, that there should be a reduction in the Army, carrying along with it a reduction of the number of brigadier generals. But I differ with him on three points, for my amendment contains three points which distinguish it from his.

In the first place I intrust to the President of the United States the power and impose upon him the duty of selecting the four brigadier generals who shall be mustered out of the service; whereas he intrusts that power to and imposes that duty upon the General of the Army.

In the next place, by my amendment, I extend the period of time for which these officers shall hold their commissions three months beyond the time allowed by his amendment.

In the third place I require the President of the United States to select as those who shall be retained, the best officers of this grade.

Now, to begin with the last distinction. I am surprised that the chairman of the committee should make this a ground of objection to my amendment. Why does he desire that the President should be authorized and required arbitrarily to select these brigadier generals and continue them in the Army without reference to their qualifications or merits? Is he unwilling that this question of qualification and merit shall be examined? Does he say that it touches the honor of these officers that they should be mustered out on an adverse decision as to their qualifications? Will he have them retained simply because they are senior in rank? Why, sir, I am amazed at the principle involved in that objection to my amendment. It strikes at the root of the efficiency of the Army. I can conceive of no more salutary provision on this subject than one which requires the President to select the best men among these generals and continue them in office.

Sir, I believe that it would appear invidious; that it would have a partisan aspect if we should intrust this matter to the General of the Army. It would impose upon him a duty which we ought not to require him to perform. If, on the other hand, we impose the duty upon the President of the United States, to be performed after the next presidential election, then if one candidate shall be elected it will become his duty, and if the other candidate shall be elected it will become his duty, and no gentleman upon this floor can characterize this amendment as partisan in spirit. And let me say further, that while I desire this reduction of the Army and believe that it should be made as promptly as it can be made, I am satisfied that this difference between my amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which postpones the muster-out for three months, is not a fault, but is rather a merit in my amendment. I hope, therefore, the House will accept it, not as a compromise between the committee and the gentleman from Massachusetts, but as a measure which on the whole will come nearer to meeting the views of all Representatives of both parties on this floor, and will at the same time secure to the greatest degree practicable one object which the committee themselves have in view, by avoiding undue rigor of treatment toward the officers mustered out.

Mr. GARFIELD. By agreement last night it was arranged that a vote should be taken to-day on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the fourth section, to reduce the number of major generals from that provided in the bill. I suggest that we go back and take that vote now; because our determination on that will probably influence the vote of the House on this question.

Mr. PAINE. I must object. We can go back and reconsider if it shall become necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that as the House is considering the bill in Committee of the Whole a motion to reconsider is not now in order. When the bill is finished it will then be in the same condition as if reported from the Committee of the Whole, and then the motion to reconsider will be in order. A motion to reconsider is not in order while the bill is being perfected in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAINE. I withdraw my objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio that a vote shall be taken first on the amendment to the fourth section.

The SPEAKER. Then if there be unanimous consent the vote of last night agreeing to the amendment to the fourth section will be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the fourth section, to strike out all after the enacting words and insert what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall hereafter be but three major generals; and the officers who shall retain their commissions as such shall be designated by the General of the Army without regard to seniority, and all others shall be mustered out of service on the 1st day of January next.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that an amendment to the amendment is not now in order. Last night it was agreed that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] should be voted on to-day, but I do not understand that it is amendable.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman seems to have forgotten what he asked the House to assent to. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts was adopted last night.

Mr. GARFIELD. With the understanding that the vote should be taken this morning because there was not a quorum. I desire to know if it is in order for the gentleman from Wisconsin now to offer to amend the amendment which was to be submitted to a vote of the House this morning.

Mr. PAINE. I make no such proposition, except as I supposed in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman. I understood the gentleman to desire an amendment of this kind to be offered to the fourth section at this time, because it comes before the fifth section. If the gentleman objects to the amendment I have offered I will withdraw it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood the gentleman to move to amend the pending amendment to the major general section. It is upon that amendment to the amendment that I make my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of this question. Last night, the House being thin, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asked consent that the vote be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to the fourth section when the House was full. The Chair responded to that suggestion that a motion to reconsider could be made, bringing the whole subject again before the House. The matter passed over on that statement.

Mr. PAINE. Then I insist upon my amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not concluded his statement.

Mr. PAINE. I beg pardon; I did not intend to interrupt the Chair.

The SPEAKER. This morning, by unanimous consent, the vote by which the amendment to the fourth section was adopted was reconsidered. The fourth section, therefore, is again before the House, and like every other section is open to amendment. And the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] proposes to amend the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER], by striking it all out and inserting what will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That after the 31st day of March, 1869, there shall be only three major generals, and the President shall, within ten days preceding said date, designate without regard to seniority the best three major generals to remain in commission; and the others shall be mustered out of the service of the United States on said date, or within ten days thereafter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that debate on this section be now closed.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. PAINE to the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts; and it was agreed to.

The question was upon the amendment, as amended.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 43, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Banks, Bently, Benton, Bolos, Brooks, Benjamin F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Taylor, John Trimble, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—55.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. PAINE to the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to the fifth section.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the same amendment in principle as the one just adopted to the fourth section relating to brigadier generals instead of to major generals. I will therefore not oppose this amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was then agreed to; and the amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

The next section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That any vacancies which may hereafter occur in the office of Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Commissary General of Subsistence, chief of ordnance, chief of engineers, Paymaster General, Surgeon General, or Bureau of Military Justice, shall be filled by the appointment or assignment of an officer who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel of cavalry. And all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of any officer of a higher grade than colonel in any of said offices shall cease and determine on the occurrence of a vacancy in each respectively.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by striking out after the word "that" where it first occurs the words "any vacancies which may hereafter occur in;" and by adding at the end of the section the following:

Provided, That in the offices above named the present incumbents may continue therein at the last-mentioned rank and pay; and the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff departments shall be reduced one half, the officers retained to be designated by the General of the Army.

So that the section will read, as follows:

That the office of Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Commissary General of Subsistence, chief of ordnance, chief of engineers, Paymaster General, Surgeon General, or Bureau of Military Justice, shall be filled by the appointment or assignment of an officer who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a colonel of cavalry; and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of any officer of a higher grade than colonel in any of said offices shall cease and determine on the occurrence of a vacancy in each, respectively: Provided, That in the offices above named the present incumbents may continue therein at the last-mentioned rank and pay; and the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff departments shall be reduced one half, the officers retained to be designated by the General of the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw for the present the last clause of his amendment, reading as follows:

And the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff departments shall be reduced one half; the officers retained to be designated by the General of the Army.

The committee propose to offer hereafter a new section regulating in detail this whole subject of the staff corps. If the gentleman will waive for the present that part of his amendment we can, if it should be necessary, return to this section.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; I will withdraw for the present the last clause of my amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment I have offered is designed to bring down, if we can, all these brigadier generals to the rank of colonels, so far as their pay and allowances are concerned. Before the war there never was any brigadier general in the office of Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Commissary General, chief of ordnance, chief of engineers, Paymaster General, Surgeon General, or in the Bureau of Military Justice. In the present establishment these officers are all brigadier generals. This amendment is designed to bring them down to the rank and pay of colonels. If the amendment should be adopted another amendment will be necessary to bring down the colonels in the same manner; and such an amendment has already been prepared by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] But it is first necessary to bring down these eight brigadier generals to the rank and pay of colonels.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] is somewhat different in principle from any other of the propositions which he has offered. It provides in effect that these eight officers, now holding the grade of brigadier general, according to law, may all continue in office, provided they shall hereafter be only colonels. In other words, it proposes to downgrade—I use the word of course, in its etymological sense—all these officers from the rank they now hold.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ungrade. Mr. GARFIELD. It proposes to reduce by one grade all these eight officers now holding the rank of brigadier general. The gentleman made a mistake in saying that prior to the war none of these officers were of the grade of brigadier general. The Quartermaster General was, in 1860, a brigadier general, as will be seen by the Army Register for that year. The statement is correct as to the others. I believe that since the Mexican war the Quartermaster General has held the rank of brigadier general; but during the late war, from time to time, the laws authorized the increase of rank; so that these eight departments are now, in accordance with law, filled by officers holding the rank of brigadier general.

The Committee on Military Affairs thought that in this regard we ought to go back to the practice which prevailed before the war, and provide that hereafter no vacancy in any of those eight offices shall be filled by the appointment or assignment of any officer higher than a colonel. We placed the proposition in that form so as not to degrade or dismiss any officer now in service, because the persons who now hold those positions received them for meritorious service. The principle which the committee designed to introduce into the bill was that no officer should be mustered out of the service or degraded. The House, it is true, has indicated its preference for a different principle in regard to the single question of mustering out those officers. But the principle which the gentleman asks us to adopt is that these officers shall remain in service, but shall be put down one grade from that which they now hold. That is a new principle, one never before adopted in American legislation, and I shall be sorry if it is adopted now. Although the House has followed the gentleman from Massachusetts in his proposition in regard to major generals and brigadier generals, greatly to my regret, I trust the House will not follow him in this. This proposition is inconsistent with the previous sections already settled in the bill. Why did not the gentleman propose to reduce the rank of the major generals to that of brigadier general and of brigadier to that of colonel? The proposition would have been too bold when applied to such men as stand on the list of our generals.

Mr. PAINE. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I am inclined to think if he will wait until the amendments proposed by the committee have been read to the House, so he could understand them, he would not himself insist upon his amendment. I will state to the House what the effect of these amendments is. In the first place section six provides in these several staff bureaus for the reduction of the grade or rank when vacancies occur in the office. With the consent of the chairman of the committee I have prepared an amendment which provides when vacancies occur in any of the staff departments the officers appointed or designated to fill such vacancies shall have the rank and pay of the cavalry grade next below that fixed by the act of 1866; the committee propose to muster out a small number of these staff officers.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will permit me to correct him, it does not muster out absolutely.

Mr. PAINE. I am mistaken about that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, if possible, let me state the exact difference between myself and my friend from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Ohio. It is this, I propose to "ungrade" not degrade certain officers. I propose this ungrading, so far as rank and pay goes, shall take place now. The committee and my friend propose it shall not take place until these men resign, and as a rule they will not resign until they die. That is the difference between us.

Mr. PAINE. Ask the gentleman from Massachusetts why it is he selects the heads of these bureaus and reduces them and yet leaves the subordinates in their present grade so we shall have in the quartermaster's department six colonels under his arrangement. He reduces the head of the department now a brigadier general, but he does not reduce those under him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My amendment indeed does, and I will answer the question. I have not yet got so far as the next in rank. I am dealing with the head now, and I propose to reduce the tail in the same ratio. I am coming to that as soon as I get the head right. I must deal with the thing I have before me. I want to drop the heads of these Departments down to the rank I have indicated. Then I propose the subordinates down to captains shall drop a peg lower to correspond. The committee will not muster out anybody. They will not take anybody's commission. This bill keeps all these useless officers. This bill, as reported, gives of staff officers one to every thirty-eight men. There are six hundred and fifty-one staff officers to deal with twenty-five thousand men. They will not let one of them go. There are more than twice as many as for the like number of men before the war. There are seventeen general officers, twenty adjutant generals, nine inspector generals, seventy-six quartermasters, sixty-four paymasters, one to five hundred men; twenty-nine subsistence men, one hundred and twenty-four medical officers—one medical officer to every two hundred men—sixty-four ordinance men, and one hundred and seven engineers, making a total of six hundred and fifty-one officers to twenty-eight thousand men. That is what makes the expense of the Army. The committee have not proposed in their bill to drop one of these men until he dies. They hold on to him till that moment, and apparently would do so afterward if they could, but then he slips out of their hands. They take care of him as long as he lives, whether he is useful to the service or not. Now, my proposition is that these chiefs of bureaus shall come down to the pay of colonels, and their subordinates to the pay of lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains.

[Here he hammered fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I propose to close debate on this section.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] withdraws his amendment, and I renew it. When I say I am in favor of reducing the Army I mean reducing the Army. The idea of presenting to this House and the country a mere pretense is not the way and manner in which we should deal with the people. Now, I mean no offense to the chairman of the committee when I say this, but I do say that this bill does not reduce the Army, though it pretends to do so.

I had a conversation with the Secretary of War this morning, in which this subject was incidentally referred to. Now, what is the proposition? It is to retire one seventh of the officers of the Army on half pay, and it is then proposed that they may be assigned to special duty. The Secretary of War would easily find special duty for them, and then you would have no actual reduction either in numbers of officers or in expense.

Now, sir, the way to reduce the Army is this: the people of the country do not understand that an officer of the Army has an inalienable right to hold on to his commission as long as life lasts—with more tenacity, apparently, sometimes than ordinary men adhere to it. The people do not understand that we are to support an aristocracy without daring to say to these officers "When your services are no longer needed they shall be dispensed with." I know there are old men in the service, men who have families, and who are capable in every respect of taking charge of some of these departments and perform the duties. These men I do not want to have shoved out in the cold. But there are other men in the Army with ranks that they have no right to retain, not because they have not won it, not because we desire to degrade them, but because the country has no use for their rank or service.

Now, how do you reduce an army? What do you call an army? Does it consist of mere soldiers? Certainly not. You may discharge every soldier in the Army to-day, and yet you have an Army; but it would be an Army of officers. If you mean to reduce the Army discharge your officers as well as soldiers. The idea that because men have been educated at the Government expense or otherwise, and happen to be retained in the Army to-day, they shall not be retired or removed as soon as we have no further use for them is preposterous. The argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] last night astounded me. He said these men were placed there, and it would be an outrage to remove them.

Why, sir, the gentleman is placed here in Congress by the vote of his constituents. Would he consider it an outrage to be left at home by them? I think, myself, it would be doing themselves a great injury, but they have a right to do it nevertheless, as have the constituents of each one of us here. Now, these officers have no more right to be retained for life because they have commissions given to them by the President than any other officer of the Government. Such a doctrine is the essence of aristocracy. You are maintaining an aristocracy in the organization of the Army, and the people are to become menials. Every officer in this country, whether civil or military, should be the servant of the people, and should be willing to yield obedience to their will, and when the people say they have no further use for their service they should acquiesce and decline to impose their services upon the people.

Sir, I am in favor of reducing the Army. How? By reducing the generals, the colonels, and other officers in the same ratio that you reduce the men in the Army. When you do that you will have just as many men as you have officers to command them, and just as many officers as you have necessity for in order to command your Army, and no more.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I oppose the amendment, and will close the debate in a few words. The gentleman, I am sure, does not desire to misrepresent what the bill proposes, and I was sorry to hear him say that the bill made only a pretense of reducing the Army when it did not really reduce it. There are now in the Army of the United States twenty-eight hundred and fifty-eight commissioned officers. This bill proposes to place seven hundred and eighty-five—more than one quarter of all those officers—on a list to be relieved from duty and placed on half pay.

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is equivalent to ceasing to pay three hundred and ninety-two officers of the United States Army a dollar from this time forward. Now, if anybody will say that that is no reduction at all, I cannot understand his reasoning or his arithmetic.

There are now forty-five thousand enlisted men in the Army, and it is proposed that that number shall be reduced to twenty-five thousand. There are now forty-five regiments of infantry. It is proposed to reduce the number to thirty. There are ten cavalry regiments. It is proposed to reduce the number to seven. There are five regiments of artillery. It is proposed to reduce the number to four. The statement I have now made is a simple statement of the facts of the bill, and I am unwilling that it shall go to the country that the committee have brought in a bill which pretends to reduce but does not really reduce the Army and its expenditures. If the bill passes as reported by the committee it will reduce the annual expenses of the Army not far from fifteen million dollars per annum.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. When I used the word "pretense" I did not mean to say that the committee was designedly trying to impose on the country, but only that that was the effect of the bill upon its face. Now, I will ask the gentleman this question: Is it not a fact that during the late war when an order from the Secretary of War was issued for the consolidation of regiments, you were required when you consolidated regiments to muster out the surplus officers and non-commissioned officers? Is not that the fact?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt of that fact.

Mr. LOGAN. I know I did it frequently. Then I would ask the gentleman, if, in the consolidation of regiments in front of the enemy, officers in commission were required to be mustered out, where is the hardship now in time of peace of mustering out officers in commission when we consolidate regiments and have a surplus of officers? That was the rule in the Army during the war, and I have mustered out many a one.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have several times in the course of this debate stated the distinction between a military peace establishment and an army in time of war. That distinction has always prevailed in the military service of the United States, and it seems to me not unreasonable that it should prevail now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman how many officers are mustered out by this bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have several times said that this bill does not propose absolutely to muster out any officers. The gentleman understands that very well. But I say that it reduces the aggregate pay of officers the same as if we mustered out three hundred and ninety-two officers absolutely.

Mr. PILE. In addition to the number of officers placed on the relieved list under this bill there will be a further reduction from the fact that no vacancies can be filled except by transfers from the relieved list to the active list. In the opinion of the Secretary of War a careful examination of the line of officers of the Army would result in the dismissal of a large number—probably one fourth of the whole number—that in fact many dismissals have recently been made for incompetence, drunkenness, or other immoralities. The point I make is that we can reduce the number of officers to the required amount by weeding out by court-martial and a board of examination incompetent and worthless men, thus mustering out for cause a number equal to the number of supernumeraries, thereby saving the Army good officers and getting rid of worthless ones, all this can be accomplished in six months.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move now to close debate on this amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was on the amendment offered by Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to strike out in lines one and two the words "any vacancies which may hereafter occur in;" in line ten to strike out the words "on the occurrence of a vacancy in each respectively," and to add to the section the following:

Provided, That in the offices abovenamed the present incumbents may continue therein at the last mentioned rank and pay.

So that the section will read:

SEC. 63. And be it further enacted, That the office of Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Commissary General of Subsistence, chief of ordnance, chief of engineers, Paymaster General, Surgeon General, or Bureau of Military Justice, shall be filled by the appointment or assignment of an officer who shall have the rank, pay and allowances of a colonel of cavalry. And all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of any officer of a higher grade than colonel in any of said offices shall cease and determine: Provided, That in the office abovenamed the present incumbents may continue therein at the last-mentioned rank and pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question is on degrading these officers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; that is not a fair statement of the question. The question is whether we shall pay brigadier generals when we only want colonels.

The question was put on the amendment; and there were—ayes 37, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. LOGAN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 25, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnell, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Boies, Boyer, Brooks, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—89.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to further amend the section by adding to it the following:

That hereafter every officer in either of the staff departments above named, except as herein provided for the chief thereof, shall be reduced one step in grade down to the grade of captain, and shall receive pay and allowances accordingly.

The chief of staff departments having been reduced to the rank of colonel, this amendment is to bring down one grade all the subordinate officers, until we get down to the grade of captain, so as to reduce men heretofore colonels to lieutenant colonels, men heretofore lieutenant colonels to majors, and men heretofore majors to captains. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. I have already stated my opposition to the principle involved in this amendment. But if some such amendment is to be adopted, as I think will be the case, judging from the expression of opinion already made by the House, I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment which I think will put the matter in a better form; and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will accept it in lieu of the one he has offered, I propose to amend the amendment so that it will read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act all officers of the staff departments of the Army shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of the cavalry grade next below that fixed for the office by the act entitled "An act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," approved July 28, 1866.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] in lieu of my amendment, because it reduces captains to lieutenants, going further than my amendment goes. The bill proposes to leave in the quartermaster's department six colonels, eleven lieutenant colonels, fifteen majors, and forty-four captains. Now, I propose that those six colonels shall come down to be lieutenant colonels; that the ten lieutenant colonels shall come down to be majors; that the fifteen majors shall come down to be captains, and that the forty-four captains shall come down to be lieutenants. I do not intend by any means to retain all this swarm. I propose to offer an amendment to the eleventh section, reducing this force one half, which will be quite as much as we had before the war.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire the gentleman from Massachusetts to explain how his proposition will operate in circumstances which I will state. He proposes to reduce a brigadier general to the rank of colonel; a colonel to the rank of lieutenant colonel; a lieutenant colonel to the rank of major; a major to the rank of captain, &c. Suppose a major, for instance, has just been put down from the rank of lieutenant colonel, will he be the highest major or the lowest major? To what extent would previous service count in such a case? I do not understand how the matter of relative rank would be regulated, this being an entirely new question in military administration. If the gentleman will explain how a lieutenant colonel major and a major major—if I may use that phraseology—would rank relatively to each other, it may obviate some little difficulty which I now see in his plan.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to undertake to instruct in military law the learned chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs; but in order to remove an argument which is made to the prejudice and not to the fact, I desire to say that the military law settles this whole matter. The higher officer will have been longer in the service and will take rank in accordance with his service.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not necessarily.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If there is any difficulty in that respect I hope the learned chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, when he finds out what is the will of the House on this subject, will endeavor to relieve any little difficulty of that sort. There will be ample opportunity for examination and amendment; and if there is any difficulty of that sort (which I do not see) it can be obviated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I send to the Clerk an amendment which I offer on behalf of the committee, as a new section, to come in after section six. I had intended to offer it as section eleven; but in view of the action already taken by the House it will come in more properly here.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following as a new section:
And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the prospective reduction in the staff of the Army provided for in section six of the act, the following reduction shall be made in the number of officers in the staff now authorized by law.

The number of assistant quartermasters general with the rank of colonel shall be reduced to five. The number of deputy quartermasters general with the rank of lieutenant colonel shall be reduced to eight. The number of quartermasters with the rank of major shall be reduced to twelve. The number of assistant quartermasters with the rank of captain shall be reduced to thirty. The number of commissaries of subsistence with the rank of major shall be reduced to six. The number of commissaries of subsistence with the rank of captain shall be reduced to twelve. The number of assistant paymasters general shall be reduced to one. The number of paymasters shall be reduced to forty. The number of surgeons with the rank of major shall be reduced to forty. The number of assistant surgeons with the rank of captain shall be seventy-five. That in the ordinance department the number of colonels shall be reduced to two, of lieutenant colonels to three, of majors to seven, of captains to eighteen, of first lieutenants to fourteen, of second lieutenants to eight. And immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary of War shall prepare lists of all the officers now in active service in each of the staff corps in excess of the number in each grade authorized by the provisions of this section, said lists to be made in accordance with the provisions of the eighth and ninth sections of this act; and all officers so placed on said lists shall be in like manner relieved on half pay.

Mr. GARFIELD. I propose that we consider this amendment by paragraphs.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that course will be pursued.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the paragraph in regard to the quartermaster's department.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment I have offered proposes to reduce to the number indicated the various grades in the staff corps. In the closing paragraph the mode of reduction is provided, which is to be the same as that provided in section eight of the bill. If, when we come to that section, the House should see fit to change that mode of reduction, the new method would, of course, apply to this section, also. So the question of the mode of reduction need not be discussed now. It can all be covered in the discussion of the eighth section.

In recommending a reduction of the staff of the Army, the committee took into consideration how many officers there were in each corps before the war, when we had an Army of ten or twelve thousand men; then the number we now have with an Army of forty-five thousand men. From those two elements we have tried to determine what is the smallest number consistent with the necessities of an Army reduced as proposed in this bill. In regard to the quartermaster's department, I will state for the information of the House that there are now in service seventy-seven officers in that department. Before the war there were thirty-seven. The committee propose to reduce the aggregate number to fifty-five, that being about half way between the old Army before the war and the Army as it now stands. The present organization of the department has six colonels. We propose to reduce the number to five. There are ten lieutenant colonels. We propose to reduce the number to eight. There are fifteen majors. We propose to reduce the number to twelve. There are forty-five captains, and we propose to fix the number at thirty. Then the quartermaster's department will be about half way between what it was before the war and what it is now, and as the Army will be nearly three times as large according to the provisions of this bill, we thought it only reasonable.

I will say to the House one thing further, and I feel it due to the committee that the statement should be made. The Secretary of War having recommended an increase of several of the staff corps, we have in our consideration of this question not reduced some of them as much as we reduce some others. The Committee on Military Affairs received a letter a few days ago asking that the present law requiring the gradual reduction of the quartermaster's department shall be repealed. It is asked that the officers in that department shall not be reduced; yet, sir, notwithstanding that recommendation, the committee propose the reduction here of one colonel, two lieutenant colonels, three majors, and fifteen captains. I trust the House will consent to no further reduction. It is very easy to denounce the Army and to commend retrenchment, and to be able to recommend a measure which will lighten the burdens of taxation is always a pleasant task for a Representative. I trust we shall not let that desire lead us to injure the noble Army which has been in great part created out of the precious materials of the great volunteer Army which saved the nation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend so that the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff department shall be reduced one half, and the other officers to be retained shall be designated by the General of the Army. I will not now discuss this question of how to reduce—that will come up in another section. We have, or shall have, in our Army now about twenty-eight thousand men. We have of cavalry, as estimated by the Secretary of War, five thousand four hundred and fifty-five men; of artillery, three thousand four hundred and eighty-one men, and twenty thousand six hundred and thirty-one infantry. That is the way it will stand on the 1st of January.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what it will be under the present law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that well enough. I know what I am saying.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. PILE] says officers are being so reduced by drunkenness and misconduct that if we do not pass any bill they will reduce themselves. I want to hurry that reduction.

Mr. PILE rose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has been heard, and I cannot yield to him. I have not the time.

Mr. PILE. I hope, then, the gentleman will not misrepresent me.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman's remarks will be in the Globe and so will mine. He stated expressly that if the drunkenness and misconduct of the Army continued it would be reduced. Now, I find while the committee propose to reduce largely on captains they propose to reduce only one colonel. They propose to reduce largely on captains but only two or three majors. What I want is a clean thing. If six colonels are necessary for forty majors, then it does not require more than three colonels for twenty-two majors. If twenty-two majors are necessary for seventy-six captains, it does not require but one half as many majors for half the number of captains. The difficulty is, there is an attempt on the part of the committee to save these higher officers. Now, I am for reducing them by cutting them down fairly and squarely, doing justice like fate. If it is right to reduce at all it is right to reduce all alike. Even-handed justice is what I demand. Therefore I propose an amendment to cut down squarely one half right through. The committee reduce the lowest grades almost one third, and the upper grades of generals, colonels, and lieutenant colonels, who attend balls and parties here in the winter, or have social and political influence in Washington, who stick like leeches, because of their influence are reduced very little. As many as are wanted for the good of the service let us keep. I propose that Congress shall be just in its measures, and cut off all alike squarely. Make the deduction one third or one half; settle the question as to what shall be the deduction, but when you have done so strike as the justice of God strikes, directly, and not yield this way or that to save personal, political, or social favorites.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PILE. I rise to oppose the amendment simply for the purpose of saying that what I intended to say and what I think I did say with reference to the process of reduction was this: that it was the opinion of the Secretary of War and my opinion, from information received at the War Office, that a careful and rigid examination would reduce for cause the subordinate officers of the Army now in service one fourth; that at the rate dismissals had been occurring recently, some of them for crime, others for drunkenness, and others for absence without leave, or other acts of misconduct, the reduction in the course of eight or ten months would approximate one fourth. Now, the number of officers rendered supernumerary by the provisions of this bill is a little more than one fourth, so that by the time the major generals, for whose dismissal or muster out the bill as amended by the House provides, shall have been relieved, if we shall amend section eight so as to appoint a board of officers to examine the qualification of officers and their fitness for retention, at the rate of reduction now going on by the causes alluded to we shall have a reduction of one fourth. Now, I think this would much better conserve the real interest of the country by promoting the efficiency of the Army than any wholesale muster out of supernumerary officers, whether beginning at the top of the list as to rank or at the bottom.

Mr. AXTELL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. When an officer is mustered out for drunkenness or incompetency, does his place become vacant, and is it to be filled by somebody else?

Mr. PILE. Under the law, as it now stands, it becomes vacant, but if the theory of this bill is adopted there will be no vacancies except such as occur in the reduced number of regiments; and all supernumerary officers will be placed on the relieved list and relieved from duty; so that any vacancies occurring in the active list from the causes alluded to will be filled by a transfer from the relieved list of officers selected by the War Department for that purpose, and by that process the number of officers will be reduced until by the 31st of March next, at the rate now going on, by weeding out incompetent, inefficient, and improper officers, and the selection of others to take their places from the lists of relieved officers, we will get rid of the supernumeraries and have left the very best officers in the Army.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment in lieu of the section.

Mr. GARFIELD. We proceed by paragraphs, and the amendment is therefore not in order now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then I ask to have it read for information.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff department shall be reduced one half, the officers retained to be designated by the General of the Army; and those not selected to be retained shall be mustered out on the 10th day of March next.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to that as not being germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment first offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw it till the section is gone through.

The question being taken on the paragraph offered by the committee, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraphs of the section:

The number of commissaries of subsistence with the rank of major shall be reduced to six.

The number of commissaries of subsistence with the rank of captain shall be reduced to twelve.

The number of assistant paymasters general shall be reduced to one.

The number of paymasters shall be reduced to forty.

The number of surgeons with the rank of major shall be reduced to forty.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On this question of paymasters I want to call attention to the fact that the committee do not propose to have more than thirty regiments in the line of infantry, and I hope the House will never agree to more than twenty regiments of infantry, and more than five of cavalry and three of artillery. If those regiments are full they will give you an army of twenty-nine thousand six hundred men. The regiments reported by the committee call, when full, for forty-four thousand four hundred men. The committee only provide for twenty-five thousand men in this bill by another section, but they do not cut down the number of regiments to call for the proper number of men only. They propose to keep a large number of the regiments half full, the effect of which is to enable them to retain double the number of officers. It is the old sore spot which we have been probing, all the while holding on trying to save the officers. There are sixty-four paymasters now to pay those regiments, and they do not propose to cut them down to less than forty-five. Now, why cannot one paymaster do more than pay one thousand men when the rolls are all made out for him? I should like to know why, especially when each one of these paymasters has a clerk at a large salary, who generally knows more than the paymaster about the business. That has been my experience. The clerk and company officers do all the work. Now, why should this be allowed to go on. In a manufacturing establishment in Lowell, for $1,500 a year we can find a man who can pay off fifteen hundred hands every month, and keep all their accounts without any clerk. He is clerk for all hands. I hear gentlemen say that the men he pays are all in one house. So they are, but they have to be paid every month. Their wages have to be carried to one cent and odd cents, and the whole record has to be kept for monthly payments. It is eight times as much work as it is to pay a regiment. I have seen a paymaster pay a regiment in an hour and a half. The sums are generally all even, the men's names are signed on the pay-roll beforehand, and the men just walk in and take their money, and away they go almost as fast as they can march past the paymaster. And yet we are told here that we must not cut down substantially the number of paymasters.

Now, I am not going to discuss each one of these propositions, because at last I propose to offer my amendment, which is to cut down all the staff departments one half. I have here a list of general and staff officers in the register of 1867, and there are six hundred and fifty-one, which to an army of twenty-five thousand men is one staff officer to every thirty-eight men. There are sixty-four ordnance men, one hundred and seven engineers, one hundred and seventy-four surgeons, or one to every two hundred and odd men, and seventy-six quartermasters. They propose to reduce the number of these officers but one per cent. in the higher grades and twelve per cent. in the lower grades. I do not propose to attempt to perfect the section. Let gentlemen of the committee put their section in the shape in which they want it, and when they get through I shall move to cut down one third or one half, right straight through, serving all alike.

No amendments were offered, and the Clerk read the remaining paragraphs of the section, as follows:

The number of assistant surgeons, the rank of captain, shall be seventy-five:

That in the ordnance department the number of colonels shall be reduced to two; of lieutenant colonels to three; of majors to seven; of captains to eighteen; of first lieutenants to fourteen; and of second lieutenants to eight.

And immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary of War shall prepare lists of all the officers now in active service in each of the staff corps, in excess of the number in each grade authorized by the provisions of this section. Said list to be made in accordance with the provisions of the eighth and ninth sections of this act; and all officers so placed on said lists shall be in like manner relieved on half pay.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now offer the substitute for the section which I send to the Chair, and I ask a vote upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the whole number of officers serving in the above-named staff departments shall be reduced one half, the officers retained to be designated by the General of the Army, and those not selected to be retained shall be mustered out on the 10th day of March next.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the House to the difference between the modes of selection provided by the Committee on Military Affairs, and by the amendment. The chairman of the committee [Mr. GARFIELD] proposes to have the selection made in this way: to have a list of these staff officers made out, and then have the selection of those to be mustered out or retained made from the youngest in office. The cat under that meal is this: that the youngest officers being volunteer officers who have lately been appointed since the war, every volunteer officer on these staff departments will be swept out, and the old Army officers kept in. That is exactly what is meant here. "Eternal vigilance is the price of safety" for the volunteer officers in our Army. I want to have this understood by the House. The effect of this section reported by the committee will be to turn out of office every volunteer officer who has been appointed for gallant and meritorious services in either of these staff departments. I heard here last night a very high eulogy upon the regular Army. Now, I am not going to say a word against the regular Army, but I am going to state a few facts. I insist that it was the volunteer army that did the fighting in the late war; and I will prove it, and will not be long about it either.

I hold in my hand the Army Register, which has their own brag records on the tops of the pages; I do not think they are very near correct, but it is their own story. I will state some facts from that register. When the war ended there was not a single regular regiment of infantry in either of the great armies of the Cumberland under Sherman, of the Tennessee under Thomas, of the James and of the Potomac under Grant. Now, let us see if I do the regular Army injustice, for I would not do it for the world. I knew a great many brave and gallant officers in the regular Army—many commanding volunteers also—and there were a great many that—I will not say anything about.

The first regiment of regular infantry fought their last battle during the rebellion on the 4th of July, 1863, and was not any more in active service in that war. The second regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 12th and 14th of May, 1864, and saw no more active service. The third regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863, and saw no more active service. The fourth regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 17th and 20th of June, 1864, and saw no more active service. The fifth regiment of regular infantry fought their last battle in the war on the 15th of April, 1862. The sixth regiment fought their last battle on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863, and saw no more active service. The seventh regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863. The eighth regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 9th of August, 1862, at Cedar mountain. The ninth regiment was stationed on the Pacific coast, during the rebellion, and saw no active service at all so far as the rebellion was concerned. The tenth regiment of regular infantry fought their last battle in the war on the 1st of October, 1864, and saw no more active service. The eleventh regiment fought their last battle on the 18th and 21st of August, 1864. The twelfth regiment fought their last battle on the 1st of October, 1864. The thirteenth regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 24th and 25th of November, 1864. The fourteenth regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 19th and 21st of August, 1864. The fifteenth and sixteenth regiments fought their last battles on the 1st of September, 1864. The seventeenth regiment fought its last battle on the 18th and 21st of August, 1864. The eighteenth regiment fought their last battle on the 1st of September, 1864. The nineteenth regiment fought their last battle in the month of August, 1864. The twentieth regiment fought their last battle on the 18th and 21st of August, 1864. The twenty-first regiment fought their last battle on the 1st of October, 1864. The twenty-second regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 24th and 25th of November, 1863. The twenty-third regiment fought their last battle on the 19th and 21st of August, 1864. The twenty-fourth regiment fought their last battle on the 1st of September, 1864. The twenty-fifth regiment fought their last battle on the 1st of September, 1864. The twenty-sixth regiment fought their last battle in the war on the 21st of August, 1864.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very well; it is the same with the rest of the regiments.

Mr. GARFIELD. I confess myself unable to understand the operation of the mind of any man who sees in almost every proposition that other men offer something that warrants him in calling it a "cat under the meal." I have not been accustomed so to look at life and business and the doings of my fellow-men. I take it for granted generally, when a committee of the House of Representatives proposes a bill, that the committee consists of honorable men who bring us no "cats under the meal;" and therefore it never occurs to me to hunt for them.

I felt that the Committee on Military Affairs, in bringing in a proposition to reduce the staff department of the Army by dispensing with one hundred and ten men now in service, were doing a thing which would commend itself as a measure of economy—of severe retrenchment. But the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks this low and poor and mean as a measure of retrenchment. He discovers in the proposition "cats" and "meal" in any numbers and any quantities; and in order to show that the persons legislated about in this bill are men not very worthy of the consideration of this Congress or of the country, he undertakes to tell when the several regiments went out of active service in the late war. And how does he ascertain it? Why, he opens the Army Register, containing a little brief of the battles in which each regiment participated, and when he discovers the date of the last great battle they fought—for only the great battles are named—he indicates that as the period when that regiment ceased to do any worthy or honorable service. This treatment of the Army is no more just than it would be for me to raise the question when any honorable gentleman here fought his last battle of the war, and then say that that should be considered the time when he ceased to do honorable and meritorious service for the country. Sir, it cannot be considered just reasoning to say that the last great battle in which any regiment happened to be mentioned was the date at which it went out of the Army or out of honorable and active service in the late war.

Now, here is another specimen of the "cat-in-the-meal" argument in which the gentleman deals. He says the Committee on Military Affairs propose to reduce the staff about one per cent. in the higher grades, and about twelve per cent. in the very lowest grades. He wants the committee and the House to strike the Army at the top. He has great sympathy for all but those whom the country has honored by placing them in important stations of trust and responsibility.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that in his own propositions offered during the consideration of this bill, the gentleman does not ask us to act thus in regard to the two highest officers of the Army; but only after we get below those in high political positions does he propose to strike down the Army.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is it not true, as I have said, that your bill would turn out all the volunteer officers?

Mr. GARFIELD. By no means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will you explain why not?

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me notice, in the first place, the remark of the gentleman that the bill would strike off one per cent. of the higher grades and twelve per cent. of the lower. In the case of the head of a Department, consisting of a single officer, how can you make a reduction unless it be a reduction of one hundred per cent. How can you reduce the number of colonels in a given department when there are only two, unless you make a reduction of fifty per cent. This is an answer to all that argument, if it be an argument at all.

We have proposed, Mr. Speaker, a reduction which I am very sure every man who has ever held the position of Secretary of War will say is the very extreme of reduction which the interests of the service will allow. We propose to reduce the staff corps by one hundred and ten officers; and all these are officers who by reason of their long service in their respective positions are in a great degree indispensable to the administration of the Army. Yet the gentleman proposes by the simple rule of division to make a reduction of one half.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman has not answered my question as to the volunteer officers.

On the substitute of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, for the amendment offered by Mr. GARFIELD, there were—ayes 35, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 54; not voting 78; as follows:

So the substitute of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the organization of the Bureau of Military Justice shall hereafter consist of one Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel; one Assistant Judge Advocate General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a lieutenant colonel, and eight Assistant Judge Advocates General, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a major; and all promotions and appointments hereafter made in said bureau shall be in accordance with the provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 307) for the relief of certain Government contractors;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 81) placing certain troops of Missouri on an equal footing with others as to bounties; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 107) in relation to the Maquoketa river, in the State of Iowa.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT—AGAIN.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the line of the Army shall consist of thirty regiments of infantry, seven regiments of cavalry, and four regiments of artillery; said regiments to have the same organization as now provided by law, except as hereinafter provided.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to add the following:

Provided, That three regiments of colored infantry and one regiment of colored cavalry, the officers for such regiments to be selected by seniority from officers of infantry and cavalry respectively now belonging to the regiments of colored troops and not less than two thirds of the officers and enlisted men of the Veteran Reserve corps shall be retained in the service.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say a word in regard to that amendment. There were four regiments in the infantry arm provided for in the bill under which the Army was reorganized of persons who have been wounded in the service. They constitute what are called the Veteran Reserve corps. Every one of the officers and men has some honorable scar received in battle. It did not occur to the committee when the bill was first drafted that it might sweep all of those men out of the service. We now propose that at least two thirds of the officers and enlisted men of the Veteran Reserve corps shall be retained in the service. That will allow only of the mustering out of one regiment. There are also six regiments of colored troops, four infantry and two cavalry, the enlisted men being colored soldiers. We do not propose to disturb the present proportions of the Army in that regard. We propose there shall be three colored regiments of infantry and one regiment of colored cavalry. I now yield to my colleague on the committee to offer an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I wish to move an amendment that all the regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps shall be retained.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have an amendment here which, I think, will meet with the gentleman's acceptance. It is to insert in this section at the end of the second line, "four of which shall be regiments of the Veteran Reserve corps, and four regiments of colored troops."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I accept that. It is an amendment which should be adopted. Every officer in that corps has been wounded or disabled in the service of the country. If any individuals have any claim on the Army it is these wounded and disabled officers. They are in the Army and they should not be mustered out. If any one is turned out or dropped from the Army it should not be those who have been wounded and disabled in the service. If any are to be turned out rather let it be the robust and able-bodied who can take care of themselves, and not the wounded officers and soldiers who have fought and suffered for the country. If they are turned out they will become pensioners. If they were not in the Army they would be drawing pensions, and we are saving money by keeping them there.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to sundry bills concerning pensions, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had ordered that Messrs. VAN WINKLE, TRUMBULL, and EDMUNDS, be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869.

Also, that the Senate had passed without amendment the following bills and a joint resolution of the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 1119) for the registration and enrolment of certain foreign vessels;

A bill (H. R. No. 201) declaratory of the law in regard to officers cashiered from the Army by sentence of a general court-martial;

A bill (H. R. No. 1080) for the relief of Edward B. Allen; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 281) authorizing the issue of clothing to company F, eighteenth regiment United States infantry.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 567) relative to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance; and

A bill (S. No. 16) devoting a portion of the Fort Leavenworth reservation for the exclusive use of a public road.

CONTRACTS FOR COAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 6th instant, a communication from the chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Repairs, relative to contracts for the purchase of coal; which was referred to the Committee on Re-trenchment, and ordered to be printed.

TRUSTEES OF COLORED SCHOOLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the trustees of colored schools of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, remonstrating against the passage by the House of Representatives of the bill (H. R. No. 609) transferring the duties of trustees of colored schools of Washington and Georgetown to the trustees of public schools.

On motion of Mr. WELKER, the communication was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1377) to reduce and fix the military peace establishment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of the question: the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] moved an amendment in the nature of a proviso to the section. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] proposes to amend the original text. That will be reserved till after the former is considered, as it is not an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my amendment till the other is voted upon. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I report back from the Committee on Reconstruction the joint resolution (S. No. 189) excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The consideration of this resolution at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. PHELPS. I object.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to postpone the bill under consideration in regard to the reduction of the Army for the purpose of reporting the joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution reported by Mr. BOUTWELL.

The joint resolution was read as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion, and which States are not now represented in Congress, shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral vote be received or counted from any of such States unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation, and unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government, and such States shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Committee on Reconstruction have directed me to move the following amendments:

Strike out the words "and which States are not now represented in Congress."

Strike out the word "and" after the word "operation," and insert the word "nor."

Add the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any State which was represented in Congress on the 4th of March, 1867.

So that the joint resolution, as amended, will read as follows:

That none of the States whose inhabitants were lately in rebellion shall be entitled to representation in the Electoral College for the choice of President or Vice President of the United States, nor shall any electoral vote be received or counted from any of such States, unless at the time prescribed by law for the choice of electors the people of such States, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf, shall have, since the 4th day of March, 1867, adopted a constitution of State government, under which a State government shall have been organized and shall be in operation, nor unless such election of electors shall have been held under the authority of such constitution and government; and such States shall have also become entitled to representation in Congress, pursuant to the acts of Congress in that behalf.

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any State which was represented in Congress on the 4th of March, 1867.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this resolution is so apparent from the reading of it I presume the House will be prepared to vote upon it without any explanation. The object is, of course, to provide that all those States which may be admitted previous to November next, shall be entitled to vote for electors of President and Vice President; and that the States, if any, which shall not then have been restored to the Union shall be excluded from participation in the presidential election. The text of the resolution would exclude Tennessee, inasmuch as she was fully restored to the Union previous to the passage of the original act concerning reconstruction. The sole object of the proviso reported by the Committee on Reconstruction is to relieve Tennessee from the terms of the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts inform the House by what authority this House or the Congress can undertake to exclude any State from the right of representation in the Electoral College? Under what provision of the Constitution can Congress declare that a State shall not be represented? The gentleman seems to think this a very plain matter, and one on which, I infer from his remarks, the House should vote under the operation of the previous question; and yet the gentleman has not undertaken to give us the authority by which Congress can exclude a State from representation in the Electoral College. I would be glad to hear from him on that point and to understand upon what he bases the authority of this Congress to act in that behalf.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot go at great length into all the circumstances by which these States, through the influence of the gentleman's political friends, lost their representation in the Congress of the United States; but it so happened that they did withdraw seven or eight years ago and they have not yet been readmitted to representation here. But I say to him that I suppose the purpose of the majority here, and, I take it, the purpose of the country unmistakably is to hold these States in the grasp of the loyal people of the country until they are reconstructed under loyal influences, with loyal majorities, loyal State governments, and until loyal Representatives and Senators are elected to Congress, and when all those things have transpired, then, as I suppose, these States are to participate in the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts has certainly not answered, if he has attempted to answer, the question which I propounded to him. I ask him for the authority by which Congress may exclude States from their representation in the Electoral College, and he tells us that by the action of myself and my friends these States have ceased to be in a position whereby they have a right to vote or to act in this capacity. The gentleman need not tell this House any such thing as that, for he knows, and I know and God knows that it is not so. [Laughter on the Republican side of the House.] I tell the gentleman from Massachusetts that the war was a success against the rebellion, and these States were saved to the Union, and he cannot humbug me or this Congress or the people by declaring that we have kept them out or that we have taken any step that has that effect. I say to the gentleman that every State that ever belonged to this Union is to-day in this Union.

Mr. MULLINS. I advise the gentleman not to call on God about this question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman will not interfere with me I trust. We shall be enlightened by his eloquence when the gentleman from Massachusetts yields the floor to him. [Laughter.]

I say, that if the States are kept out at all, they are kept out, as the gentleman asserts, by the grasp of what he terms "loyal" men upon the throats of the States. I deny that loyal men hold any States in their grasp except the States in which they live. The loyal men of Massachusetts have no more right to hold the State of South Carolina by the throat than the State of South Carolina has the right to hold the State of Massachusetts by the throat, and prevent her from voting in the Electoral College. I say that no such power exists and the gentleman from Massachusetts has not undertaken to give us the source from which he derives his authority. I ask him again to answer to me and to this House upon what he does base his right to exclude a State from representation in the Electoral College and from its right to vote?

Mr. BOUTWELL. We do not claim any such right, Mr. Speaker. All the organized States of this Union are entitled to vote and will vote; but in 1864—I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin was then a member of this House—we passed a resolution unanimously, nobody contradicting it, that the eleven States, as he calls them, naming them, that had gone into rebellion in 1861 should not vote for electors of President and Vice President. How does the gentleman account for his neglect to do his duty then? Why did not he raise his voice then and ask that his associates and coworkers in the Democratic party in the attempt to dissolve the Union should come here and participate in the presidential election of 1864? The gentleman then was silent, as I remember.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I thank the gentleman for the opportunity to say that the country was then at war with the people of those States; to-day peace exists from one end of this Union to the other. The armies of the Union have been successful, the rebellion has been subdued, the people of the South acknowledge the authority of the Constitution, and their States to-day have the right to be represented in this Congress and in every other department of this Government, as they were represented before the rebellion. If they are excluded longer, it will be the gentleman and his party who will exclude them. It is not their rebellion, it is not war, but it is the "loyal people," as the gentleman terms them, who are treading under foot the Constitution and the rights of these people, and excluding them, as some day—I pray God that day may never come—the people of some other locality may unite to exclude the State of Massachusetts, if the doctrine of the gentleman be true.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman does well to remind the House and the country that these States, as he calls them, were excluded in 1864 on account of the war. And three of them are excluded to-day on account of that war, the effects of which have not yet ceased.

In 1860 and 1861, as the gentleman very well knows, the Democratic party of the country entered upon a crusade to break up this Government and attempted to wrest eleven States from the control of the Constitution and to separate them from the Union. Under the lead of the loyal men in the South we have substantially restored eight of these States to the Union against the protests made by the forty-five gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House. And now, under the lead of that protest and of the platform laid down by their candidate for the Vice Presidency, they propose to again involve this country in a war for the purpose of thrusting those eight restored States out of the Union. That is exactly the position the Democratic party occupies now. For the purpose of destroying the Union they brought upon this country one war, which cost four million dollars, and three hundred thousand lives; and now, when we have nearly restored it, without the sacrifice of a single life, so far as the restoration is concerned, the Democratic party proposes to engage in another war, under the lead of an aspirant for the Vice Presidency, who is, in fact, a conspirator against the Government of the country, and this for the purpose of driving out of the Union the eight States that have already been restored under our lead and under the power of peace.

"War for the destruction of the Union" is the motto under which the gentleman's friends and former associates have rallied during the last eight years; it is the motto which he and they now emblazon on their banner for this presidential contest, and for the next four years.

Our motto is "peace and the restoration of the Union." And so soon as the other three States can be restored by the instrumentality of peace and under the lead of loyal men, they will be restored. We work under the ensign of peace, for the restoration of three more States to the Union. The gentleman and his associates raise the banner of war for the expulsion of eight States that have already been restored. That is the issue on which we now go to the country.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] cannot fasten any such position as he has stated upon me and my associates; no such position has ever been taken by us. I say that the Democratic party has never taken any such position as that which the gentleman from Massachusetts ascribes to us. We have never been opposed to a restoration of this Union; we have never been opposed to the return of these States. There has never been a moment since the war was inaugurated, or since peace came, or as it ought to come to bless this land, but which it has not, there has not been a moment when we would not cheerfully have received all those States back into the Union.

But the gentlemen on the other side have been the means of prolonging what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] terms this war. If war exists to-day, if it has existed within the last two or three years, I say the Republican party of this country is responsible for that war.

But, sir, there has, during the last three or four years, been no war except the acts of war which this Congress has perpetrated upon that people and upon those States. The people of those States are broken down, crushed, trampled into the dust by the usurpations, by the, I had almost said, atrocious acts of this Congress. Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts knows well that the only reason why those States are held in the grasp of despotic power which he calls "loyal power" is that he and his associates fear that those States, if left, as they ought to be, free to act, would act in accord with the Democratic party. The gentleman knows that all this continuation of the acts of war upon that people is designed to coerce them into the support of the Republican party and its candidates. He knows that he and his associates and the party with whom he acts would never have thought of subjecting those States to the control of the ignorant negroes there but for the purpose of extending the lease of power of the party to which he belongs. He dare not, upon his conscience and before his God, deny that that is the sole purpose for which this whole scheme was inaugurated and for which he now seeks to pass this bill. The only object is to prolong the lease of unhallowed power which his party has too long held in this country. I challenge that gentleman to join with us and place those States, as the Constitution places them, upon terms of perfect equality with his State. I say again that if this doctrine upon which gentlemen on the other side have been acting is still to be carried out, the day will come, which I with those gentlemen would deplore, when Massachusetts may be upon her knees begging for the rights which the Constitution guarantees her and all the States, and which are now denied to the States of the South.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, no State that is true to this Union will ever have occasion to go upon its knees begging for its rights. If the Democratic party had been true to this Union, as Massachusetts was true, during the last eight years, none of these States would now be here suppliants for restoration to the benefits of a Government which a few years ago, under the lead of the gentleman and his friends, they spurned.

Now, sir, one word more, which I would be glad to address to the people of the South. In 1860 and 1861, Democrats of the North—such men as Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire—encouraged the rebels of the South to engage in war, telling them that in the event of such a contest blood would flow in the streets of the North, intending it to be understood that the Democrats of the North would give the Radicals, as we were called, plenty to do at home, so that the twelve or fifteen States of the South should have an opportunity to set up governments of their own in defiance of the national authority. The rebels of the South were deceived. The Democrats of the North had not the courage or the heart to make good the pledges which they had given to their traitorous allies in the South; and the southern men were sacrificed—in an unholy enterprise, to be sure—because they were deserted by the men in the North on whom they had relied.

Again, in 1865, when Andrew Johnson came to the Presidency, the men of the South trusted to his professions and the professions of the Democratic party that they would be sustained in their attempt to reorganize rebel white men's governments and to trample under foot the loyal white and black men of the South. In that they were disappointed; and they are now reaping the bitter fruits of their reliance upon Mr. Johnson and the Democracy of the North.

What does the Democratic party, by its late action in New York, promise the South? It says "If we can elect a Democratic President and Vice President, a 'white man's government' shall be reestablished in the eight States of the South." Thus the Democracy would again deceive the men of the South, whom I warn no longer to put trust in that party. Whatever may happen, the Senate will be Republican for the next two years. We have already relieved twelve or fifteen hundred men of the South who participated in the rebellion from the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Our purpose is, as far and as fast as they bring forth "fruits meet for repentance," to liberate them all. But if by accident or by a fatality which seems outside the range of providential influences, the Democracy should succeed in the election of a President, what can they do for the South? Nothing—nothing. We shall be obliged to stand upon the defensive and hold all these men for four years where they now are, and the Democracy will be powerless to redeem a single promise they now make. The interest of the South, of the men who have been in the rebellion, is to stand fast by the Republican party, which has shown a disposition to be just and generous to every man in the South when we can so do without danger to republican institutions.

But, sir, look at the letter of Frank Blair. [Cries of "Read it!" from the Republican side of the House.] Yes, sir, let it be read. It cannot be read too often in the presence of the forty-five men who signed and presented a protest here against the admission of members from the State of Arkansas, upon the same grounds substantially as those presented in Blair's letter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am glad the gentleman is going to have that letter read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 30, 1868.

DEAR COLONEL: In reply to your inquiries I beg leave to say that I leave to you to determine, on consultation with my friends from Missouri, whether my name shall be presented to the Democratic convention, and to submit the following, as what I consider the real and only issue in this contest:

The reconstruction policy of the Radicals will be complete before the next election; the States so long excluded will have been admitted; negro suffrage established and the carpet-baggers installed in their seats in both branches of Congress. There is no possibility of changing the political character of the Senate, even if the Democrats should elect their President and a majority of the popular branch of Congress. We cannot, therefore, undo the Radical plan of reconstruction by congressional action; the Senate will continue a bar to its repeal. Must we submit to it? How can it be overthrown? It can only be overthrown by the authority of the Executive who is sworn to maintain the Constitution, and who will fail to do his duty if he allows the Constitution to perish under a series of congressional enactments which are in palpable violation of its fundamental principles.

If the President elected by the Democracy enforces or permits others to enforce these reconstruction acts, the Radicals by the accession of twenty spurious Senators and fifty Representatives will control both branches of Congress, and his administration will be as powerless as the present one of Mr. Johnson.

There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void, compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to reorganize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives. The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North, and they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit once more to the obligations of the Constitution. It will not be able to withstand the public judgment, if distinctly invoked and clearly expressed on this fundamental issue, and it is the sure way to avoid all future strife to put the issue plainly to the country.

I repeat that this is the real and only question which we should allow to control us: shall we submit to the usurpations by which the Government has been overthrown, or shall we exert ourselves for its full and complete restoration? It is idle to talk of bonds, greenbacks, gold, the public faith, and the public credit. What can a Democratic President do in regard to any of these with a Congress in both branches controlled by the carpet-baggers and their allies? He will be powerless to stop the supplies by which idle negroes are organized into political clubs—by which an army is maintained to protect these vagabonds in their outrages upon the ballot. These, and things like these, eat up the revenues and resources of the Government and destroy its credit—make the difference between gold and greenbacks. We must restore the Constitution before we can restore the finances, and to do this we must have a President who will execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpation of Congress, known as the reconstruction acts. I wish to stand before the convention upon this issue, but it is one which embraces everything else that is of value in its large and comprehensive results. It is the one thing that includes all that is worth a contest, and without it there is nothing that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle.

Your friend,
Colonel JAMES O. BROADHEAD.

Mr. BROOKS. If the gentleman will go on and have the Democratic platform read it will then be complete.

Mr. BOUTWELL. We have had it read already.

Mr. BROOKS. I mean the platform adopted by the Democratic convention.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, it is worthy of observation that the Democratic convention at New York sat four days, differing, I suppose, judging from their votes, as to who should be their candidate for the Presidency, and after the disposition of that question on a single ballot and with perfect unanimity they nominated the writer of this letter to be their candidate for the Vice Presidency of the United States. Now, what does he propose to do? He proposes that the President of the United States, without law, and of course without constitutional authority, shall take the Army and drive out of this House and out of the Senate the members entitled by the operation of the law and under the provisions of the Constitution to seats in this House and in the Senate; and not only that, but to proceed with the Army to the eight States in the South and disperse the Legislatures thereof, set up new Legislative Assemblies to be elected by the votes of rebel white men only, and Senators and Representatives are to be elected by those men to the Congress of the United States, and by the military power to be put into their seats. It is distinctly declared by Frank P. Blair, jr., that it is the duty of the President of the United States, a Democratic President of the United States, to usurp the powers of the Senate and of the House and to annihilate eight States by arms and to set up in those eight military governments States.

Mr. MUNGEN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MUNGEN. I ask the gentleman where he was when Frank Blair was fighting the battles of his country?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was in the service of the country; but one thing I never did, I never professed to serve under a commission as a General in the Army, and to serve in this House as a member of Congress, exercising civil functions and military authority at the same time, in violation of the Constitution and the theory of the Government of the United States.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to make a few remarks.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts announced in his opening remarks it was well known what was the purpose of this bill, and therefore he reluctantly admitted of any discussion, and indicated his intention to put it through under the previous question.

The purpose of the bill is perfectly well known. It is to hold this vast territory stretching from the Potomac to the Rio Grande under the tutelage of this and the other branch of Congress; not of the convention appointed by the Constitution to count these votes, the only constitutional authority which can take cognizance of the electoral votes, but to hold this vast territory under the tutelage of the two-thirds majority in the two Houses of Congress. If in the Electoral College the ten southern States are found to be "loyal" their electoral vote will be counted, but if they are found to be Democratic the two Houses of Congress will reject their votes.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has discovered by the election recently held in Mississippi that the negroes, even the ignorant negroes of the South, are unwilling to be ridden, booted and spurred, by delegates and carpet-baggers from Massachusetts and other States of the Union. The negro is about tired of that sort of operation by emigrants from the North who have gone down there for the purpose of being sent to the Capitol at Washington from the plantations of the South. Hence the purpose of this bill, clearly written on the face of it, is if these southern States vote as the two Houses of Congress direct their votes shall be counted; if not, hold them in tutelage and reject their votes.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I would rather be answered by the gentleman from Massachusetts in his place when I am done. I am but a tenant of the floor at will.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If my colleague desires to put a question I will consent to allow the gentleman time to answer.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to put a question touching the political aspect of the case. Does not the gentleman hold that Congress has authority to prescribe the mode in which members of the Electoral College shall be chosen?

Mr. BROOKS. But this bill goes further.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to have an answer to the question.

Mr. BROOKS. But this bill goes further. When that case is presented I will answer it, but it is not a case presented here.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman declines to answer I will put another.

Mr. BROOKS. That only relates to the time and place of holding elections—to time more especially.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman hold that any one may be a member of an Electoral College who is not chosen in conformity to law?

Mr. BROOKS. Congress has explicit power, and only the power, as I have stated before, to determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which shall be the same throughout the United States. Any other power on this subject exercised by Congress is an arbitrary power. The Constitution of the United States prescribes that every State is entitled to two Senators in the other House, and a representation in proportion to population on this floor. It in like manner prescribes that the number of electors shall correspond with the number of Senators and Representatives, while this bill assumes on the part of Congress, in defiance of those two provisions of the Constitution, to exclude these States from having their electoral votes counted here on the floor of the House.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman answer another question I will venture to put to him? I would like to inquire where in the Constitution the legislative power of Congress over this matter is confined to time, place, and manner?

Mr. BROOKS. What is not granted in the Constitution is refused in the Constitution. It is for the gentleman from Massachusetts to show with his own finger the clause in the Constitution which confers the power this bill assumes to give. It is not my duty to prove a negative; it is his to make out an affirmative.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman claim that the electors from each State may be chosen according to the law of, in the manner prescribed by each State, or that they shall be chosen by some uniform law, and that a law of Congress?

Mr. BROOKS. Suppose I admit that. All the Constitution says is that Congress shall determine the time of choosing electors, and the day on which they shall be chosen.

Mr. DAWES. On what page is that.

Mr. BROOKS. Article two, section one, of the Constitution.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Read the whole of it.

Mr. BROOKS. I will read it:

"The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States."

That is all the power Congress has. And now permit me to go on.

Mr. BOUTWELL. We have not a great deal of time.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman allowed me to be interrupted by his colleague [Mr. DAWES] on the express condition that I should go on. I did not seek this side controversy.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Let me call the gentleman's attention to another provision of the Constitution.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh, no; the gentleman can obtain permission after I am done, because he has ample power. I am here at the mercy of a very large adverse majority, and time is precious to me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It might aid the gentleman's argument.

Mr. BROOKS. I must decline to yield. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] doing what I wish could have been avoided, introduced party topics and party excitement in the midst of this discussion, and in the course of his remarks he said that our political friends on this side of the House had brought about the late calamitous war. Sir, there was a history of that war written out long before the firing on Fort Sumter, and long before the assembling of the southern States in convention, and in all their principles and associations, and practically in their very acts of rebellion, they were educated by the State which the gentleman from Massachusetts in part represents, and which were carried out in the Hartford convention, and in other victorious acts of the State of Massachusetts.

Sir, the war was not begun by the Democratic party of the South. The war was no more begun by the Democratic party of the South than by the Whigs of the South. The one party was as much responsible for it as was the other. When the honorable gentleman spoke of the incitement and the promises given by the Democrats of the North to support the war against the Union, I wonder that on looking at the gentlemen around him who were then leaders in the Democratic party he did not have sufficient respect for their feelings to abstain from making such remarks in their presence. Sir, he is surrounded on all sides by Democrats who were conspicuous by their positions and by the speeches which they made prior to the opening of the war, and whatever imprudent remarks may have been made by any other persons, they are as much responsible for such remarks as any one, and they are now leading gentlemen upon that side of the House.

Sir, the war did not begin by the firing on Fort Sumter, but it began by the invasion of John Brown, [laughter,] supported by guns and pikes and arms and money contributed by the State of Massachusetts and other New England and northwestern States. The first invasion of that war was the invasion of Virginia by the little cohort of John Brown. The first tocsin of war was sounded then. The first resistance to an act of Congress which was preached and practiced came not from the South, but was in the State of Massachusetts and in the city of Boston. However unpopular or odious may have been the fugitive-slave law, however distasteful it may have been to all parties, to the Democratic as well as to the Republican party, it was a law of Congress, a constitutional law, a law which, when first enacted, was approved by George Washington, supported throughout by all Administrations and declared to be a constitutional law, I am told by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, and yet the first fatal lesson of resistance to law, the first educator in the violation of law was in the city of Boston and in the contiguous towns, which rescued from the writs of the United States marshal of the district a subject of that fugitive-slave law in utter defiance of the law. They who have educated others to defy the laws—the constitutional laws—who have been teachers of violation of laws, and who have brought the country up to a disregard of those laws, ought to be among the last to reproach others who have followed their example and who have been educated in their school.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts was pleased to say, in imputation upon or in derogation of the Democratic party, that there were evidences of this war all around us. Sir, there are in our taxation and in our debt, in that taxation to which we and our posterity will be subject throughout all time, unless we can recover the power and better frame and control the legislation of Congress. For that war, the honorable member from Massachusetts and the men with whom he has acted and whose principles were his in the olden time are as much responsible as the party with which I am associated at the present time.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] then grew eloquent upon the position of the Democratic party in its recent convention in the city of New York; and in the course of the remarks of the gentleman upon the letter of the next Vice President he asks us what is to be our course, and what we intend to do.

Sir, I dare not undertake to be the exponent of the Democratic party; no man now on this floor has the right to be that. There is the platform of our party; there it is on the record. Upon that we stand, and upon that we intend to stand. I refer to the resolution of the Democratic national convention assembled in the city of New York; that is our record.

If the honorable gentleman expects us to accept the issue he proposes, if he expects that we are to sit down in quiet and contentment under these reconstruction acts, I tell him that he indulges in the vainest of all dreams. We will exert all our power here and everywhere to repeal and overthrow those acts in every possible constitutional manner. We go before the people with pride upon this issue. Shall the eight so-called reconstructed States of the South continue to be governed by negroes almost exclusively, or are they to be governed as are the States of Ohio, Minnesota, Wisconsin, New York, and Pennsylvania? Are they to be governed by white men, or are they to be governed by negroes? That is our issue, and upon that issue we proudly appeal from you in this Hall to the people of the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I must now resume the floor; but I would like to put a question to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.]

Mr. BROOKS. Is it generous on the part of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] with his control and power over this debate, to arrest it in this way?

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me five minutes to speak to this joint resolution, and the amendments proposed to it by the Committee on Reconstruction, eschewing politics altogether?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] after I get a reply from the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] to a question I desire to ask him. I wish the gentleman from New York to give a definite answer without argument to the question, whether he approves and sustains the letter of Francis P. Blair, jr., which has been read by the Clerk.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman and myself are both Yankees; let us exchange questions. I propose, if the gentleman will allow me, to dwell upon the Blair letter at some little length in answer to his question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman on the Blair letter.

Mr. BROOKS. In the first place I do not suppose that Mr. Blair had a right to create a platform for the party. I presume when he accepts the nomination for Vice President he accepts the platform of the party without reference to his own individual opinions. But in regard to the Blair letter allow me to say what I understand the letter to be, and what is the doctrine of the Democratic party upon the subject of that letter. If the Supreme Court of the United States has declared, as we believe the Supreme Court of the United States has declared, that the reconstruction acts of Congress are unconstitutional, then the moment that declaration of the Supreme Court is promulgated all those acts become officially null and void, and it then becomes the duty of the President of the United States to repeal those acts by all the executive authority which is within his power. They are acts without the authority of law, and are binding upon no one, and whoever attempts to execute those acts goes against the law and the decision of the constituted judicial authority of the land. That is all I understand Mr. Blair to say in his letter; that the Supreme Court of the United States, as it is believed, having declared in the McCord case that the reconstruction acts of Congress are unconstitutional, it becomes the duty of the Executive, whenever the promulgation of that decision is made, to carry out the declaration of the Supreme Court, and to restore the laws of the country to what they were before the enactment of those acts by the two Houses of Congress.

I believe those laws to be unconstitutional and void; we have so declared them to be in our platform; but if the Supreme Court of the United States should declare them constitutional, we shall submit to them, if not with cheerfulness with deference profound and humble; for we acknowledge our constitutional duty to obey all the laws of the land as expounded by the supreme judicial tribunal. That is the platform of the Democratic party; that is the platform of General Blair, our candidate for the Vice Presidency; and if the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts can make more of it than the explanation I have given, he has greater astuteness than New England men usually have; and few have more than they.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as we are both Yankees, I wish the gentleman would give me his opinion of the third resolution of the Republican platform?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; I cannot go into a discussion of the Republican platform at present. We are disposing of another platform to-day, and that is sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, I have agreed to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I would like to have about three minutes.

Mr. BECK. I will postpone my remarks until the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets through.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield, then, in the first place to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I merely want to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] whether he recollects that in 1864, before the last presidential election, this Congress passed a law similar to the bill now before us, to regulate the opening and counting of the electoral votes; and by that law we excluded from the count all the States in rebellion, thus showing at least the jurisdiction of Congress upon this subject?

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the existing state of the country now in 1868 is not very different from what it was at the time to which he alludes?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Not a bit! [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. Are we in a state of rebellion?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. You are in a state of rebellion, [laughter;] and Frank Blair so declares. He declares that the only course for the Democratic party is to elect a President who shall send the armies of the Union to uproot all we have done in reconstructing the South, forcibly deprive of the right of suffrage about half of the legal voters, reestablish the institution of slavery, reorganize the "white man's Government," and enforce as the law of that country, not what Congress says shall be the law, but what he and the Democratic party may determine. Is not that rebellion?

Mr. BROOKS. Sir, the Democratic party is always in rebellion against tyranny and tyrants. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. So it is; and anything but a "white man's Government"—a "Democratic" Government—is with that party "tyranny." They are always in rebellion against everything but "Democratic," pro-slavery rule. For slavery is as the apple of their eye; slavery they "roll like a sweet morsel under their tongues." And when the Republicans have stricken slavery from the institutions of this country, declaring every man as free as air, the Democracy call upon the people to elect a President who shall reestablish the old Government, (those are the very words, I believe,) a President who shall exclude from the ballot a large part of the present voters, and allow the right of suffrage to those only who enjoyed the right under the old slave system.

But, sir, I rose simply to show that Congress possesses jurisdiction of this subject, which the gentleman from New York denied. We exercised jurisdiction before Mr. Lincoln was elected the second time. We passed a law to exclude in the presidential election the votes of the rebel States. That settles the question of jurisdiction. So that the only question is as to the expediency of the proposed law.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask the gentleman a question. From what provision of the Constitution, unless it be that with regard to suppressing insurrection and rebellion, does he derive the authority to pass such a bill as this?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I derive it from the provision giving Congress authority to open and count the electoral votes. Of course we are to provide the means by which that shall be done. Should Canada be allowed to send in electoral votes? And on the same principle have we not the power to exclude the rebel States? Yet they were always in the Union, they were always entitled to be represented here, according to the doctrine of the gentleman and his slavery tribe, for it is nothing better. The Democratic party! Why, sir, it is the slave party. It is nothing but a slave party, and it will be a slave party until we grind them to powder under our heels, and Freedom, with the flapping of her wings, shall blow the dust out of existence and consign them to everlasting oblivion. God grant that day may soon come! [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has twelve minutes left.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, as the proposition before the House seemed to have been lost sight of in the political discussion which has sprung up, I promised the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] if he would allow me five minutes that I would avoid general politics and confine myself to the pending question. I will endeavor to comply with my promise. I find no warrant in the Constitution for the powers sought to be conferred by this resolution on the Congress of the United States. It provides that each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress; that they shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice President, making distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the President of the Senate, who shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted, the person having the greatest number of votes shall be President, &c. The opening of the certificates and counting the votes is the only power Congress has, unless it be the power to determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States. From what source, then, does Congress derive the power or authority to pass such a resolution as is now proposed?

But flagrantly wrong as the Senate resolution is, the amendment proposed by the Reconstruction Committee is infinitely worse. The Senate excluded from the operation of the resolution the States lately in rebellion which are now represented in Congress; the proposed amendment brings within its provision the States of Arkansas, North Carolina, and Florida, whose Representatives are now occupying seats here and at the other end of the Capitol, whether rightfully or wrongfully I do not care to consider now. They are here—admitted, I suppose, with the same rights and privileges as any of us. The States they represent are either coequal States with all the others, or their Representatives are not properly on this floor. What right, then, has this House to say that the electors chosen in accordance with the laws of these States shall not have the same rights and be entitled to the same privileges as the electors appointed or elected in any other State? Are these States still unreconstructed? Are they still in vassalage to Congress? Are they existing only so long as they shall continue to vote and act in all things as the majority here may dictate? I have no doubt the whole meaning and purpose of the resolution and the amendment is to count as valid all such electoral votes from all these States as may be cast for General Grant, and on some pretext or other to reject all such as may be cast against him, and the sooner the country understands it the better. Tennessee is expressly excluded from the operation of this resolution. Perhaps it is understood that she has been so managed and her people so far disfranchised that her vote is safe, while that of Arkansas, North Carolina, and Florida, as well as that of the other southern States, cannot be controlled even under the process of reconstruction to which they have been subjected.

The resolution is artfully drawn so as to invest Congress with full power to do whatever may be necessary in determining whether the electoral vote shall be counted or not, and the gentleman who presented the amendment will not deny that I have stated truly the meaning and object of the amendment proposed. In order to extend the power of Congress over the electoral votes of the ten States of the South as far as possible, this resolution sets aside the reconstruction acts of Congress, and not only allows the Senate and House of Representatives when assembled to count the electoral votes, to admit or reject the votes of such of the southern States as shall by law be admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States, but of all such as shall be entitled to be admitted to such representation. Of course, whether they are entitled to be so admitted will depend altogether upon how they cast their electoral votes. If they vote for Grant they will be considered as entitled, if against him they will not be entitled; not even the now fully-admitted States of North Carolina, Arkansas, and Florida. In this way the two Houses when assembled simply to count the vote will determine, not in their legislative capacity, but as a convention, all the legal questions relating to these States, the reconstruction laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

The fifth section of the act of March 2, 1837, after setting forth in detail what the southern States shall be required to do as indispensable prerequisites to their readmission, says after all these things are done:

"Said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom on their taking the oath prescribed by law, and then and thereafter the preceding sections of this act shall be inoperative in said States."

Section six provides that until the people of said rebel States shall be by law admitted to representation in the Congress of the United States any civil governments which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and in all respects subject to the paramount authority of the United States at any time to abolish, modify, control, or supersede the same; yet in defiance of this, their own favorite measure, the majority here now propose to count the votes of all the southern States that may happen to cast their electoral votes for General Grant, whether they have been admitted or not, their vote being the requisite evidence that they are entitled to admission, and to reject the electoral vote even of North Carolina, Arkansas, and Florida, though now fully admitted, notwithstanding the provisions of the fifth section, which I have read, declaring all the reconstruction acts inoperative as soon as the States are admitted, if these admitted States shall, as they will, cast their votes against the Radical candidate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now demand the previous question, and after it is seconded, I will reply to remarks made by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask for a division on seconding the previous question. I do not think the House is prepared to second it.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 81, noes 22.

So the main question was seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I only wanted to see how many Democrats were out of their places. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Every one is out of his place that is here. [Laughter.] The main question was then ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not wish to occupy much time in debate. The House will bear witness that I was brought into the political discussion by the question or series of questions which were put by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] But now I have a few observations to make upon those matters which have been introduced during the discussion on the one side and the other.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] was pleased to speak of me personally and of gentlemen on this side of the House as having in times past disregarded the laws of the land. Sir, I know of no such case. And when I speak of myself personally I speak also of the party to which I belong. We have obeyed the laws at all times and under all circumstances, when, as I am free to confess, those laws were disagreeable in their character and of doubtful constitutionality. But can the gentleman say as much for himself and for his associates? In 1860, by the strictest observance of the Constitution and laws of the country we elected Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, President of the United States. Three months before his inauguration the State which was the champion of the ancient, pro-slavery, secession, disunion Democracy passed an ordinance of secession from the Union in violation of the laws and of the Constitution of the country, and followed by ten other of these eleven States, for four long years under the lead of the Democracy of the South, and with the sympathy, coöperation, and support of the Democracy of the North, carried on a war aggressive always, and sometimes formidable, against the laws and Constitution of the country.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a very short time?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have only a few minutes. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations gives me notice that in twenty minutes he will bring up a question of privilege which will take me from the floor. Therefore I cannot yield.

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman has put a very pertinent question to this side of the House.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not putting a question; I am stating facts.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to say a single word if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well.

Mr. MARSHALL. I have heard these charges frequently made against the Democracy of the northern States of their having directly or indirectly taken part in secession or rebellion; but, sir, they are not sustained by facts, as every intelligent man in the country must know. There were a few men in the North that did, at Charleston, when the Democratic party was unfortunately broken up, inaugurate a movement in that direction, gentlemen who were inclined for a time to act with the secession party in going into rebellion. But they were very few in number, while the entire party in the North neither directly nor indirectly took part in the rebellion. On the other hand, thousands and thousands laid down their lives in defense of the Union and the Constitution, by which they have stood at all times. The few who stood by the secession movement in the South were not in affiliation with the Democratic party, but are acting with the Republican or Radical party today.

The great body of the Democratic party of the North have been true to the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws at all times. They opposed the rebels when in arms, and they are opposed to rebels called now the Radical party, when by an unfortunate coincidence of circumstances they have control of the legislation of this country, and have disregarded the Constitution and have been for three years trampling it beneath their unhalloved feet. The gentleman cannot point to the action of the Democratic party anywhere in the North in any State, or in any organization anywhere giving encouragement to the rebels while in arms against the Constitution and the Union. The charge is not only not true, but every gentleman of intelligence in this country must know that it has no foundation in fact. Mr. Lincoln himself time and again acknowledged that if it had not been for the Democratic party at the North the rebels in the South must have been successful in their efforts to break up the Government, or rather to withdraw from it and set up a separate government. He time and again acknowledged that, and it can be proved. And he remarked at one time to a distinguished gentleman, in the presence of a Radical member of this House, that the gentlemen of his own party were very good at resolutions and long prayers, but if it was not for the stubborn valor of the Democracy of the North the Union would have been compelled to go down before the rebellion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I resume the floor. The gentleman cannot have forgotten the letter of his leader, Franklin Pierce, of the 16th of January, 1861. He cannot have forgotten the letter of his associate upon this floor, when mayor of the city of New York, to the authorities of Savannah, in the State of Georgia. He cannot have forgotten the resolution of the convention at Chicago in August, 1864, declaring the war a failure and demanding a cessation of hostilities. He cannot have forgotten the riots of the 2d and 3d of July, 1863, in the city of New York, when his candidate for the Presidency addressed the rioters of that city who had kindled the flames of war in the commercial metropolis of the country and murdered children and unoffending persons—addressed those men, then reeking with the crimes from which they had just come, as “my friends.” He cannot have forgotten the hostility which his political associates throughout the North manifested to the enforcement of the draft. He cannot have forgotten the sympathetic speeches that were made upon the floor of this House in the Thirty-Eighth and Thirty-Ninth Congresses. He cannot have forgotten the declarations of the press in various parts of the country representing the Democratic party, denouncing every measure for the prosecution of the war and holding up the generals of the Army and the men intrusted with civil affairs to the odium of the people of the country and to the anathemas of the world. More than this, to-day the party with which he cooperates is sympathizing with rebels. They demand the prostration of the loyal people of the South, black and white, and the restoration to authority in those States of the men who had been engaged in the rebellion. Let me read; and you, men who fought at Shiloh, you who were encamped before Vicksburg in 1863, you who returned maimed and wounded from the bloody fields of Antietam and Gettysburg, you who marched with Sherman from the mountains to the sea, you who remain of that bloody band who fought the battles of the Wilderness and who finally at Appomattox Court-House saw the surrender of Lee and the end of the rebellion, listen to what the organ of the Democratic party, on the 4th of July, 1868, under the influence of the rebels assembled in council at Tammany Hall, said to the people of New York and of the country concerning the men who inaugurated the rebellion, and whom you subdued in arms. I read from the New York World, and first the heading:

“PERSONAL DESCRIPTION OF THE MEMBERS OF THE CONVENTION.”

“THEIR RECORD OF SERVICES TO THE NATION.”

The men on whom the Republic relies for salvation.

First:

“Hon. John A. Winston is also an ex-Governor, a merchant at Mobile, was an old-line Whig, supported Douglas in 1860; was colonel of the ninety-first Alabama infantry, C. S. A.”

Then comes:

“James H. Clanton is chairman of the Democratic State executive committee, an old-line Whig, Douglas elector, during the war was a general of cavalry in the confederate service.”

That is his “record of services to the nation!” He is one of the men on whom the Republic relies for salvation in the estimation of the friends of the gentleman from Illinois.

Here still further from South Carolina, in this record of men on whom the Republic relies for salvation, listen to the record of the services of General Wade Hampton to the nation:

“He heads the delegation. He was one of the most prominent cavalry generals on the southern side during the war. He is unquestionably the leading man in South Carolina, and fills more nearly than any other the place left vacant by Calhoun in the hearts of the white people.”

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, not now. These are the men on whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] and his associates rely “for the salvation of the Republic.” Yes, they are the men on whom the Democracy relies for the salvation of the Republic, according to their ideas of salvation. And they are as much in error in regard to salvation in this world as I have no doubt they are in regard to salvation in another state of existence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] will allow another extract to be read in regard to another distinguished member of the Democratic party.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman will also allow to be read some extracts I have from letters written by Governor Holden, of North Carolina.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the Clerk to read the extract I send up to his desk. The Clerk read as follows:

“GENERAL N. B. FORREST.

“General Forrest is the hero of the Tennessee delegation and divides attention in the convention with Wade Hampton. As a cavalry officer he had no equal in the war, and even now as he moves up and down the hall his tall, handsome figure looms up, and his fine face lit: the same old soldier spirit is strong within the man, and he evidently mistakes the secretary's voice for a bugle-call, and his nature will not let him keep still or steadfast in one place. The general, although in the costume of a civilian, has about him the look of one who wants to be accipied and doing something. His manner is free and pleasing, with a characteristic bonhomie which is quite taking with all whom he is introduced to. He does not say much at present, and cannot sit quietly because of his nature, but will be heard of, no doubt, before the convention closes.”

Mr. MULLINS. That is the hero of the bloody massacre at Fort Pillow.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have now said enough to show that the Democratic party were in sympathy with the men who inaugurated this rebellion; that they were in sympathy with the men who carried it on; that they are now in sympathy with the men who propose to inaugurate another rebellion, of whom the leader is Frank Blair.

I say this to the people of the country: when you look at the bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations and find $30,000,000 for pensions to the widows and orphans of the dead, and to the wounded and maimed of the living, know that it is the Democratic party which has imposed this responsibility of justice and benevolence upon you. When the tax-gatherer comes and demands five per cent. of the income of each man in this country, that is the tribute which you pay for the supremacy of the Democracy up to the year 1861. When you are called upon to appropriate $180,000,000 a year to meet the interest upon the public debt, that is the penalty the people of this country pay for having so long confided their interests to the Democratic party. When the figures are presented to your consideration, representing the present amount of the national debt, $2,500,000,000, then remember that that is a burden upon you and your posterity for the folly of four generations in intrusting the public interests to the care of the Democratic party.

The cemeteries of the dead, South and North, filled with the humble testimonials there raised to the memory of the men who fell in defense of the Union, are sacred and affecting evidence of the penalty, O people of America! which you have paid for intrusting the destinies of this country to a party that acknowledged fealty to nothing but the right of States to tyrannize over an oppressed people and to enslave four millions of human beings. Those four millions of people, by the grace of God and against the protest of the Democratic party, have been emancipated and made citizens of the Republic.

And now, in this last struggle, we are moving to the consummation of the great work we have in hand, which is that those whom we have redeemed from slavery shall be endowed with all the rights of men,—rights guarded by the power of forty million of people, who have learned the lessons of truth and of freedom in defiance of the teachings of the Democratic party of this country.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have agreed to yield to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I have already yielded to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield a minute to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and I will keep him to his minute.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, that is very liberal to gentlemen on this side of the House. I can now only say that this is one of probably a hundred or a thousand times that I have been compelled to sit here and listen to the most gross and unfounded libels upon the Democratic party, and under the power of the majority we have had no opportunity to reply.

I wish to say now to the House and to the country that there is a forum where we will be able to be heard on equal terms. The great mass of the people of the country will be at the polls in November next, and there we will brand these libels as they deserve; there we will meet our accusers and rebut their unfounded calumnies. We have no opportunity of doing so here, under the outrages practiced by the majority in depriving the minority of their just rights in debate. Thus the most outrageous libels and falsehoods may be promulgated from day to day, we being deprived of the opportunity to meet and refute them. I appeal to the people of the country to observe the manner in which the minority are treated here from day to day; and I remind gentlemen on the other side that there is a forum where we shall be heard—a forum before which we will fasten upon the party that has held possession of the Government for the last eight years the atrocities of which they have been guilty; and they will receive at the hands of an indignant people the verdict which they deserve.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, we accept that appeal to the people and to the polls. We shall be there to meet these threats made in 1862, repeated in 1864, rehearsed again in 1866, and now revived in 1868—to meet them with the same result, the putting down by the power of the people of men who have assailed every interest of the country and sought to betray the loyal men of the nation into the hands of the country's enemies.

Mr. MARSHALL. If gentlemen on the other side were capable of magnanimity they would allow us to meet those questions here.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have already yielded to the gentleman a part of my time, and I propose now to go on without interruption.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that this little preliminary discussion, to be followed hereafter by those others to which the gentleman refers us, has taken place. I am glad that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] interrupted my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] with his interrogatory, which elicited some allusion to the issues now just made up again in new form before the people of this country. What was that interruption? The gentleman from Wisconsin was opposed to the bill now under consideration because he claimed that there are no States which are in any sense whatever out of their normal relations to the rest of the Union. He made the objection because he claims that every one of those States is now entitled to representation upon this floor and in the Senate and to votes in the Electoral College for President and Vice President. Why, sir, this is only in accord with what we have heard and witnessed all along. These gentlemen, short of memory, have forgotten that there has been a war, and would have us, following them, shut our eyes to that historical fact and to the consequences of that war.

But let us take the gentleman upon his own ground. Let us assume that these States are now entitled to vote for President and Vice President; and that the governments of these States are now to be recognized. What governments of those States? Gentlemen on the other side have failed to tell us. Are we to recognize those governments which existed prior to 1861? Andrew Johnson, in his celebrated North Carolina proclamation and other papers of like character, declared (and gentlemen on the other side have indorsed the declaration) that all civil government within the limits of those States had been destroyed. Surely, then, the gentleman from Wisconsin cannot mean that we should recognize the State governments which existed prior to 1861. Are we, then, to recognize the civil governments set up by Andrew Johnson, assuming to be himself the United States, and therefore authorized to carry out the guarantee of the Constitution toward States found without civil governments? Gentlemen do not pretend that now. We know they do not mean to advocate the recognition of the loyal governments which have grown up under the legislation of Congress; for against those governments they are all the time arraying themselves. Then what governments are they that are to send their Representatives to Congress, their Senators to the other end of this Capitol, their electors to vote for President and Vice President? Frank Blair has told us, and it will not do for gentlemen now to attempt to throw off that exposition of their creed, that declaration of their position, which has been so clearly defined for them before the country by their candidate for the Vice Presidency.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] and others are uneasy. They tell us that the letter of Frank Blair is not their platform. What is their platform? Why, sir, on Monday, the 6th day of this month, the Democratic party in their convention at New York agreed upon a series of propositions, many of them mere axioms in politics against which nobody will protest; others generalities and commonplaces about which no question is likely ever to be made; others a wrapping-up of meaning in ambiguous phrase with the intention of catching people of the widest dissimilarity of opinion, so that your Chase men and your Pendleton men might meet upon the same ground. And that they say is their platform. That was on the 6th of July. Three days afterward, on the 9th of July, when, throwing aside all others, they had taken Horatio Seymour as their candidate for the Presidency, and the question came who should be their second on the ticket, Frank Blair marched into that hall, not in person, but through the representatives of himself and his position, with a platform in his hand, which he presents to these men, in which he not only lays down distinct positive views, which they by acclamation adopted with him, but which he presents to them accompanied with the declaration that all else they have been declaring about is of no consequence whatever, and this which he presents is the only issue. Now, see whether I overstate it. That is his platform thus presented. They say it would be rather a sudden change between the 6th of July and the 9th of July to have altered their whole position. Is there any change impracticable to these men? Do they not fight for Seymour and Blair just as they would have fought for Chase or Hendricks or for Hancock, had they been nominated? If any man thinks he can find a plank too short to afford room to allow the Democratic party to turn a somersault on in two days or one day, or in two hours or one hour, he knows less of the history of that party than I do.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman to let me put a question to him.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot yield. They cannot plead shortness of time, especially they cannot plead it in the face of the recorded facts; and I repeat, therefore, although they adopted that platform under which they seek now to take refuge on the 6th, by the decision of the 9th they virtually threw it aside when they nominated this candidate whom they accepted by acclamation, who said there was one great issue, and on that they meant to go to the country.

I will have some of this literature repeated in order to refresh the memory of gentlemen on the other side, although it has been read in full at the Clerk's desk. First, as to that platform. Here it is in a few lines:

"There is but one way to restore the Government and the Constitution, and that is for the President-elect to declare these acts null and void."

Not submit them to the court. Oh, no! the Democratic President-elect is to declare them by his first proclamation null and void.

"Compel the Army to undo its usurpations at the South, disperse the carpet-bag State governments, allow the white people to organize their own governments, and elect Senators and Representatives."

One way is for the President to sweep aside all acts of the legislative power, and to substitute creatures in the shape of State governments of his own making instead of those established by law.

"The House of Representatives will contain a majority of Democrats from the North."

May be so!

"And they will admit the Representatives elected by the white people of the South, and with the cooperation of the President it will not be difficult to compel the Senate to submit."

That is your platform moved as an amendment to the resolutions of July 6, and you shall hear of it everywhere whether you will or no. You will have to stand on it and abide by it.

Let me go on with it:

"I repeat that this is the real and only question which we should allow to control us: Shall we submit to the usurpations by which the Government has been overthrown, or shall we exert ourselves for its full and complete restoration? It is idle to talk of bonds, greenbacks, gold, the public faith, and the public credit."

Away with your generalities, commonplaces, platitudes, and delusions in the pretended platform which you adopted two days ago. That is not the issue. There is but one real, true issue; all those are of the slightest possible consequence which two days ago you thought worthy to be made the declaration of your faith.

"I wish to stand before the convention upon this issue, but it is one which embraces everything else that is of value in its large and comprehensive results. It is the one thing that includes all that is worth a contest, and without it there is nothing that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle."

Mr. MARSHALL. I raise the question of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question before the House. [Laughter.] Unless he gives a chance on this side I shall object to his proceeding. I have no objection at all if he will permit us to have one fourth the time he occupies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SCOFIELD in the chair.) The gentleman will confine himself to the subject of debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is precisely what I am doing. It is claimed that there are or are to be certain Democratic State governments established at the South by these means, which, being about to be established, will obviate all necessity for passing this bill. We disagree to that; and I comment upon the character of those governments and the issue sought to be made before the people by which those governments are to be thus made the law for these southern States. I say, therefore, that is one distinct issue, the issue which General Blair concludes his letter by claiming to be the only one "that gives dignity, honor, or value to the struggle." It is to be found in the secondary platform overriding the first accepted by these gentlemen, and it now presents the one ground upon which they go to the people. Why, sir, how was General Blair taken? How were any of the candidates taken? Is there anything in the selection of either of them which would indicate that the gentlemen would not have taken this as their position in regard to these southern States?

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is wandering somewhat from the subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the Chair be kind enough to tell me wherein?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the Democratic candidates and their platform have nothing to do with this question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I regret to differ from the Chair, and from the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. NIBLACK. The Democratic platform does not go into effect till after the 4th of March next, whereas this is intended to go into operation before that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Under the advice of the Chair I shall have to desist from the course of remark I was entering upon, but it did seem to me that when it was claimed that upon certain principles and positions taken by these men whom they selected to lead them, indicated, embodied, and personified in this way, a bill like this was unnecessary. I might be allowed to say it was necessary, for the very reason that they had selected such exponents of their opinions. I am a little at a loss to know to what I may properly direct my argument under the ruling of the Chair, which certainly was unexpected after the course which this debate had been permitted to take.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the gentleman be permitted to proceed.

Mr. SCHENCK. But I shall certainly take some opportunity hereafter, if it presents itself, to submit my views, not in a straight-jacket, upon this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the debate had been allowed to run on without objection from any quarter; but when objection was made and insisted upon, the Chair felt bound to rule as he did.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the other side will give us something like half a show I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw the objection?

Mr. MARSHALL. Only on the condition stated.

Mr. SCHENCK. It comes with a bad grace from the gentleman who told me he only wanted a minute, and I gave him more. I inquire if it would be in order to supply some omissions in the account he gave of the personnel of that convention which made this platform which opposes itself to the bills we have under consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that all of this debate is not relevant to the joint resolution before the House, and if objection is made it cannot proceed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have no objection to this debate being pursued at some subsequent time, if gentlemen wish to go on with it; but if they mean to continue it now, I propose to make a report from a committee of conference on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, because it is important to have the report adopted, so that the enrolling clerks may get the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Objection being made by gentlemen on the other side of the House to a further continuance of the debate, and the gentleman from Illinois desiring to proceed to other business, I surrender the floor and ask for the question.

The first question was on the amendments reported by the Committee on Reconstruction; which are as follows:

In lines four and five strike out the words "and which States are not now represented in Congress."

In line fifteen strike out the word "and" and insert "nor."

Add to the resolution the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to apply to any State which was re-constructed in Congress on the 4th of March, 1867.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendments.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order, the main question having been ordered.

The main question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 110, nays 28, not voting 65; as follows:

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 21, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Brownell, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Stevens, Taylor, John Trimble, Van Aukun, Van Wyck, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—65.

So the joint resolution was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. POLAND stated that his colleague [Mr. Woodbridge] was out of town on important business; if present he would have voted for the resolution.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1284, to change and more effectually secure the collection of internal revenue on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to amend the tax on banks, have been referred by the House to the Committee of Ways and Means. There were one hundred and eighty-three amendments made by the Senate to that bill, generally verbal, but there are some of them which are of substance, very few of them. Since obtaining the printed bill this morning containing those amendments we have been diligently at work, but have considered only some fifty-two or fifty-three of the amendments. If we continue upon them we will probably be able to report them back to the House on Tuesday morning next with our recommendations in regard to them. I have, however, been instructed by the committee to ask permission to report those amendments back to the House, and ask that they all be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be requested upon them. In that way we suppose there may be had a saving of three or four days of time in the final disposition of the bill. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to that course being taken at this time.

No objection was made.

The report was accordingly received.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and request a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. PRICE, on account of the illness of his wife.

Indefinite leave of absence was also granted to Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, after to-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would inquire of the Chair how many members were present when the last vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. Only thirty-three more than a quorum.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I give notice that I shall hereafter object to the granting any leave of absence except for good reason stated.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 373) to place the name of Mahala M. Straight upon the pension-roll of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 456) granting a pension to the children of Pleasant Stoops;

An act (H. R. No. 1099) for the relief of Wait Talcott; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 292) directing the Secretary of War to sell damaged or unserviceable arms, ordnance, and ordnance stores.

INDIAN EXPENSES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with an estimate of the appropriations necessary to carry out treaty stipulations with the Seneca and other Indians, lately ratified by the Senate; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting certain petitions forwarded by the several military commanders, for the removal of political disabilities; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 605, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, submitted the following report:

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there will be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill on the day it is reported.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that the Secretary of War, in behalf of the United States and in accordance with the previous practice of the War Department, on the 13th of November, 1860, executed to Samuel Denman, William H. Russell, and Thomas Ewing, jr., and their assigns, a lease of twenty acres of land in the military reserve at Fort Leavenworth, State of Kansas, for the term of sixteen years thereafter, with a preference to them of an extension of the term and with the exclusive right to them to mine for coal under the lands of the military reserve; that the lessees and their assigns accepted the lease, and upon the faith thereof have prosecuted their mining operations under many difficulties at great expense and have finally succeeded in striking the deep coal beds of that geological region after having expended their entire capital to the amount of $40,000; that it is now discovered that the lease is invalid because the Secretary of War was unauthorized in law to make the same, by reason of which the lessees are deprived of their right to proceed and are threatened with the total loss of their money and are without redress; that in view of the incalculable benefit to be derived, not alone by the State of Kansas, but by the whole country adjacent thereto by the development of the coal strata of the region, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas on the 18th day of February, 1868, concurred in a joint resolution reciting the above and respectfully requesting Congress to act in the premises; and the House of Representatives of the United States have heretofore passed an act directing the sale, in small tracts, of a body of land in the military reserve. The bill therefore provides that the Leavenworth Coal Company, being the successors and assigns of Samuel Denman, William H. Russell, and Thomas Ewing, jr., in the lease, shall have the right to purchase from the United States twenty acres of land lying in the military reserve at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, and described as follows: beginning at the intersection of the south line of the military reserve and the Missouri river, running northwardly thence along the west line of the Missouri river, thence westwardly in a line parallel to the south line of the military reserve, thence southwardly in a line at right angles with the south line of the military reserve, thence eastwardly in the south line of the military reserve to the point of beginning, the lines to be run so as to make the form of the twenty acres as nearly square as practicable. The Leavenworth Coal Company are to pay therefor the sum fixed by the United States district judges of the State of Kansas, the eastern district of Missouri, and of the northern district of Illinois, whose reasonable expenses are to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the lease is extended sixteen years from the passage of this act. Upon the payment of the purchase money, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to issue to the Leavenworth Coal Company and its successors and assigns, a patent for the above described lands, which patent shall also grant to the company and its successors and assigns the exclusive right to mine for coal underlying the lands now comprised in the military reserve.

Mr. HARLAN. I did not hear the amount that they are to pay for this land.

Mr. HOWARD. No particular amount is mentioned. The property is to be appraised by three district judges.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How soon after the appraisal are they to pay?

Mr. HOWARD. They are to pay when they purchase, I suppose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill in regard to the construction of a bridge at St. Louis. It has been reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and it is important that it should pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 681) amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads" was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble declares that the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, and the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, organized under an act of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, have been consolidated, in pursuance of the authority granted to the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, in their act of incorporation, and the authority granted to the St. Louis and Illinois Bridge Company, by an act of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, approved March 19, 1861. The bill proceeds to provide that the company formed by this consolidation, under the name and style of the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, is hereby recognized and declared to be a corporation by that name, with full power and authority to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river opposite the city of St. Louis, in conformity to the act of which this is amendatory, with all the rights, privileges, and powers granted and conferred by the several acts of the General Assemblies of the States of Illinois and Missouri to the respective companies by the consolidation of which the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company was formed, and not inconsistent with the provisions of the act to which this is amendatory. In constructing the bridge there shall be one span of at least five hundred feet clear between piers. The corporation may execute a mortgage and issue bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold; and their bridge across the Mississippi river and approaches thereto, when constructed, is to be a post road to carry the mails of the United States, and enjoy the rights and privileges of other post roads. The corporation may hold their meetings in either the State of Illinois or the State of Missouri, as the board of directors may elect, and the directors may be citizens of any of the United States; and the corporation may sue and be sued in any circuit court of the United States. Nothing in the act or in any previous legislation affecting the premises is to be so construed as to deprive the Legislatures of the States of Illinois and Missouri of the right to regulate the tolls and fares which may be charged by the company for the use of the bridge; but the tolls now fixed by the Legislatures of Illinois and Missouri shall not be increased.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know from what committee the bill now before us has proceeded, but I observe, from the reading of the bill, that it assumes to recognize two State corporations as constituting but one, for the purpose of erecting this bridge across the Mississippi river; and the bill goes further: it assumes to limit and regulate the powers and faculties of that corporation by providing that the bridge shall be built in a particular manner, and with a certain span. I wish to inquire of the honorable Senator from Missouri whether the State corporation, or corporations, having this bridge in charge will be bound to follow out the provisions of the bill which we now have under consideration. If those provisions alter the charter of the company granted by the State, may it not turn out that these companies will refuse to comply with the provisions of the act, to build the bridge in the manner prescribed by it; and if they should so refuse, I inquire of the honorable Senator from Missouri what remedy the United States will have? Have Congress a right to alter and amend charters granted by the States? That is the question to which I desire an answer.

Mr. HARLAN. I believe there can be no doubt but that Congress could prohibit the construction of any bridge across the Mississippi river under existing laws. This bill provides that the bridge may be built as provided for by the laws of Illinois and Missouri, with the condition that one of the spans shall be five hundred feet in length, and the company agree to put in a span of that length. There is no conflict, therefore, between the company as now organized and the Government either of the United States or of Missouri or Illinois.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose they should fail to comply with that provision?

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose if they decline to build the bridge no damage will be done except to those who expect to use it; certainly no detriment to the Government of the United States only so far as they would be deprived of the use of the bridge for a post road.

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill under consideration provides simply for a change, as I understand it, in the construction of this bridge from the requirement of the act of July 26, 1866, which the Senator from Michigan will remember required bridges to be built in a certain style. This bill requires a wider span, a span of five hundred feet. Some say that the bridge cannot be built with that span. The engineers at St. Louis say that it can be built. The State charters did not require any particular width of span, and, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, there is no conflict between this bill and the State charters. The State charters authorize the construction of a bridge in such a manner as not to obstruct navigation at the city of St. Louis. The Senator from Michigan will remember that in 1866 there was a general law passed upon the subject of bridging the Mississippi river. I resisted the passage of that bill, but I was overpowered; the Senate passed it, and it has become a law.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator will recollect that there was a special bill passed authorizing the bridging of the Mississippi river at St. Louis, or a special provision in that general bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very well aware of that.

Mr. RAMSEY. This is amendatory of that.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that two companies were organized to construct a bridge in pursuance of that law, one under the authority of Missouri and another under a charter granted by the Legislature of Illinois. These two companies were for a time in conflict; that is, they were contending each for the right to construct the bridge; but ultimately they have consolidated under the law of the State of Missouri authorizing them to do so. A certified copy of that act was before the committee, and also a certified copy of the articles of consolidation, so that it appeared to the committee that there was a perfect agreement now that these two companies would consolidate and construct the bridge after the pattern mentioned in this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand the Senator from Missouri to say that there is not laid down in the charter any particular mode or manner in which this bridge shall be built, except that it shall not be so built as to obstruct navigation. Now, suppose the State corporation should refuse to make the bridge according to the requirement of this act, what would be the result? Is there any remedy which the United States could resort to? They are authorized to construct a bridge across the river so as not to obstruct navigation. I am not sure by any means that the States have not the right to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river, and I am by no means sure that it is in the power of Congress to say that they shall not do it. It is on this point that I wish a little light from the Senator from Missouri. If the State corporation refuses to do what we prescribe, is there any remedy for the United States?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that the United States could compel the construction of a bridge at St. Louis. That is not the purpose of this bill; it is merely to declare the mode of constructing by State corporations, a consolidation of which has now taken place, a bridge which shall be a post road. I believe it has been customary to pass such bills here in Congress.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand that very well; but there is a corporation authorized to construct a bridge in its own way across the Mississippi river, and we undertake to dictate to that corporation as to the manner in which the bridge shall be constructed. Suppose the corporation refuses to construct it in that manner, and contends for making it in a different style?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not understand that this bill dictates to the corporation in what manner they shall construct the bridge. It does require them to construct it of a certain span, and the company desire to construct the bridge in that way. Senators may rest assured there will be no difficulty, so far as the company is concerned, about their building the bridge. They intend to proceed and construct it, and their plans have been adopted in strict accordance with the principles laid down in this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Suppose they should wish to depart from them?

Mr. HENDERSON. Then it might, perhaps, defeat the construction of the bridge; that is all; but the bridge, I apprehend, will be built, as the bridge company itself is willing to build under this restriction; that is, with span of five hundred feet, a greater span than has been required of any bridge over any navigable waters of the United States at the present time. Surely the Senator from Michigan should not object. The company are willing to take upon themselves this restriction and build a bridge wide enough in the span to admit the largest steamers and the largest rafts that float upon the Mississippi river, and high enough to allow even the largest New Orleans steamers to go beneath it. Of course the Senator ought not to object. I understand the consolidated company is now anxious and desirous to proceed to the construction of the bridge, subject to these restrictions.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Missouri entirely misunderstands me if he supposes that I am objecting to the bill. I merely put an inquiry to the Senator involving a question of law as to the rights of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is a very nice question of law, and really I am not prepared to discuss it this morning. I have not examined the question as to the authority of a State Legislature to authorize the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream of the United States. I refer the Senator, however, to various decisions on that subject, the Wheeling cases and other very interesting cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, where he can find perhaps much more law than I should be able to give him in the short compass of an hour this morning. I hope he will withdraw his objection and let the bill pass.

Mr. MORTON. I had supposed that there was no doubt that the Government of the United States had a right to prevent the building of a bridge over any navigable water, which would obstruct navigation, and I had supposed there was no doubt about the power of the Government to pull down any bridge that had been built under State authority which did obstruct navigation.

Mr. POMEROY. I am very anxious that this bill should pass, because it is an experiment in bridge building. This is to be a bridge without a draw, with a span of five hundred feet, and eighty or ninety feet above low water. There is no such bridge built anywhere in the United States. An engineer states that he can build this bridge and I want it tried. It is so high as to be out of the reach of human sympathy; but if he builds it so that it can stand I shall be gratified. I confess I have my doubts about the whole project, but these companies are willing to try it, and I want to see it done if possible.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise only to say a word or two about this bill. To me it is one of the strangest bills that has been presented to Congress since I have been in it. It proposes to take two corporations, organized under the laws of different States, for the purpose of building a bridge across the Mississippi river; and by this act to recognize and declare them to be a corporation by a given name. In other words, it organizes two corporations, chartered under separate States, into one corporation under an act of Congress. The language is specific. I beg to read it:

That the company formed by this consolidation, under the name and style of the Illinois and St. Louis Bridge Company, is hereby recognized, and declared to be a corporation by that name, with full power and authority to construct a bridge across the Mississippi river, &c.

Then it imposes a limit upon the extent of the span of the bridge, that is to reach, as the Senator from Kansas says, out of the range of human sympathy, and the second section continues the purpose of the first, and says:

That the said corporation may execute a mortgage and issue bonds payable, principal and interest, in gold, and their bridge across the Mississippi river, and approaches thereto, when constructed, shall be a post road.

Now, sir, if we can pass an act of this kind, I do not know any reason why this should not be passed. I certainly have no objection to the limit upon the span, and am as anxious as any one that the experiment shall be tried; but by act of Congress consolidating two corporations organized in several States under the laws of those States into one, and giving them authority to proceed to do certain acts within each of those States, is at least a novel proposition.

Mr. HENDERSON. The difficulty about this matter is this: the Illinois Legislature organized a company under a charter to build a bridge at the city of St. Louis, and the Legislature of the State of Missouri passed a similar act, but organized into a corporation different individuals. A conflict of right and of jurisdiction over the river occurred between these two companies, each claiming the sole and exclusive right to construct a bridge at St. Louis, and claiming the right by virtue of the respective charters of the different States. They enjoined each other from proceeding, each company claiming, as the Senator from Michigan now claims, that the Legislature of a State interested has a perfect right to proceed to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of the United States. The Senator will observe that these two companies are now organized into one. They have so organized themselves, so far as they possibly can, by articles of agreement into one company, thereby doing away with the difficulty that occurred from this claim of right of each State.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to the bill except to call attention to its peculiarity. I should not object to a bill, and I should think it entirely right, giving the consent of the United States to the consolidated corporation doing certain things, namely, building a bridge.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is all the bill does.

Mr. CONNESS. No; the bill goes further. It organizes these companies into a corporation under a national statute, and authorizes them to issue bonds, declaring the manner in which they shall be made payable, and that, I submit, is going further than we have ever gone.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from California is evidently in error in that respect. Congress has recognized a railroad company under the laws of California, and authorizes that railroad company to do certain things, among others to issue bonds, the principal payable in thirty years, and the interest payable in gold at a certain rate; and the same law authorized certain companies incorporated in Kansas and certain companies in California to consolidate and proceed to do certain work as consolidated companies, or as one company consolidated under that provision.

Mr. HENDERSON. All that will be found in the Pacific railroad charter.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. DRAKE. I move that the Senate take up for consideration House bill No. 941.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps.

The bill provides that from and after its passage the Marine corps shall consist of the number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and musicians authorized by the act for the increase of the Marine corps of the United States, approved March 2, 1847, and the acts previous thereto, and of fifteen hundred privates; but the commissions of officers now in the Marine corps are not to be vacated by this act, and no appointment is to be made in any of the grades of the said corps until the number in the corps is reduced below the number herein provided for each of the grades.

No appointment of engineers is to be made in either of the grades of the corps until the number is reduced below that provided in the first section of the act to regulate the appointment and pay of engineers in the Navy of the United States, approved August 31, 1842, and the number so authorized is to be based upon the number of steamships now in commission, and the grade of third assistant engineer is abolished.

The third section proposes to repeal the second section of an act entitled "An act to increase the pay of midshipmen and others," approved March 3, 1865, and the ninth section of an act entitled "An act to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy," approved March 2, 1867; but the repeal of the section is not to be construed to increase the pay now allowed by law to officers promoted in accordance with its provisions.

The fourth section repeals all acts and parts of acts authorizing the appointing of temporary acting officers in the Navy.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment was to strike out the first section of the bill after the enacting clause in the following words:

That from and after the passage of this act the Marine corps shall consist of the number of officers, non-commissioned officers and musicians authorized by the act for the increase of the Marine corps of the United States, approved March 2, 1847, and the acts previous thereto, and of fifteen hundred privates; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed: Provided, That the commissions of officers now in the Marine corps shall not be vacated by this act, but no appointment shall be made in any of the grades of said corps until the number in said corps is reduced below the number herein provided for each of said grades.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it would be well to have the Senator from Missouri explain this bill and state how much it increases the pay of any officers of the Marine corps or of the Navy.

Mr. DRAKE. That explanation would come up in proper connection with an amendment proposed by the committee. If, however, the honorable Senator from Vermont desires to have that explanation made before we come to that amendment, I will make it now. There are several amendments of small character that can be acted upon at once. I will explain the point referred to when we come to the amendment which involves it.

The next amendment was in section two, to strike out the enacting clause; in line three to insert the words "first three" before the word "grades;" in line four to strike out the word "provided" and to insert "authorized;" in line eight, after the word "steamships," to insert "of war;" in lines nine and ten to strike out the words, "and the grade of third assistant engineer is hereby abolished," and to insert, "and no appointment of third assistant engineer shall hereafter be made;" so as to make the section read:

That no appointment of engineers shall be made in either of the first three grades of said corps until the number is reduced below that authorized in the first section of the act to regulate the appointment and pay of engineers in the Navy of the United States, approved August 31, 1842, and the number so authorized shall be based upon the number of steamships of war now in commission. And no appointment of third assistant engineer shall hereafter be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, now made section two, lines four, five, and six, to strike out the words, "and the ninth section of an act entitled 'An act to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy,' approved March 2, 1867, are," and to insert the word "is;" and in line nine, after the word "repealed," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, The repeal of said section shall not be construed to increase the pay now allowed by law to officers promoted in accordance with its provisions.

So that the section will read:

That the second section of act entitled "An act to increase the pay of midshipmen and others," approved March 3, 1865, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of Saturday, being the funding bill, is now before the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. As this is a bill of very great public importance, reducing the expenses of the Navy more than half a million dollars a year, and conforming its official personnel to the reduction of the number of seamen in the Navy which Congress has already made at this session, I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio in charge of the funding bill to allow us to go through with the amendments which the committee have reported, which will probably take but a few minutes, and let the bill be sent back to the House for concurrence. I would not ask this for any private measure, or any measure of individual interest; but this is a bill of great public importance, and it is very desirable to get it through, and I think it will take but a little while to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business can be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I happen to know that that bill will probably excite some comment and create some delay. It is a bill of much greater importance than I supposed when the Senator spoke to me about it a little while ago. I desire to get through with the funding bill to-day if possible, so as to get it out of the road. Senators all around me are impatient. They say it stands in the way of other business; and I hope, therefore, we shall proceed with the regular order. I have no doubt I shall vote for the Senator's bill when it comes up again.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. With the leave of both Senators I desire to submit a motion to transfer the special order appointed for to-day to another day, which will be removing one of the obstacles. I move to make the special order for to-day at one o'clock, the bill for the protection of American citizens abroad, the order of the day for Thursday next at one o'clock, by agreement with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, giving notice that we shall expect it to be considered on that day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of Saturday, the funding bill, is now before the Senate.

Mr. DRAKE. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that if this bill of mine should lead to debate, I would, of course, give way at once; but if it should not lead to debate, we could get through with it in a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can say to the Senator that I am requested by other Senators to state that the bill will lead to discussion. They wish time to look into it. It is a very important bill, which is called up now for the first time. No doubt the Senator having called it up now and called the attention of the Senate to it will get the advantage of that when he calls it up again.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 676) granting a pension to Thomas Connolly;

A bill (H. R. No. 938) to authorize the sale of twenty acres of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 201) declaratory of the law in regard to officers cashiered or dismissed from the Army by the sentence of a general court-martial;

A bill (H. R. No. 1119) for the registration or enrollment of certain foreign vessels;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 201) in relation to Rock Island bridge;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 281) authorizing the issue of clothing to company F, eighteenth regiment United States infantry; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1099) for the relief of Wait Talcott.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 335) for the protection of settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands, in Kansas, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) continuing the refining of bullion in the Mint of the United States and branches, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, the pending amendment being on the amendment reported by Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the amendment in line nine by striking out "five" and inserting "four and a half;" in line ten, after the word "four," by striking out the words "and a half;" and in line eleven by striking out "four" and inserting "three and a half," so that the clause will read:

The issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at three and a half per cent., which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation, &c.

I should like to have the yeas and nays on this proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall feel disposed to vote for this amendment if the bill is to stand as it does now, issuing bonds at twenty, thirty, and forty years; but I have an amendment to propose which I think ought to be made to the bill, and if that amendment be adopted I shall not vote for this amendment because I think it would be limiting the interest too much. I propose to amend the bill, when I have an opportunity, in the first section, line five, by inserting after the word "after," the words "ten years and payable after," so that it will read, "redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after ten years, and payable after twenty, thirty, and forty years respectively." If that amendment should be adopted, I should be willing to vote for the rates of interest as they stand now in the bill, and think that that would be as well as we could do.

I am opposed to taking off the limit of ten years. As our financial system stands at the present time it is a perfectly fixed and stable system. We have, in reality, only two kinds of funds, the five-twenties, so called, redeemable after five years, and payable in twenty years, and the ten-forties, redeemable after ten years and payable in forty years. I think ten years is the furthest point to which we ought to go and put out of our hands the power to redeem. The system as it stands now was predicated upon the idea of controllability; that our funds bearing the interest they did, might, in a reasonable time, be within our control; that if a better state of things occurred, as we believed a better state of things would occur, and the country became stable and prosperous again, it would be perfectly easy for us then to reduce the rate of interest, and reduce it materially, and place our funds on a very different footing from that on which they now stand. That is a power, and an important power, which those who had charge of the finances thought should always be retained as far as possible. I presume that there is no one of the committee but what would agree with me upon the important principle; and yet the first section of this bill abandons that idea and carries the lowest point forward for ten years more, so that the bonds we may put out now are not to be redeemable within twenty years, or only after that time has expired. I think that that is inexpedient and unnecessary.

I know the answer that may be given. It is that we shall not be likely to negotiate the bonds with such a provision. I think, in the first place, we should be quite as likely, because the people would reason, "If I should get my money at that time, very well; but if not, I go on precisely as if this limit had not been placed upon the bill originally." In my judgment, we had very much better pay the six per cent. interest, as we are paying it, for a few years longer, than put the control of the finances, of the funds, so called, out of our hands for the period of twenty years. Remember that when we have once transposed these bonds in this way, they are no longer within our control for the long periods that we fix. If this country becomes as prosperous as I believe it will within ten years from this period, if it arrives at that point of prosperity, which we may well foresee for it, with our troubles settled, and everything going on as it did, I believe that within ten years from this time the credit of this country will be rivaled by the credit of no country on the face of the earth, and that it will be perfectly easy for us to borrow money, if we are disposed to borrow it to take up the debt that falls due, the accruing debt, upon terms most favorable to ourselves, and at the lowest rate of interest. Believing that for the sake of putting out a bill at the present time for any purpose, either to affect the mind of the public at this particular crisis, or for the still better purpose of reducing the interest, I have not been able to persuade myself that what we should gain for a short period in interest by the reduction of one per cent. would, by any means, pay us for putting the control of these large sums of money out of our hands for so long a period as twenty years.

Now, sir, this is an opinion which I state for what it is worth. It is my settled conviction, and I know it to be the settled conviction of men wiser than myself. For that purpose I propose to offer the amendment I have suggested to the Senate, and see what the Senate think of it, and upon the vote on that will depend my vote upon my friend's amendment to reduce the interest. If my amendment prevails, I shall let the interest stand as it does now; if not, I shall vote for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I shall not argue this financial subject. I did not suppose, a short time since, that anything would be done upon these bills at the present session; but it seems to be the desire of the chairman of the Finance Committee at least to put before the creditors of the United States a proposition for funding their debt, and for the reduction of the rate of interest. At an early part of the session, on the 21st of January last, I introduced a bill, the second section of which provided for the funding of the public debt—

"Principal and interest to be paid in coin, and bearing interest at a rate not exceeding three and a half per cent., payable semi-annually, the same to be paid in fifty years from their date, but redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after ten years from the date of issue, which said bonds the Secretary may dispose of at not less than their par value," &c.

The Committee on Finance reported a bill for funding the debt—I do not remember the time—at five per cent. I desire simply to state, without taking up any of the time of the Senate during such hot weather as this in the discussion of a proposition of this character, that a large portion of the people of the United States believe that about two thousand million dollars of our public debt is payable in lawful money; in other words, in greenbacks. A large number of them also believe that the Government may properly issue any quantity of United States notes for the payment of the public debt; while another large portion of the people believe that we have a perfect right to pay the five-twenties in lawful money of the United States, but that it would be bad faith to exceed in the issue of lawful money $400,000,000; but that with an outstanding circulation of $400,000,000 we may proceed from year to year to pay off the greenbacks in five-twenties. In this contrariety of opinion a proposition is now presented to fund the public debt, including the five-twenties, in a new set of bonds or a new fund, payable at the pleasure of the United States after twenty, thirty, and forty years, but to change the character of the payment; in other words, that if we have the right now to pay the five-twenties in lawful money of the United States, which is worth, say seventy cents to the dollar, we will make an agreement upon this occasion to pay it, not in lawful money, but in coin; to make a new contract with our creditors, and, as the Senator from Maine says, extend the time from two years, in fact, two, three, and five years, payable now at the pleasure of the United States, up to twenty years, and debar ourselves of the privilege of making payment to the creditors in that time, and agree to pay upon that twenty years' security five per cent. in coin.

I for one am totally unwilling to make any such contract. I believe with the Senator from Maine that it is possible at least—I do not say that it is probable, but it is possible—that with lessened expenditures of the Government, with economy on our part, and with an intention to pay off the public debt at an early day, with prosperity in the country, good crops, and a revival of industry, we may possibly be able to borrow money within twenty years for far less than five per cent. Suppose such should be the case, we shall by this bill have tied up our hands in such a way that it will be utterly impossible for us to do it. We have changed this contract, which we may now liquidate in lawful money of the United States, into a gold bond, binding ourselves to pay the principal in gold. We shall then be obligated for twenty years to pay five per cent., when in all probability we may be able to borrow money at three and a half or four per cent. Even if we could borrow it at four per cent. it would be a very large saving. Then we further obligate ourselves upon the thirty-year bonds to pay four and a half per cent., and upon the forty-year bonds to pay four per cent. I think that that interest ought to be reduced. I do not know that I desire especially a funding of the public debt under a proposition such as is contained in this amendment. It is too much interest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is already funded.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is true it is already funded; and although we are paying six per cent. upon it, yet we certainly do have the advantage, in my judgment, of the right to pay it off in lawful money. I do not desire now to go into the discussion of that question. I discussed it at an early part of the session, whether to the satisfaction of any member of the Senate or not it is now unnecessary to inquire. I do not desire to renew the discussion. But this is a proposition made to the creditors. It is not obligatory upon the creditors to take it. It is not mandatory upon them. We do not pretend to force them to take this course. We do not do as some Governments have done, and, in fact, as the English Government has done on several occasions. Although we hear the credit of England boasted of in our country so much, they have actually put their creditors in a position upon several occasions to compel them to take a fund with a smaller rate of interest.

I do not advocate any such legislation on our part. I do not think it is necessary. I did not advocate it before and I do not now. I do not desire to make it obligatory on our creditors to reduce their interest or to confiscate any part of their indebtedness. I think it is bad legislation, but if we are to repudiate any part of our debt we shall do it after it becomes perfectly manifest that we cannot pay the interest, and not until then. I know that some have called those who believe that the five-twenties can be paid in lawful money, repudiators. I for one say that I have no feeling of that kind, although I believe that the contract is such that they can be lawfully so paid, and believing it, of course, I never could consent to such rates of interest as are prescribed in this bill, especially as the Senator from Maine says, if the time of payment is to be so long prolonged. Now, inasmuch as this is a mere proposition to the creditors, and they can take it or not take it, I do not think we have much to gain by it. For myself, I would rather the creditors should refuse to fund than to fund under the proposition of this bill. I must say that the securities this bill will give them will be infinitely better to the creditors than the present securities. In other words, this is a bad contract on the part of the Government; it is a contract we, as guardians of the public interest, ought not to be willing to make, and I for one, being unwilling to make it, move this amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CATTELL. Of the two propositions, the one presented by the Senator from Missouri and the one presented by the Senator from Maine, I very greatly prefer that presented by the Senator from Maine. There is a manifest propriety in holding the control of this large indebtedness, if we can possibly do it at this rate of interest, and succeed in funding the debt, or, as the Senator from Maine says, in refunding it. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri proceeds on the opinion which he expresses here that we may lawfully pay the five-twenty bonds in lawful money. To that proposition of the Senator from Missouri I respectfully enter my dissent. I believe, in the language of the platform of the great party which the majority in this Chamber represent, that we are bound to maintain the public faith and honor, and to meet our obligations not only in the letter but in the spirit of the laws under which they were contracted; and so long as I occupy a seat in this body I cannot consent, under any conceivable circumstances, to give my sanction to the payment of the public debt in anything else than that in which the Government of the United States has always paid its bonded debt, in coin, the legal tender of the country and of the world. I therefore must vote against the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, because I believe the rate of interest which he proposes is so low as to entirely defeat the operation of this bill. I believe all the members of the Finance Committee, with the exception of the Senator from Missouri, are under the impression that the terms proposed in the bill under consideration are the shortest in point of years and the lowest in point of interest under which the public debt may be refunded.

It is perfectly proper that those who entertain the views of the Senator from Maine, who prefer that the debt should remain in its present position at the interest of six per cent. rather than be refunded under this bill fixing the time so long as twenty years, without any option of the Government, should be opposed to the bill; but whoever is in favor of refunding the public debt at five per cent. interest, with a bond of positive conditions, payable in twenty years, should vote in favor of this bill, in my judgment. If you attach to it any other conditions or any other rate of interest I fear that you defeat the working of the bill. It is with this view that I shall vote against the proposition of the Senator from Missouri; and I hope it will not prevail.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalow, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Patterson of Tennessee, and Vickers—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Cracin, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Raunsey, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, Williams and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Chandler, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Frothinghuyzen, Grimes, Harlan, Howe, McGreevy, McDonald, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Willey, and Yates—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in the fifth line of the first section after the word "after," the words "ten years and payable after;" so as to read "redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years, and payable after twenty, thirty, and forty years respectively."

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to submit to the Senate a few considerations that bear directly on this proposition, and trust, on account of the importance of the subject, that Senators will give them such weight as they merit.

The proposition to issue a bond redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after ten years was the original proposition made by me in January last. It is one which I submitted, and which, for the reasons stated already by the Senator from Maine, met my judgment at the time. But there was great difference of opinion in regard to terms and conditions of the various bonds proposed to be issued. That difference existed in the Committee on Finance, and after the fullest consideration I was willing to waive my opinion and vote for a twenty-year five per cent. bond in connection with a proposition to issue a thirty-year bond at four and one half per cent., and a forty-year bond at four per cent. I will state the reason which induced me to change my position on this question. In order to make this funding a success one of two things must be done. One is for you to declare that the bonds of the United States now redeemable may be paid in the lawful money of the United States, and if that is done we can undoubtedly receive enough money for a five per cent. ten-year bond to pay off the principal of the five-twenty bonds. But the Senate were indisposed to adopt any such view. No doubt a large majority of the Senate is against any such proposition. Therefore there is no inducement for the holder of a five-twenty bond bearing six per cent. interest in gold to take a five per cent. bond unless you give to him a longer time for it to run. Let us reason on this point precisely as we would if we were the holders of five-twenty six per cent. bonds. The holder of such a bond will say "the United States offers me a five per cent. twenty-year bond; what reason is there why I should give up a six per cent. for a five per cent. bond? One answer is that by this new bond the time within which it may be redeemed is extended. The present bond is redeemable on the payment of its face in gold according to the claim of a majority of the Senate. Why, then, surrender my six per cent. bond and take a five per cent.? The answer is that an extension of time is had, the redemption of the bond is postponed. The five-twenty bond becomes payable in 1882, and this new bond is not redeemable until 1888. There is an extension of time, which gives additional value always to a bond.

Another argument in favor of these new bonds, and which will induce many people to fund in them, will be this: the old bonds are taxable by the United States to a certain extent; we now levy an income tax on them, and the House of Representatives, by a decided vote, directed a bill to be reported levying an income tax of ten per cent. on all bonds issued by the United States. Although this proposition never will meet the sanction of the Senate, in my judgment, yet it tends to impair the market value of the five-twenty bonds, and the holders of those bonds, in order to get a bond which is definite on its face, clear in its terms, which limits the power of the United States to tax it to the same income tax that is levied on all other incomes, will take this new security, and it will have an additional value on that account.

These two incidents of the new bond, together with the clear stipulation that the principal and interest shall be paid in gold, give to the new bond a value which, in my judgment, will induce the great body of the holders of the five-twenties to convert them into the new bond without any other stipulation or any threat or any other measure.

If the amendment of the Senator from Maine prevails, and you reduce the running of these bonds to ten years, the new bonds will fall due before the old ones. The old bonds would fall due in 1882, and the new one would fall due in 1878 so that the new bond would fall due sooner than the old one. That is a conclusive argument against it.

When I found that Congress was not willing to take my legal opinion as to the right of the Government of the United States to pay the five-twenties in lawful money I as a matter of course was compelled by these reasons to waive my opinion and favor a longer bond in order to make an additional inducement for the funding of the debt. The Senator from Maine seems to think that the United States may very soon negotiate a bond at less than five per cent. I do not believe that time will arrive in this country for thirty or forty years. My own impression is that the rate of interest cannot be kept below that in this country. Although we are growing rapidly we are yet a vast new country, with undeveloped enterprises demanding capital, and a great deal of it. I do not believe that in this country the rate of interest will fall below five per cent. for a generation or two generations of men, because the demand for capital is so great and the accumulation is so little. I think five per cent. will be the lowest rate of interest that can be had for many years to come; and if we desire to make this funding scheme a success it is idle for us to issue a bond running for a shorter time than twenty years, and bearing a less rate of interest than five per cent.

My friend from New Jersey said that he desired to make the best terms possible for the United States. The Committee on Finance, with possibly a single exception, agreed that a less rate than five per cent. and a shorter time than twenty years would not do, and I will say, as my friend from Maine knows also, that that is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is true his opinion would not prevail against our deliberate judgment; but we can only make this negotiation through him. He is limited by this bill so that he cannot sell a single bond unless he can redeem an equal amount of five-twenties. He must, therefore, sell them according to the market rate, now 118 or 114. A five per cent. ten-year bond cannot be sold at that rate unless you give it additional value. You limit him by the terms of this bill to selling the new bonds at a rate which will take up an equal amount of five-twenties. He cannot sell them at par in lawful money, he can only sell them in such a way as to take up an equal amount of five-twenties. He cannot do that, because he cannot get anybody to give that price for a five per cent. ten-year bond, and surrender a six per cent. bond which has fifteen years yet to run.

In regard to all these details, let me say to Senators who have not examined this subject, and probably will not give to it the consideration we have done, that in my judgment, unless they are clearly convinced by reasons given, it is better to take the terms of the bill as reported here by the committee after careful and mature consideration rather than make changes, unless the changes are defended and maintained by reasons that approve themselves to their consciences. If I thought it possible, I should be very glad to negotiate a shorter bond, but in my judgment you cannot negotiate on the basis of this bill in exchange for an equal amount of five-twenties a bond more favorable to the Government than a twenty-year five per cent. bond.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On looking further at this provision I find it is new; it does not impose upon the Government the obligation of paying the principal of these bonds at any time. It takes what I believe is the English system, the idea of a permanent debt. It says "redeemable after twenty, thirty, and forty years respectively." Redeemable when? At no specific time; but it simply says: "If you take this bond we will not redeem it before twenty years, or thirty years, or forty years shall have expired, as the case may be, and after that we will redeem it when we can." The bonds which were first issued during the war were redeemable after five years, and payable in twenty years, as I recollect; that is, we became absolutely bound to pay them at the end of twenty years. It is a question to be considered whether in our country, where money is changing hands so rapidly, a bond which imposes no obligation to pay at any specific time would be favorably received. I propose to modify my amendment by substituting for the last word, "after," the word "in," so as to read "redeemable after ten years, and payable in twenty, thirty, and forty years respectively."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have all the loan laws before me, and I will state to the Senator from Maine that, with two or three exceptions, their provisions have been in this form, redeemable after a certain time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And payable when?

Mr. SHERMAN. Payable at the pleasure of the United States after a certain time. Even in regard to the bonds redeemed in July last we were not bound to pay them unless we chose. I have here the act of 1790, the original funding act of Hamilton which made the same provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My idea is that we should follow out the system which was inaugurated at the beginning of the rebellion. It might have done in old times when our debt was very small and we were borrowing small sums to leave the time of payment indefinite; but my judgment is that if you want bonds to be taken you should fix a definite period when they become payable, and that it will not do to issue a bond which is simply redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, because that is the amount of this bill as it stands. I think the people prefer to take a bond which has some definite period of payment fixed. I still adhere to what the Senator has said to be my original opinion. He says truly that this bill confers additional advantages upon the takers of these bonds. One which is a very important one is that it settles the doubt as to the medium in which they are payable, whether in coin or in currency. If the holders exchange the present bonds for those issued under this act they get rid of that difficulty. Then there is a limitation upon the power of taxation by the General Government which does not apply to the other bonds. Thus making these two things definite and taking the bonds out of the domain of legislation or of temporary excitement or temporary purposes, you give to them a character of stability which at present our public obligations very much need. I think with these changes it becomes an object with the holders of the bonds to exchange them, and that they would probably—because it is all mere probability—take the bonds which they hold now, redeemable but not exactly payable, floating in the market, subject to all the contingencies, and exchange them for ten-year bonds on these terms.

But, sir, I recur to my original proposition. I believe it would be better for the United States to let their bonds already funded and not yet payable for many years stand as they are at present. I believe the five-twenty bonds, although redeemable, do not become payable for thirteen or fourteen years to come, so that we have an ample margin. Our obligations are not pressing upon us. It would be better, in my judgment, to let them remain as they are funded for the present, rather than make an effort at this time, when the credit of the United States, owing to certain circumstances, accidents, and considerations to which I need not advert, does not stand as it ought to stand, and defer that effort to refund them until a few years longer. I would prefer to pay the additional per cent. for a few years rather than put ourselves in a position where we could not lay our hands on any of these bonds, whatever might be our condition and circumstances, and whatever might be the state of the money market, and however high our credit might be, until the expiration of such a long period of time.

That is the answer I make. I do not agree with the honorable Senator that the change would necessarily affect their negotiability, because in the constantly fluctuating state of things in this country, particularly with regard to the demands for money, people would just as willingly, in my judgment, have a bond liable to be redeemed in ten years as in twenty provided that the bond itself had what they considered ample security for its redemption in the credit of the obligor, but whether they would or not I think we had better let things stand as they are for any purpose whatever except for the mere temporary purpose of making an impression on the public mind, which in my judgment amounts to just nothing at all. Nothing will be affected by it at the present period by changing our bonds from one condition to another. The effect will be to put off the period when we shall have power to take them into our own hands by payment. I am strongly impressed with the belief that I am right about this matter; but whether I am or not will be for the Senate to judge.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have looked over the loan laws, and I find that all the loans of the United States up to 1862 were in the form contained in this bill as to redeemability. The loan of 1881 now running is not payable in 1881, but payable at the pleasure of the United States after 1881.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am aware of that. Up to that period the bonds were always so issued, making no difference between redeemability and payability; they were all redeemable and payable at the same moment, and it would amount to the same thing. But when we found that we were to be so largely in debt, having a war upon us the end of which we could not foresee, the system was adopted of fixing a short time within which the bonds might be redeemable if the Government was able to redeem them and another time when the Government would be obliged to pay. That is the system which we then adopted, and which we have carried through. In my judgment it was one of the wise ideas of the then Secretary of the Treasury who had recourse to it, and I have always believed that we ought not to depart from it, and that we should not issue long bonds which were entirely out of our power for the whole time they have to run.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will permit me in that connection I will say that is the actual form in which the form was actually issued. The bond reads "redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 30th of April, 1867, and payable the 1st day of May, 1882." That is the express form of the contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. The United States never stipulated to pay money at a specific day until it was done under the severe pressure of the war, and we never ought to do it again. Suppose a great amount of bonds, $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, should fall due when the five-twenties would be due, the 1st of May, 1882, the United States are compelled on that day to pay this vast sum of money, because they have no power as before to pay it at their pleasure after a specific day, but they must pay on that day. That is a very severe and onerous burden on the Government of the United States, and the stipulation that was put in the five-twenty bonds was an advantage to the creditor which at that time the United States was compelled to insert, that they would pay the money at a certain time whether it was able to pay or not. Now, however, the United States is at peace, and I think we ought to go back to the old system, make our bonds, like the bonds of other Governments, payable at the pleasure of the Government after a specified time. The specified time is for the benefit of the holder of the bond, within which his investment may not be interfered with. The time after that is for the benefit of the Government, which may not find it convenient to pay at the stipulated time. Therefore the language used in this section is introduced following the uniform language of all loan laws with the exception of those in regard to the five-twenties and ten-forties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the very question I am trying to test in the Senate. If we go back to the old system we necessarily take from the Government the power, whatever may be the state of things, to take these bonds out of the market and stop the interest on them. I know that was the old system, but I wish to adhere to the system we adopted since the war began.

But, Mr. President, what I wish to impress on the Senate is the importance to this country, in my judgment the great importance, of retaining control over its bonds in regard to the time of paying them. We have it now. The five-twenties are becoming redeemable. It is in our power to pay them; but, as I remarked before, we are not compelled to pay them. I wish to retain that principle. The moment you depart from it, whatever may be the state of our credit, however flush we may be in funds, we cannot take up our obligations, because the very fact that they are not payable until after a certain time in the future swells the value of your paper, and you cannot take it up unless you go into the market and buy it at the mercy of the holders; whereas if you fix a short time and adhere to the system of controllability which has been adopted, the result is that in a short period the Government can take up its bonds, and, of course, a large premium will exist upon them. Then when the time arrives, if we have the money we pay it; but we know that if our credit is good it will be very easy to substitute a similar bond. There is no question about that. The interest is what the creditor looks to, and the right to pay off within a reasonable time is what the debtor wants. I do not know that it is worth while for me to say anything more about it. It is for the Senate to say. I do not like to abandon the system which we have adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine is more advantageous to the Government than the bill. That was the case with the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and that is the real trouble about them. They are too advantageous to the Government, for neither of them can be availed of. I should gladly have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, because I would much prefer that the Government should pay four and a half, four, and three and a half per cent. per annum, than to pay five, four and a half, and four. So by this amendment there is a great advantage reserved to the Government in having control of all its debt in ten years, so that it can at the end of ten years pay it; but it is impossible to make the loans if that advantage is retained, in my judgment.

I suppose, sir, that if there is anything well settled among financial men and in the country generally, it is that we are not disposed to pay off a public debt of $2,000,000,000 rapidly. The Secretary of the Treasury commenced it rapidly, but Congress has stopped him, and the general judgment of the country is that the payment of the debt should be spread over a long period and should be very slow until the country, especially the South, has more ability to pay than it now has. If that is the case, what are you to do?

Gentlemen object to this rate of interest; but you now pay six per cent. in gold; and if I am correct in saying that there will be no great attempt to pay the debt, then it will at that rate take fourteen years, and we shall have to pay six per cent. for fourteen years and pay it in gold. I prefer to make the time twenty years and the interest five per cent.

Certainly, Mr. President, there are a great many very intelligent men all over the country who believe that if Congress will give the option this debt can be exchanged for a lower rate of interest. Will Congress hesitate to give the option? We do not propose to compel anybody to make the exchange. We do not propose to say to the holders of our bonds that if they do not take these new bonds they shall be paid in greenbacks. We do not propose to repudiate. We propose to pay our debts honestly, in the spirit in which they were contracted.

It seems to me to be proper that Congress should not leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the length of time for which these bonds should run, ten, twenty, thirty, or forty years. I would rather have, and it is more proper to have, the judgment of Congress on that subject. I am therefore in favor of the first section of this bill. I believe we ought to pass it. I believe we ought to make the time specific. If I thought we could get the money on ten-year bonds, I should certainly vote for the amendment of the Senator from Maine; but my judgment is very much against it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I have been heartily in favor of the practice of the Government in keeping control of its loans, which has been eulogized by the Senator from Maine; but I ask whether it can be expected that we are to continue this controllability and yet obtain our money at a lower rate of interest. Whenever we succeed in obtaining a loan at a reduced rate of interest it is to be expected that we shall relinquish this control. It was only in order to obtain at some future time better terms that we made provision for this control; and if we continue the control in relation to the time when we are to pay these loans of course we must still pay a higher rate of interest for that control.

The Senator from Maine suggests that the parties who are to take this loan would very readily accept shorter bonds. I fear they would, at the rates fixed by this bill, and might make it so short that they would hardly take it at all. It is only in consequence of making a long loan that any inducement is held out to parties to take these new bonds. Now, the question fairly arises whether in this country a large loan can be obtained for a less rate than is proposed in this bill. After having given some attention to the subject I do not believe it is possible. Look abroad, where money is at the rate for private purposes ordinarily of not more than two and a half to four per cent. per annum, and yet the average rates paid by Governments are nearly five per cent. on national loans. In our own country there is scarcely any State in the Union where six per cent. is not paid by private parties. In some States, eight, ten, or even more. Is it to be supposed that in this country, when very large sums, sums in the aggregate of thousands of millions of dollars, can be obtained at less rates than four, four and a half, and five per cent.? I do not believe it. By this bill only $700,000,000 can be obtained at the rate of five per cent., and of course, if more bonds are negotiated, it must be either at four or four and a half per cent. In my judgment, that is as low as we can, in the most prosperous times, ever expect for many years to come, in a new country like ours of such vast extent, with so many opportunities for new enterprises, to borrow money. We cannot hope that the rate of interest will fall below that. There will be full employment of all the capital of the country at better rates. Only on the ground that we give better security than can be had elsewhere is there any chance of the success of this loan.

I am in favor of this measure because I believe it is wise, so far as the first section is concerned; I believe it is practical. I believe that if we pass it we can induce those who now hold our bonds to exchange them for the new bonds at a lower rate of interest; and at all events, if the parties who now hold bonds do not accept our terms there will be found others who will. If we are successful we shall certainly reduce the amount of interest that we are to pay, which is far better, in my judgment, than to raise taxes. I hope, therefore, that no amendment will be made to this part of the bill.

Mr. CATTELL. I said when I was last on the floor that I very much preferred the amendment of the Senator from Maine to that of the Senator from Missouri. I confess that the argument of the Senator from Maine in favor of the Government holding control of its loans makes a decided impression on my mind; and I should be very glad to vote for the amendment if I believed that funding would progress under this bill with that amendment in it; but believing, as I do, that it would arrest the progress of funding under the bill, I shall be compelled to vote against it.

But, sir, I rose mainly for the purpose of making a statement in regard to the condition of our loans as bearing on this question. We now have some two hundred and twenty millions of five per cent. bonds which the Government will have the option of redeeming at the end of ten years from their date. We are now within seven or eight years of the time when the Government will have the right to exercise that option. It occurs to me that these $220,000,000 will be quite as much as we shall be likely to pay off by the expiration of ten years. In addition to that the bonds of 1881, of which we have issued $291,000,000, are really due and payable in thirteen years from this time, which comes so close upon the heels of the time fixed as the option by the amendment of the Senator from Maine that it seems to me it is not advisable to adopt it. We have something like five hundred millions of our debt falling within our power within from eight to thirteen years; so that there will be a sufficient amount of our obligations for us to take up in that time under any conceivable circumstances. For this reason I do not consider the amendment of the Senator from Maine so important as it would be if these circumstances did not exist. We shall have over five hundred millions to take up, as I say, nearly three hundred millions of which we must pay in thirteen years, and we have an option upon $220,000,000 more within eight years; so that we shall have control of one fourth of the whole amount of our public debt, by the terms of the bonds already out, within a short period of time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. May not the 1881 bonds be funded under this bill?

Mr. CATTELL. I apprehend that there is no probability that the holders of such bonds having thirteen years to run, without any question as to the payment of the principal in coin—for that question has not been mooted at all in regard to the 1881 bonds—will exchange them for five per cent. That is the point of difficulty I have in regard to this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But I suggest to my friend that every law on such a subject as this is prima facie intended to be a permanent law. Suppose this law to be enacted and stand upon the statute-book when you come within a year or two of the time when the 1881 bonds are positively payable, would it be a strange thing if the holders should desire to convert them into these bonds? If so, they would be taken out of my friend's calculation.

Mr. CATTELL. Yes, sir; and my answer to my friend from Maine is, that the Congress of the United States I apprehend would be ready to say that no such bargain could be made under this law.

But, Mr. President, I only rose for the purpose of saying that really I concur in the argument which the Senator from Maine adduces in favor of the Government holding the controllability of its loans, but that I believe, in the language of the Senator from New York, in private conversation a moment ago, that this bill requires all the cork that is in it to float it; and I am under the impression that if you change its terms you will embarrass the process of funding.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, in order to make this funding proposal successful there must be some inducement for men to take the new bonds and give up the old ones. The Senator from Maine holds that the present five-twenties are payable in gold. The new bonds are to be payable in gold, and no more. What inducement can there be under his proposition to give up a six per cent. bond payable in gold in fifteen years and take a five per cent. bond payable in ten years? If you have to present some inducement, to give some advantage to the new bond over the old bonds, what is it except the length of time you give the new bond to run?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken; the six per cent. bonds are redeemable to-day.

Mr. MORTON. Redeemable in gold only according to the Senator's theory. If he would adopt the idea that the present bonds are payable in legal-tender notes; I could understand his proposition. But he now proposes to exchange for the present five-twenties, payable in gold as he holds, new bonds drawing less interest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not depend upon what I hold or upon what the Senator from Indiana holds. It depends upon the impression of the community with regard to the value and nature of the paper. I may hold that these bonds are payable in gold. The Senator from Indiana may hold directly the other way. A large portion of the community does so hold. The Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has intimated his opinion to that effect. Now, the idea is that there is this doubt hanging over them, not that it is positive one way or the other.

Again, the five-twenties bonds, whether payable in gold or payable in greenbacks, are redeemable to-day if the Government had the means of redeeming them. The time has arrived; the five years are out. Then there is this difference: that they take a bond that the Government has no power to redeem to-day and can only redeem in ten years at the shortest period, but at the same time free from all the doubts which now hang over the existing five-twenties. That is the idea.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the way that I think doubts ought to be solved where they respect one of the parties to a contract is for the party to declare frankly and honestly where he stands upon that doubtful question; and if there is any real doubt or any supposed doubt as to what our obligation is, now that we are making new terms with our creditors, we ought to tell those creditors man-fashion what we mean; we ought to tell them either that we acknowledge what they understood to be the fair construction and the real spirit of our obligation when they lent us the money, and therefore say we mean to pay in coin or its equivalent; or that they were mistaken about it if they had any such idea and that we mean to pay them in a new promise to pay, what we call a greenback, which does not bear any interest, which is overdue on the face of it, and which we decline to pay until we get ready. We ought to be frank. I cannot endure the idea of a great Government like the United States, that claims to be the home of liberty and of all sorts of people who have escaped oppression and dishonesty everywhere else; the place where the American eagle is the greatest bird that floats, playing fast and loose with its creditors when it is trying to make a new loan, shaking a doubt at them instead of telling them plainly one thing or the other on that point. I do not think it is greatly to the credit of the United States that we should occupy such a position a great while. I am happy to say that, as I understand it, the party to which I belong has already got out of that position.

But, sir, I rose for the purpose of saying a few words in reply to the honorable Senator from Ohio on the question of how the five-twenties bonds are payable. I am not going to weary the Senate by going over the whole argument or much of the history, but in five or ten minutes to come to the precise point on which he contended that the five-twenties of 1862, as they are ordinarily called, are not payable in coin, but are payable in currency, and to say that I think I can show—as I was about to say, to convince my friend—that he is laboring under an error. I understand him by his printed speech delivered on the 27th of February, 1868, to admit that down to the passage of the act of March 3, 1863, the true construction of the act of February 25, 1862, which was called the five-twenty act, was that the bonds issued under that were fairly and truly payable in coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. My friend will allow me to state my position. I said that the question would never have been raised under the act of February 25, 1862. That law specifically declared that the United States notes should be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private; but it also said that the amount to be issued under that act should not exceed $150,000,000. I put the question to him for his answer, if no law had ever been passed changing the act of February 25, 1862, as to the limitation of the amount of greenbacks, has he any doubt that under that act these $150,000,000 of greenbacks would have been a legal tender for the principal of the debt issued under that act? I have not any.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When the Senator entered upon this discussion on the 27th February last, I endeavored by a colloquial debate to come to a precise understanding with him upon this very point; but after one or two interruptions, my friend from Ohio declined to be interrupted further, and went on with his speech, in which he said, referring to the position that I had taken in some previous observations:

"I anticipate the argument and wish again to refer to the act of February 25, 1862. This act further provides that the amount of legal tenders shall be limited to $150,000,000. It also provides that the holders of these legal tenders may at any time convert them into five-twenty bonds, the very bonds we are now discussing; and the second section goes on and provides for the issue of those bonds. If those bonds had been issued and negotiated solely under the act of February 25, 1862, it would have been irresistible logic that it was not contemplated that the $500,000,000 authorized by this act should be paid with $150,000,000 legal tenders, themselves convertible into bonds. But here is the weakness of the argument, in my opinion, of my friend from Vermont; no bonds were issued under that act."

Now, Mr. President, so far I am capable of understanding the force of language, the plain meaning of what the honorable Senator said—I believe I have read enough to show that that was his point under that act—that was that under the act of February 25, 1862, standing by itself and until subsequent legislation had altered it, the logic was irresistible that these bonds were not payable in the very notes that by the terms of the act itself were to be converted into the bonds. If therefore they were not payable in these notes, but were payable in dollars, as on the face of them they said they were, I take it the argument becomes irresistible that by force of that act the legislation as it then stood they were payable in coin. Now, how does my friend escape that? He escapes from it by the assertion of a matter of fact that no bonds were issued under that act. Now, let us see how that fact is. Being somewhat surprised at that statement of my honorable friend, because having been one of the people when these bonds were negotiated, and seen them issued from day to day, and having had something to do with inducing the people in my part of the country to take them, I always noticed that when the bonds came to the bank or express office, and were taken out and circulated, they said on the face of them that they were issued under the act of February 25, 1862, and the people believed it, and I believed it. Believing so I was somewhat astonished at the statement of my friend and I addressed an inquiry to the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, as to when these respective bonds were issued, and I received this reply:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 16, 1868.

Sir: I have the honor to inclose herewith, in compliance with your request, the information desired in regard to the amount of subscriptions at the periods designated to the loan of February 25, 1862.

Also, canceled copy of $500 coupon bond of first series of said issue. The bonds of subsequent issues were precisely similar to the one inclosed except in the number of coupons attached.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. McCULLOCH,

Secretary.

Hon. G. F. EDMUNDS, United States Senate.

Subscriptions to the loan of February 25, 1862.

Previous to March 3, 1863.....$26,275,150
Between March 3, 1863, and June 30, 1864, 484,505,350
Between June 30, 1864, and April 12, 1866. 4,000,000

Total.....$514,780,500

Mr. SHERMAN. How much after the 11th of July, 1862?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not able to state at this moment. Here is the form of a bond, the thing itself that the people saw and paid for and took, issued prior to the 3d of March, 1863, and during that period of time when, according to the construction that, as I understand the Senator himself in his speech of the 27th of February last, gave to the act of February 25, 1862, it was payable in coin.

The United States of America are indebted unto —, or bearer, in the sum of $500, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 30th of April, 1867, and payable on the 1st day of May, 1882, with interest from the 1st day of May, 1862, inclusive, at six per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st days of May and November, in each year, on presentation of the proper coupon hereunto annexed.

This debt is authorized by the act of Congress approved February 25, 1862.

L. E. CHITTENDEN,
Register of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1862.

With the seal of the Treasury I hold in my hand another of these bonds of 1862 issued after March 3, 1863, which, according to the argument of my friend from Ohio is payable in currency, and not in coin, as the first one is according to his own confession, as I understand his speech:

The United States of America are indebted unto —, or bearer, in the sum of $500, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 30th of April, 1867, and payable on the 1st day of May, 1882, with interest from the 1st day of May, 1862, inclusive, at six per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st days of May and November, in each year, on the presentation of the proper coupon hereunto annexed.

This debt is authorized by the act of Congress approved February 25, 1862.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1862.

And signed and sealed as before it would be a little difficult for the common people, the widows, the farmers, the mechanics, even the bankers, or the lawyers who are supposed to understand statutes in the course of business, to understand when these papers were being put out in this form, that one of them was issued under the act of 1862, and was payable in coin, and that the other was issued in some other way, and was not so payable, when both of them bore on their face precisely the same terms, payable in precisely the same way, and were, as I will now show, issued solely under the act of 1862 and no other act.

My friend still maintains that the act of March 3, 1863, operated to repeal the act of 1862, authorizing the issue of these bonds, and provided a new authority for issue, a new regulation for the mode of issue. If that were true, and these bonds were really issued under the act of the 3d of March, 1863, as the act that authorized their issue, then the bonds should have said so on their face, and the people having them would have been referred to the law, and would have been bound to take the law at their own risk as to what the form and legal effect of the promise was. But what did the act of 1863 say touching these bonds? That act was to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain ten-forty bonds, as they are called, and certain Treasury notes, and the last part of the third section provided as follows:

"And so much of the act to authorize the issue of United States notes and for other purposes," approved February 25, 1862, and of the act to authorize an additional issue of United States notes and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1862, as restricts the negotiation of bonds to market value is hereby repealed. And the holders of the United States notes issued under and by virtue of said acts, shall present the same for the purpose of exchanging the same for bonds, as therein provided, on or before the 1st day of July, 1863, and thereafter the right so to exchange the same shall cease and determine."

All that the act of 1863 professed to do, giving it the broadest scope, was, as to the issue of these bonds, as to the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to put them forth to the country to anybody that would take them, simply to repeal the limitation which had been before imposed on him that he should sell them at market value. The previous act had imposed on him a certain restriction as to the price he was to get for the paper. The act of 1863 repealed that restriction, and left the act of 1862 in every other respect in force, furnishing the sole and only authority that ever existed to that time, or ever has existed since, for the issue of a single dollar of these bonds. Therefore the honorable Senator from Ohio is mistaken in supposing that these bonds were not issued under the act of 1862. If they were not issued under the act of 1862 they were issued in violation of law, because the act of 1863 does not profess to authorize them to be issued at all; it professes to authorize the issue of another and different class and character of bonds, called ten-forty bonds, and refers to the act of 1862, as I have said, not to affect the authority to issue or the nature of the contract, or the character or redeemability of the bonds, but merely speaking to its own agent it informed him that he need not hold them up to a certain price as he had done before; and that is all it contains.

My friend says with an air of plausibility that in the mean time, on the 11th of July, 1862, an act was passed which authorized the increase of the legal tenders adding another $150,000,000 and that therefore the public must have been supposed to know that what was before the real and true construction of the act of February 25, 1862, had been changed by that. How did it change it? It did not profess to change it; it only said that so many legal tenders shall be issued, and being issued the act of February 25, 1862, operated upon them, also, as making them convertible into the same kind of bonds that had been authorized to be issued before; and how if it did were the public to know that? They were referred when these bonds were issued, to the act of February 25, 1862. The regulations and the law require that each bond shall show under what authority it is issued. The people were referred on looking at the bond to the act on which the bond was based, the act of February 25, 1862, and no other act. Looking, then, from the bond which directed them where to find the authority of law to show the true nature and authority of the contract, it was the act of February 25, 1862. The act declared the form in which these bonds should be issued and when they should be payable, and it declared that all the gold and silver received from customs should be set aside as a sacred fund to pay them and that the legal tenders that the law had provided for should be convertible into them instead of their being payable in legal tenders.

Looking to that act, my friend from Ohio, as I understand him from this speech—it is not capable of any other construction—looking to that act, I understand from this speech which is in print before me that the holders of these bonds would have been justified by an irresistible logic in supposing that they were to receive their pay in money. That is all I have to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only want to make one or two remarks in reply to the Senator from Vermont, because as the question he has debated is not involved in this bill I think it ought not to be discussed now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Pardon me, my friend opened the discussion himself on this bill by reiterating his opinions on these points.

Mr. SHERMAN. I still reiterate those opinions; and all I have to say in reply to the honorable Senator is that not a single bond was issued under the act of the 25th of February, 1862, until that act was changed in material and important provisions. I know that fact, and now call upon the Senator to answer me whether a single bond was issued under the act of February 25, 1862, until after the passage of the act of July 11, 1862, whether he knows of any?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether it was so or not, because on looking at the Senator's speech, and endeavoring to get the information which would apply to his speech, I understood him to refer to the act of March 3, 1863, as an act which repealed some part of the act of February 25, 1862; but it seems, on looking at it, that the act of 1863, as well as the act of the 11th of July, 1862, merely provided for an increase of legal tenders, making them convertible into bonds as before.

Mr. SHERMAN. I repeat, and no one who has gone through the history can contradict me, that no single bond was issued under the act of February 25, 1862, until after that act was changed in material respects. It is true all these bonds, in one sense, were issued under the act of February 25, 1862, as it was amended from time to time; and those amendments were adopted before a single bond was issued. The most material amendment was the act of July 11, 1862. By the act of February 25, 1862, $150,000,000 was the limit of legal tenders, and those legal tenders could be used to pay the principal of the public debt.

The Senator from Vermont cannot question that. Any bond issued under the act of February 25, 1862, could be used as a legal tender to pay the principal of the public debt, because the act of February 25, 1862, said in so many words that the notes issued under this act shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private. What language could be clearer? Therefore if the legal tenders were issued under the act of February 25, 1862, and the bonds issued under that act, one was convertible into the other, the bonds into the greenbacks and greenbacks into bonds. No language could be plainer than was used to effect that purpose; but this right of conversion was taken away by the act of March 3, 1863, and the limit on the amount of greenbacks was changed. This did not affect the legal obligation or the legal right to use greenbacks in payment of the principal of the bonds; but I will not argue the question; I will let it stand upon what I have said.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the question as to whether the five-twenties are payable only in coin or may be paid in legal-tender notes has been brought prominently into this debate. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has had much to do with the financial affairs of this country for six or seven years past, insists that the Government has a right to pay the five-twenties in existing legal-tender notes. I say "existing" as contradistinguished from notes yet to be issued. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] on Saturday, in a very elaborate speech argued at length that the Government was compelled by law to pay these bonds in coin. An argument of great ability and length was made to the same effect by the Senator from Vermont early in the session. This question is not important beyond the time that the Government shall resume specie payments. Whenever we make the legal-tender note as good as gold then this question is settled. But it is an important question, and may be an important and troublesome question until that time occurs. I, for one, believe that the true policy for the Government is to take steps first and foremost to bring about the resumption of specie payments. I believe that that lies at the foundation of our financial troubles, and there is where we should begin.

I will remark that this question is entirely distinct from the question of the right of the Government to make a new issue of legal tender notes and pay off the five-twenties in that new issue. As I shall speak of the question, I shall speak of the right of the Government to redeem the five-twenties in existing legal-tender notes.

Mr. President, I believe that the law—and it is to the law that we must look in regard to this question after all—is with the Senator from Ohio on this question. When it is asserted that the Government is bound to redeem the five-twenties in coin I say it is not only without the law, but it is in express violation of at least four statutes. The law authorizing the ten-forties declares that principal and interest shall be paid in coin. The several laws creating the five-twenties declare that the interest shall be paid in coin, but are silent as to the principal of the debt, and do not say in what kind of money the principal shall be paid. This silence is very significant.

But it is said by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Vermont that the Government is as much bound to pay the principal of the five-twenties in coin as if it was so expressed in the several acts authorizing and creating those bonds, and that there is no difference between the legal obligation of the Government in regard to the five-twenties and in regard to the ten-forties. Let me say to the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Massachusetts that if they desire to ascertain the qualities and capacities of the legal-tender notes, what debts they will pay, and what debts they will not pay, they must look to the laws creating the legal-tender notes and not to the statutes authorizing the five-twenties bonds.

The act of February 25, 1862, by its second section authorized the first issue of five-twenties bonds, and by its first section the first issue of legal-tender notes; and in said first section declares such notes herein authorized shall be received in payment of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due the United States, except duties on imports, and all claims and demands against the United States of any kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin, and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

The declaration is that such notes shall be receivable in payment "of all claims and demands against the United States of every kind whatsoever, except for interest upon bonds and notes, which shall be paid in coin." More comprehensive language could not be employed, and you cannot conceive of any debt against the United States left out of this phrase save that which is specially excepted. It comprehends all claims and demands of whatsoever kind. A bond is a claim; a bond is a demand. The very exception proves that bonds were comprehended in the phrase, for if they were not there was no necessity for excepting the interest upon them. But the statute does not stop here. It goes on to say tautologically that such notes "shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid." Every debt which the United States owes is a public debt; it has no private debts, and a five-twenties bond is a public debt in the fullest sense of those words for which the law declares such notes shall be lawful money and a legal tender. Was ever a statute more comprehensive, unequivocal, or plainly written? If the effect of this language can be varied or destroyed by argument then no statute can be drawn which can withstand the lawyers' ingenuity. But there are three other statutes to the same effect with the one I have just considered.

The act of the 11th of July following provided for the issue of another $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes, and declared like the former that they should be legal tender in payment of all claims and demands of whatsoever kind against the United States except interest on notes and bonds, and further declared that these notes—

"Shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, in the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid."

There are but two exceptions stated in the law, but it is sought by argument to establish a third, compared with which the two stated in the law are mere trifles.

This statute is unconnected with any provision for the issue of bonds, and was passed before any bonds were sold, authorized by the preceding act of February.

Again, in January, 1863, Congress passed a joint resolution authorizing the issue of another $100,000,000 of legal-tender notes, in which it was again declared that they should be received as "a legal tender in payment of all claims and demands against the United States of whatsoever kind, except interest on notes and bonds," and this joint resolution was unconnected with any provision for the issue of bonds.

And again in February, 1863, an act was passed authorizing the issue of another $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes, including the $100,000,000 authorized by the joint resolution just referred to, in which it is declared in language somewhat different from the other acts, but in substance the same, that "these notes so issued shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

Here are four plain, unequivocal, and emphatic declarations of the law, declaring that these notes shall be a legal tender in payment of every conceivable species of indebtedness against the United States. And whether the fact be agreeable or disagreeable it is one that cannot be overcome by argument or ingenuity.

But it is argued that Secretary Chase, and perhaps one or two Assistant Secretaries or chief clerks of the Treasury, gave it out in letters and speeches that these bonds would be paid in coin and that the bonds were sold upon such an understanding. It is to be noticed that in giving these opinions by the Secretary and the Assistant Secretaries or chief clerks, that it was predicated entirely upon the practice of the Government heretofore, and not upon any construction of the law authorizing the issue of the bonds or creating the legal-tender notes. In none of these opinions is there any reference made to these statutes, and what was said seemed to have been said in ignorance or indifference toward them, for no reference was made to them, and the opinions were predicated entirely upon what had been the practice of the Government heretofore. These several acts creating the legal tender were public laws, of which every man in the country was bound to take notice at his peril. Every man in the country purchasing a bond is presumed to know the character of the law creating the bond or the existence of any other law affecting the bond either as to time, manner, or mode of its payment.

In matters of such immense magnitude the nation can only be bound by the law. Its rights must be defined by the law, and by the law only. I cannot be bound by the opinion of public officers given either in ignorance or in violation of the law.

The Government of the United States, which has the power to borrow money and create a new loan, has put the terms of that loan into the law, and they cannot be varied by the opinion or the action of any public officer.

It would be a monstrous doctrine that the rights of the nation and of future generations, in matters of such immense importance, could be varied or changed by the illegal or unwarranted declaration of a public officer who has no power to say or do anything, except that which is conferred upon him by law. Nor can it be said that the good faith of the nation can be affected by its refusal to comply with the representations of a public officer, when those representations are made in direct conflict with a public statute of which he and everybody else is bound to take notice. Even in matters of private right and of the smallest importance men are presumed to know the law, and their rights are determined accordingly, and no man is bound by the act of his agent when that agent is acting outside of the authority or the presumed authority conferred upon him. Every man buying a bond of the Government must know that the liability of the Government could not be fixed or changed by a declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, but that the liability of the Government must be determined absolutely and only by the law creating the bond or making regulations for its payment.

The good faith of the nation in a matter of this kind can only be measured by the promise given by the law-making power, which promise must be in the form of a law. The Constitution declares that Congress shall have power to borrow money, from which it must be inferred that Congress and Congress only can prescribe the terms, limits, and conditions of the loan. The attempt therefore to erect a standard of good faith for the nation not only outside of the law, but in violation of its express provisions does the nation great injustice by contributing to place it in a false position before the people of other countries.

That is all I have to say on that question. If you prove that the Government is bound to pay these bonds in coin, you do it in the face of four direct and plain statutes as unequivocal as any statutes that ever were written.

There is the statute, plain, direct, even tautological upon this subject, declaring in not less than six or seven places that these notes shall be received in payment, and as a legal tender, in discharge of every claim and demand of whatsoever kind against the United States except interest upon notes and upon bonds, and then going on to say, as I remarked before, tautologically, that those notes shall be received as lawful money and as legal tender in payment of all debts, public or private, in the United States except the interest on notes and bonds as aforesaid. And yet in the face of language so plain, language that cannot be misunderstood, it is argued from day to day in this Senate that the Government is bound to pay the five-twenties in coin.

Now, Mr. President, this question is important or unimportant as Congress shall make it so. When we return to specie payments it is unimportant; as long as we fail to return to specie payments it is important. As I took occasion to say some weeks ago in the Senate, the first duty of Congress and the first great thing to do, in my opinion, is to take some direct step toward the return to specie payments.

I will say further, that it is in the existing legal-tender notes that the Government has a right to pay those five-twenty bonds. There was a limit of $400,000,000 fixed by law to the issue of those notes. I believe that to pass that limit would be a violation of public faith; but that the Government has the right to pay the five-twenty bonds out of the existing legal-tender notes is as clear, in my opinion, as any right that is defined by any statute of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator what practical importance there is in maintaining that doctrine if we have got no greenbacks to pay the bonds with? I take it there is not anybody here who supposes, if we are limited to the present amount of greenbacks, that we have got any greenbacks to redeem the bonds with. Therefore the question is not a practical one in any sense of the word, it seems to me.

Mr. MORTON. I think I can answer that question. The Senator has kindly called my attention to a point that I had forgotten for the moment, and that right in connection with this funding bill. Four hundred million dollars of currency is enough in which to invest all the bonds authorized by this bill. It is not done at once. The Government sells $50,000,000 of these new bonds to-day, and receives pay in existing legal tender notes. Those notes are paid out to-morrow in the redemption of an equal number of existing five-twenty bonds; and so the process goes on. The Government can redeem the five-twenty bonds in the existing legal-tender notes without issuing a new note, simply by selling the new bonds for legal-tender notes, and applying those legal-tender notes in the redemption of the existing five-twenty bonds.

That comes right down to this funding bill. This bill provides that the proceeds of the sale of these bonds "shall be exclusively used for the redemption, payment, or purchase of, or exchange for, an equal amount"—that is a very important phrase right there—"of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States." If you exchange them, it must be done for par. If you sell these new bonds you must sell them for par. Then you cannot buy up the five-twenty bonds in the market. You cannot buy them unless you buy them for par, because you make the proceeds of these bonds take up and cancel an equal amount of the outstanding bonds. We will suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury has sold $100,000,000 of these five per cent. bonds at par. He has got $100,000,000 of greenbacks in the Treasury of the United States. How is he going to apply that to the extinguishment of an equal amount of the outstanding debt? The holders of the five-twenty bonds will not sell them to the Government on the market at par, because they are commanding a large premium. He cannot exchange bond for bond because the bonds to be exchanged for command a premium, whereas the new bond can only be sold at par; there is no premium on that. He cannot obtain the five-twenties by exchange; he cannot obtain them by purchase, because the law would require him to purchase the old bonds at par, and they are at a premium. Therefore, he cannot use the proceeds of the new bonds unless he avails himself of the right of the Government to redeem the old bonds in these legal-tender notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is a little mistaken in regard to the legal effect. The plain meaning is that he shall only sell the bonds as he can redeem an equal amount. He would not sell these bonds at a less price than the market value of the five-twenties; but he can do that or make the exchange.

Mr. MORTON. I presume the chairman of the committee is entirely right upon that point; but the practical difficulty is that the Secretary cannot sell them for more than par; that will not be pretended, and he cannot buy the existing five-twenty bonds at par. So there can be nothing done in the way of buying them on the market. Then there can be nothing done in the way of exchange, because the old bonds command a premium, while the new ones do not. Therefore the holders of the old bonds would lose by the exchange. Then there can be nothing done with these bonds, unless he avails himself of the lawful right of the Government to take in these five-twenty bonds by paying them off in legal-tender notes. I have often heard it said that unless you issue more greenbacks, you cannot redeem the five-twenties in greenbacks. I have shown that that is a mistake; that by selling the new bonds at par, to be paid for in the existing legal-tender notes, those notes, when thus received, can be applied in redeeming and absolutely paying off a portion of the existing five-twenty bonds.

I am in favor myself of passing the first section of this bill. I am in favor of making this offer. I am in favor of trying to give an additional value to these bonds by the length of time that has been fixed in the bill for them to run. That is the only advantage they will have over the old bond.

One word in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Maine, which is to make these bonds all redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after ten years. He takes away the inducement to buy these bonds. He says, however, that these bonds can be made available by the existence of a doubt in the public mind as to how they shall be paid, whether they shall be paid in gold or in greenbacks. I should like to ask that distinguished Senator if it is very broad statesmanship to hang a great measure of this kind simply upon a doubt existing in the public mind? I very much prefer making a frank statement of this question to the whole country. As the law is written, so it must remain; you cannot help it; you cannot rub it out; you cannot argue the seal off the bond; and the distinguished Senators to whom I have referred, with all their ability and ingenuity, cannot take a single word from these four statutes.

I am in favor of tendering this funding bill to the country. I hope it will be accepted; I hope it may be received; but, sir, to make a candid confession, I have very little faith in any funding bill until such time as we have returned to specie payments. I believe we could return to them in a very short time by legislation in that direction. With a surplus of over eighty million dollars of gold in the Treasury, and with an accruing surplus from month to month, if we were simply to say that the gold we now thus hold and the gold we shall receive in surplus shall be applied to the redemption of these legal-tender notes it would send the premium on gold down one half at the very beginning. The very existence of that gold standing in the shadow behind these legal-tender notes, although the Government has declared no purpose in holding that gold, has given strength and value to these notes, simply from the impression upon the part of the people of the United States that some time or other that gold will be applied to the redemption of these notes. I believe that the accumulation of surplus gold in the Treasury with what we now have, even for a year or a year and a half, would be sufficient to enable us to begin the work of redemption and place the legal-tender notes at par, and then all these troublesome questions will disappear; but, sir, until that is done, they will remain to plague us.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not design saying anything on the particular matter which the Senator from Indiana has been arguing, for I think his speech is altogether out of place. We are discussing a particular point of construction upon the first section, and the bringing in here a discussion upon the question whether these bonds are in reality payable one way or the other strikes me to be a mere—

Mr. MORTON. I should like to say to the Senator that his censure is somewhat misplaced. I did not bring that question here. It was brought here on Saturday by the chairman of the committee and by the Senator from Massachusetts, and to-day discussed just before by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Ohio. If there is anything wrong in bringing the question here I am not responsible; but I find it here, and I will say to the Senator that he cannot keep it out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, I shall not attempt it, Mr. President. I shall not attempt to keep anything out here on any question. I have seen for years that that is useless. Senators will discuss every conceivable question under the sun upon a bill whether it has anything to do with it, or not, and the time has gone by when I ever attempted to interfere with anything of that sort.

But I rose simply to say that so far as the remark I made had any application it was merely repeating a remark made by the chairman of the committee. I said that if it was true that this bill relieved the question of a doubt that of itself was an inducement to the change from one species of obligation to another; and I think it is an inducement, because it cannot be disputed that the question has been made a question of doubt; and that is all I said about it.

But, sir, I wish to repeat what I said before: if there are not inducements enough to affect the judgments of the community with reference to taking the new obligations without extending the time of redemption from ten years to twenty, in my judgment it had better remain as it is, and we had better pay six per cent. for a little time longer than to burden ourselves with any such obligation as that. That is my opinion about it, which I gave very distinctly. Why, sir, what is the object? This is called a funding bill. Is not our debt all funded now, pretty much? Certainly it is. It is merely to change the bonds, and the ostensible object is to hold out some inducement to take other paper at a lower rate of interest. Undoubtedly if taken it would save so much; but then do not all men inquire, what are we to gain? Are we in reality to be the gainers? Certainly not, if in the process of time, say ten years hence, it so happens that we shall be able to redeem a large amount of our paper, as I think we shall be by borrowing at a lower rate owing to the improved state of our credit, and by pursuing the course now proposed; we then find ourselves in a condition where we shall have to pay from twelve to twenty per cent. premium in order to get it. What do we gain by that? Nothing at all; we are the losers in the long run. Sir, it has nothing but the appearance of benefit about it, and that appearance is, in my judgment, delusive, and nothing compared to what we shall lose by putting ourselves in a position where we cannot lay our hands upon the funds within a long period of time if we desire to do so. I leave that there, because I do not like to repeat arguments that I have used; but I wish to be specifically understood.

Now, sir, the honorable Senator from Indiana argues this matter of the real character of the five-twenty bond upon the contract, upon the laws passed, as if there is no dispute about it. He states it strongly. He says in so many words that there can be no doubt about it. That, I suppose, he only intends as another mode of saying there can be no doubt about it in his mind, because my honorable friend does not mean to say that the numbers of gentlemen who have expressed an opposite opinion are arguing what is nonsense and folly. Now, sir, I prepared a while ago, in the only way I ever do prepare, a speech upon this very question; and that is by studying the statutes and making some memoranda; and I thought at some period of time I would deliver that speech and express my opinions in detail and give my reasons for them; but my judgment is; that we have got to a period of the session when long speeches on questions that are not immediately pending are a little out of place, and that we had better devote ourselves to short discussions of the questions at issue. But for fear that there should be any misunderstanding about it, I will say in a few words—in hardly more than a sentence—that I came to an exactly opposite conclusion. I have no doubt that we are bound by every principle of honor, as expressed upon the paper and as connected with the contemporaneous exposition of the thing itself, to pay the principal of every bond we have issued in coin. That is my judgment, and I do not think I shall change it; and so positive am I that that was the understanding of everybody in the community that even if there was a narrow chance of escape by a technical construction of the paper itself I should deem myself dishonored, as a member of this body, if I should take the first step in any direction that would look like paying or attempting to pay our obligations of that description in paper. So that I am equally positive with my honorable friend on that subject.

Mr. MORTON. That is some relief to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But I do say that gentlemen may make an argument on the other side, and although it does not address itself to my mind, it will undoubtedly to the minds of the community. My judgment, however, is, situated as we are at present, with the majority of the Senate subscribers to a platform which sets forth the noblest, most generous, manly, and statesmanlike principles with regard to the whole thing, that we had better adhere to it and not even raise or intimate a doubt upon what the country will do when it becomes necessary that it should do anything.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not rise to occupy the time of the Senate further than to say that I do not concur at all in the conclusions to which the honorable Senator from Indiana seems to have arrived in regard to the mode of payment of the bonds to which he has alluded. I believe that I was a member of the Senate and voted for every one of the statutes authorizing the issue of those bonds, and it never occurred to my mind that the Government of the United States was not under the obligations of honor and good faith to pay those bonds in coin, in that kind of metal out of which the dollar mentioned on the face of the bond is made. Those bonds stipulate that the Government of the United States will pay so many dollars to the bearer. What is a dollar? The old statutes of the United States describe it, how it is made, of what metal it is made, and how much it weighs in silver, and also describes the same measure of value when made of gold.

Sir, we all know that the use of the greenback as a legal tender, as money, was expected to be temporary. It was one of those shifts to which we were driven by the pressure of the war. No member of the Senate, no member of the other House, as I understand it, supposed at that time that the bonds which we were issuing, and upon which we were acquiring loans of money, were redeemable merely in the depreciated paper currency of the Government. I hold the Government of the United States to be bound by the terms of its own contract, and by every sentiment of honor and justice, whatever may be the doubts that may be raised upon the language of the statutes, to redeem every bond issued by it in gold or silver coin, according to the terms of the bond itself. Sir, I think when we consent that those bonds may be taken up, or shall be taken up in the depreciated currency of the Government, when we refuse, in other words, to pay over to the honest bondholder the specie called for in his bond, or its equivalent, we contract a stain upon ourselves and upon the Government, whose servants we are, which will take a long time to wipe out. The good faith of a Government is as precious as the apple of the eye. When once that good faith is even suspected, its credit falls and sinks, and the character of its people, as well as the character of the Government, is injuriously affected. Even if there were a stipulation in those bonds that they should be payable in greenbacks, now that the country is reaching a period of peace and prosperity, I should hold it to be the duty of the Government, notwithstanding such a stipulation, to see to it that the honest bondholder was paid in coin. Sir, I dislike all such shifts as those. Let us meet our obligations like men, like patriots, and like a Government true to its own interests and entertaining a proper respect for the great people whom we represent.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I have felt very sorry from the beginning that this question was brought before the Senate and before the country. I believe as early as February last the Finance Committee brought in a bill on this subject which did not meet the approbation of the Senate, and it was withdrawn. Subsequently, in March, the bill in an amended form was brought in; but that has been withdrawn. And now, ten or fifteen days before the close of the session, we have brought before us again a question which cannot fail to do great harm. It seems to me as if this was done purposely to agitate the country improperly and injuriously to the Republican party. What good can arise from the discussion of this measure? Surely nothing good can come from it, but harm must result, because not one of our debts is now due, or will be for years. It would have been wiser to postpone this subject until the next presidential election had passed over, and the country should be in a condition to view it with that calmness with which it should always consider great financial questions.

I am one of those who believe that when you make a promise you should fulfil it; and I have such undoubted faith in the integrity of the people of this country that I do not believe there is a man anywhere entitled to confidence or respect who would countenance, or endeavor to give countenance, to those who would attempt to repudiate one penny of its obligations. If you repudiate a part of the interest you repudiate the whole debt. If you fail to pay in gold and silver, the currency of the world, you refuse to pay your debts. I do not believe anybody really intends to do that. I have in my life, at various times, seen parties springing up in my State, when she was in trouble about her finances, attempting to repudiate the debt of the State, and I never failed to see those put down and displaced. I never have seen a demagogue who, in my State, asserted that he was unwilling to pay every copper which the State had contracted in the time of her need, that did not sink into political obscurity; and so it will always be.

But this is the practical question. What good can come from agitating this subject now? Why not better postpone the whole matter until after the election is over, and then we shall come here with new lights, with all the questions cleared off from the public mind except that of reconstruction; and when we have reconstructed the country, as was said wisely and ably by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] the other day, the redemption of specie payments will be easy. You must first reconstruct the country and have peace throughout our borders before you can attempt to talk about specie payments. When specie payments have arrived, as they will in a short time, nobody will talk about repudiation; nobody will moot the question whether these bonds shall be paid in gold or greenbacks. Greenbacks were an expedient of the war, and they answered a good purpose then. They saved the country. They enabled us to feed and clothe our armies. But they have done their work, and now they will go out of use directly.

I wish I could speak more at length on this subject to-day, for it is one which is most interesting to me, as it is of interest to every man who loves his country and who has a feeling of personal honor; but I am not well enough to do so, and I shall content myself, if the bill is to pass, by offering some amendments which I think will make it more acceptable to the country and better for the interests of the Government. My opinion is that this is a scheme gotten up by the Treasury Department for its own use. I think there is something hidden in it, something not seen, or else it would not be so persistently pushed upon us. I remember that some time ago, perhaps in February, it was understood that after a certain section of the bill was disagreed to the whole bill was to fail. I think I remember particularly that we were told that the bill would not be urged after that date, after the vote against a particular section. I am positive of that. But if the bill is to be pressed, I shall try to make some amendments to it.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I am very much pleased with some of the remarks that the Senator from Pennsylvania has made; those of his remarks which go to the extent that this discussion is out of place. But I am unwilling to let the declarations that have been made by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Michigan go to the country without expressing my views, which are not in harmony with theirs.

There are two classes of indebtedness in this country. Some of our obligations are payable in gold; others are not so specified, and are payable in the lawful money; and I do not know how those Senators discriminate between a portion of the obligations which do not call for gold payments and allege that they are payable in gold and another class of indebtedness of the same description, and recognize the right to pay the latter class in greenbacks. We are incurring liabilities every day. This is a very costly Government. The expenses amount to perhaps $300,000,000 a year, a large portion of which is payable in United States notes. It is just as dishonorable, and no more dishonorable in the Government to pay the current indebtedness in United States notes, as it is to pay other forms of indebtedness, where gold is not called for, in that same currency.

We cannot—the fact might as well be acknowledged—now pay our indebtedness in gold; at some day we hope to be able to do it. When we have improved our credit to such an extent that our obligations will be equivalent to gold then our payments will be in gold. But our credit is not to be improved by vain declarations. Our credit is to be improved by degrees, by adding to the productive industry of the country, the wealth of the country. That cannot be done in a day, nor by declarations. It must grow up as the credit of an individual would grow up.

It has been well stated heretofore that we have suffered a great deal by the war. We were during all the period of the war destroying instead of producing; we were reducing our wealth rather than adding to it; and so great was the destruction, so great the reduction of our wealth as a nation, that it became impossible for us to pay as we were paying before that time; and at this day our credit is very considerably below par. Our promises to pay are only worth about seventy cents on the dollar in gold. This is a fact that is patent to us all. Our credit is so much below par that there is no use in trying to conceal the fact, or by vain declarations to reach some other conclusion.

We are now improving our condition as a nation. We are adding to its wealth rapidly. In a few years we shall be in a position to pay our current liabilities in the ordinary coin of the world, and to pay also our bonds in the same currency. But until we have built up our credit, until time elapses, until our wealth has been increased, it will be utterly in vain for us to attempt the payment of all our obligations in gold. I suppose the credit of a nation does not differ much from that of an individual. Before the war we were exceedingly prosperous. We lacked hardly anything that makes a nation great. But we suffered calamity after calamity; and so our credit was reduced. If an individual who was in a prosperous condition meets with calamity by fire or flood it for the time being will destroy his credit; and if he is compelled to borrow for the purpose of replacing his losses he will pursue precisely the same course that we as a nation have done; he will have to mortgage the property that he has, and pay a heavy interest, and his credit will be for the time reduced; but when he has had time to repair his losses, then, and not before, his obligations will be at par. I do not believe that it is possible by a declaration to bring ourselves back to a specie basis. The only way in which it can be done, in my judgment, is by the process which adds to our national wealth. When we have reached the position that we occupied before the war we shall then be upon a specie basis; but we cannot reach there by any short cut.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any views on the subject now before the Senate which are of any value to the public; but, like all other Senators, I feel a deep interest in it, and as the discussion has progressed I have been not a little pained at the direction it has taken.

The proposition directly before us is an amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, to leave the option of payment within ten years to the Government of the bonds proposed to be issued, the effect of which, in my opinion, if adopted, would be to defeat the purpose of the pending bill, which is, as I understand it, an offer to the bondholders to release and give up the bonds they now hold for bonds of a longer date and lower rate of interest, absolutely and positively, by the terms of the law providing for their issue, payable principal and interest in gold. I regard that proposition as a fair one.

In place of attempting to hold the Senator from Ohio up to public odium for inconsistency or change of opinion I hail and welcome the proposition that he has now presented to us, as contradicting from that presented at the early part of the session by him. The former was a coercive proposition, and the views in which it was advocated were perhaps more strongly coercive than the terms of the measure, and I regretted the utterance of both. You cannot deal with a creditor and maintain your character except in one of two ways: you must either pay what you owe or you must propose an honest and honorable mode of settlement and adjustment; that is to say, you must pay when you can, and if you cannot pay him now, or when the debt is due, and you can agree upon terms with your creditor for an extension of the day of payment, those terms must be acceptable to him, or else your credit falls. Therefore, as the pending measure offers a long bond with absolute security by the terms of the law of the payment of the principal and interest in gold or silver, though presented at a lower rate of interest, which the public welfare demands, it is a fair and honest proposition, and one, in my opinion, that will be accepted by the bondholders. It is therefore an advantageous proposition. It is one that I am in favor of.

I regretted most deeply when the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] denounced the measure in the severe language which he applied to it. I do not think that my friend could have meant what he said in truth and earnestness in imputing to the Senator from Ohio the introduction of a measure here gotten up, as he said, by the Treasury Department, having for its purposes some mysterious objects, which he could not comprehend nor understand. I do not always, while I sit here and listen to the able Senator from Ohio, agree with all he says; but I think no one can deny him the highest integrity and purity of motive and purpose. I do not think that my honorable friend from Pennsylvania intended to say just what he did. I agree with him in both the letter and spirit of what he otherwise said, except that part of it which so strongly deprecated the presentation of this measure at this time. Mr. President, I think it is an opportune time. It is a time when a party in this country, seeking and contesting for the power of this nation, have emblazoned upon their banners repudiation of the public debt and destruction, consequent of the public credit. The time when such a proposition is made is, in my opinion, the time to meet it.

It is not many days since a resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives, not by a party vote, but by a non-political vote, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means of that body to report to it a measure imposing a tax of ten per cent. upon the coupons of the bonds. The committee obeyed the behest of the House, but to their lasting credit reported that they were against the measure, and between that bold and honest declaration and the indignation and common sense of the country standing by the public credit, that not simply questionable, but corrupt and faithless proposition fell still-born. It fell as it ought to fall, stamped with the infamy of an attempted violation of the public faith.

But, Mr. President, while I say this it is an unmistakable fact that the rates of interest paid upon the public debt of the United States are rates that make great additional public burdens; and I welcome the proposition at this time and in the manner proposed to reduce the rate of interest without in any manner tainting the public credit. Therefore it is that I regret the remarks of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania. In the other part of his remarks, which described in a few short, terse sentences the political failure of every man in his State who, in the days of its distresses, undertook to ride into power by an assault upon the credit of the Commonwealth, I recognized a true and just statement; and so it will be with those who undertake to originate or to cater to a dishonorable public sentiment touching our national credit and our national debt.

Why, Mr. President, when and how and under what circumstances was that debt created? When the national existence was assailed by a party that through long years of war proved nearly our equals in point of use of force; when loans that might be obtained from existing banking institutions were totally inadequate to the payment of the public expenses, and the nation itself had to go out among its own people, we were proud, and should still be proud, of the patriotism which furnished the means of carrying on the war and defending the nation's integrity. It is yet fresh in the memory of every Senator and of every man in this land how we hailed each morning the heralded statements of the amount of our obligations that the people from hamlet and village, from town and city, all over our broad-spread land, sent in to invest in the national bonds. We said, "here is America, in defense of republican institutions and in defense of human liberty, not only ready to take the field and spill its people's blood, but here, too, it comes with its means ample from every source;" and it was our proud boast that this was the case.

Mr. President, have we forgotten so soon what were then our proud boasts? Shall we now join in this dishonorable cry of a party who seek the acquisition of power for other reasons and purposes by uniting in their assault upon the public credit? No, sir; I am happy to say that that is not the position of the party to which I belong; and though there are found here and there men weak for the time, who live in the midst of a public sentiment that they feel either their interest or to their taste for the time to cultivate and pander to. Yet they are the inconsiderable numbers. The banner which we have erected of "security of national unity and national credit" will go on and attract the support of the people of this country until both shall be consolidated in the results of the next election.

There are some views touching some of the causes which lie at the foundation of the present condition of our public debt that I should like just at this time to go on and utter, but I did not rise to make a speech and will confine myself within narrower limits.

I regretted, and regretted deeply, the speech made by my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS.] I know that there is in the West what is termed a greenback sentiment, a common sentiment such as has been uttered by the convention recently convened at New York, that the money in which the soldiers and the people are paid is good enough for the bondholder. Why, Mr. President, the money in which all are paid and shall be paid shall be made good, and we are not the men to cast a stain or discredit upon it.

I regretted, too, the utterances of my colleague. My object is not to reprobate either him or his views, but I feel it incumbent upon me to make a statement to the contrary of them. He of all men, representing the Commonwealth he does, should not undertake to reduce the standard of the public credit. If there be in regard to any part of the bonds that have been issued by the United States a doubt as to the currency in which they shall be paid, and the letter is not positive as to their payment, let the spirit of the statute be obeyed; let us go further than the letter of the law to maintain inviolate the public credit. Why, sir, what did his own State do? It had issued more than four millions of bonds when this war took place. They were not made payable in gold by any specific statement. They stated expressly even less than the condition of the five twenty bonds. When Congress, in the exercise of its power—an extreme case we all admit it to have been, but it was done and exercised under a controlling public necessity—passed the legal-tender act, California might have paid its debt to the holders of its bonds, and the interest upon them, in legal-tender notes. Did it do so? No, sir. When gold was at three hundred in notes, California came forward and voluntarily paid its interest in gold. Massachusetts did the same. I honor Massachusetts not for that alone, but for all of her proud record, and for none more than that; and so the credit of those two States stands preëminent to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Should they stand higher than the credit of the United States?

Mr. CONNESS. My friend asks should they stand higher than the credit of the United States. Certainly not. The United States with its great resources, with its now proud history, with its recent accomplishments, with a conceded status in the economy of the world over all nations and all peoples, should stand high and peerless above all States; and so it will if we manfully do our duty. Let us not let the standard trail; let it not come down. Let us go beyond either the letter or the spirit of the law, if necessary to maintain the public credit.

But, Mr. President, we are not called upon to do that. What is the proposition before us? It is whether we will offer to the public creditors a long bond at low interest which they may voluntarily take or not. I am in favor of passing affirmatively upon that proposition. There is no compulsion about it. It will be profitable to those who seek investments, and the exchange will be made. I cannot characterize it nor see it as an effort of interested men to make money out of the public faith or the public necessities. I think that our highest duty consists in it.

But, sir, are we called upon to discuss the question of whether the five-twenties shall be had in legal tenders, or not, at this time? Certainly not. It is not involved. If we pass this bill, those bonds will be exchanged for the bonds we propose to issue under this act, and then the question will be set at rest. But if we continue eternally to discuss the question between ourselves as to what that statute meant, whether it meant national honor or national disgrace, whether we are to maintain it as the one or the other, our credit necessarily is to fall by that discussion. I hope that in the further discussion of this bill we shall confine ourselves simply to the propositions before us and pass upon them. Let us reduce the public burden by reducing the public interest. For some time past money has been in the New York market at three and four per cent. Why shall we not avail ourselves of such advantages as the money market shall give us? Why shall we not offer the means of a longer investment to those who will exchange their bonds? I think it is but a simple duty. But, Mr. President, over and above all, let there be no word and no taint of repudiation. Let there be no question as to what both the interest and principal shall be paid in where the law does not specifically affirm it. Let our contract be kept not only in its letter but in its spirit, and then the credit of our country will stand high; and when reconstruction shall be complete, when peace shall obtain, when the national industries shall again be reënlivened, all will be well.

Mr. ORIGIN obtained the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to make a brief explanation.

Mr. ORIGIN. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. I am reminded by the Senator from California that other persons like himself may have supposed that I intended to cast a censure on the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Certainly I had no such intention. There is no member of this body of whom I have a higher opinion, personally and politically. His relations and mine have always been pleasant, and I think I am the last man who would willingly encounter so able an adversary as he would be. But I intended to say that I had no confidence in the Treasury Department, and I look upon the Finance Committee as the agents of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CONNESS. You are wrong in that.

Mr. CAMERON. I suppose these bills are in a great measure instigated from the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Not a bit of it.

Mr. CAMERON. I think I am not wrong in that. We are all very apt to take impressions from the heads of the Departments which we represent. I believe there are in this country a large number of persons who would like to depreciate our credit. Some men in the South would very gladly have our public debt reduced as low as their own, in the hope that at some future day we should be compelled to redeem their debt as well as our own. There are people in this portion of the country who affiliate with them. A great many probably have interests with them. There are a large number of persons in the North who are interested in the rebel debt. They would like very well to have this country in such a condition that the larger portion of both debts should be made a common stock and the whole country bound for them.

I think the Secretary of the Treasury has shown a great want of ability in the management of his Department. I am satisfied that no wise man, acquainted with finance, would have suffered for years, as I believe he has done, $100,000,000 in gold to lie unused in the Treasury, equal to $150,000,000, probably, of greenbacks, taking the average of the price of gold, thus losing every year about nine million dollars in interest. Those $9,000,000, making $27,000,000 for three years, applied to the public debt, would be a very good item off.

Now, as to the payment of the public debt, I repeat and reiterate that I do not believe there is anybody belonging to the Republican party in this country who will ever consent that the public debt shall be paid in anything but the currency of the world. I am sure that the Senator from Indiana will be one of the last to do so. He has a right to argue, as every other man has, that there is a possibility, on looking at the form of these laws, that some of the loans may legally be payable in something else than gold. I do not admit it; but men's minds may come to that conclusion; and I know that good lawyers sometimes get very technical, and they say things may be done which they would not do themselves. But I have no doubt of the payment of the whole debt, every dollar of it, in gold or silver.

I meant to say, when up before, that I deprecated bringing this question now before the country. No good can come from it, and it naturally brings up matters of detail, and makes men's minds give forth the results of their own reflections. They are thrown out here without much consideration, and they are sent abroad, not only as the sentiments of the individual, but as the sentiments of the party. I believe, indeed I am sure, that we shall elect General Grant, and when we have him at the head of affairs, a wise and able statesman as I believe he will prove to be, with the Republican party in its full strength and vigor, I think we shall present to the country such a bill funding our debt as will enable us to reduce the amount of our interest very much.

The Senator from California said a little while ago in passing, and I have heard it repeated so often that I desire to contradict it, that money can be had in New York at four per cent. If the Senator from California had $10,000 in bonds of the State of California, and wanted to loan $8,000 for twenty days, he could probably get it at four per cent.; he would be more likely to get it if he only wanted it for a week; but if he went there with the best security of the State of California, and desired to borrow ten or twenty thousand dollars or any other sum of money for any length of time, he could not get it at anything like four per cent.; he would have to pay six or eight per cent.

Mr. CONNESS. The market is falling all the time.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, the market is falling, because the credit of the country is rising. Therefore, after we shall have completed the work of reconstruction we shall be in a condition to make terms about our loans. When an individual is in trouble he can make no terms with his creditors; but whenever he becomes prosperous they are willing to trust him and give him better terms. The affairs of a nation are but the affairs of an individual carried to a greater extent.

I rose only to say that as between the Senator from Ohio and myself there will be no wrong done him by me.

Mr. SHEPHERD. I did not hear the remarks of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania when he first rose, the distance was so great across the room, and his voice was not raised so that I could hear him. I am very glad that I did not, because if I had drawn the same inference from the remarks that the Senator from California did it would make me feel very unkind, and I should at once have said something that I perhaps would not like to have said. I am very glad, indeed, to hear what the Senator from Pennsylvania now says on that point.

I desire to say, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the Senator's remark would seem to have a reflection upon him, that he should not be held responsible, nor any one else, for this bill. This bill is the emanation of the Committee on Finance, and if any one ought to take the most blame I am perfectly willing to do it, although the first section of the bill was not drawn by me, but by the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN.] I desire to say that every section of this bill is framed in the interest of the people of the United States without regard to any other interest whatever. Every clause of the bill tends to lower the burden of the public debt; and no comment by the people at large, or in the newspapers, or even here would make me hesitate a moment in pressing constantly upon the attention of the Senate this and all other measures that I deem advisable to lower the burden of the public debt and to advance the interests of the people. I believe I can say that it is the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Finance, who have studied the matter over, that this course should be taken. Their whole purpose is to elevate the character of the greenbacks, to raise the greenbacks as near as possible to the standard of gold, and to lower the burden of the public debt by reducing the rate of interest. That is the whole object of the bill. It can have no other purpose. No person can be benefited, no interest can be benefited, except the general interest of the people of the United States. I have no doubt that this measure, if passed unabridged in the form in which it is presented, will do a great deal of good. It can by possibility do no harm, and it will, in my judgment, do a great deal of good. It will not impair the public credit.

It does not trench upon that question which has been partially discussed to-day, as to whether the principal of the five-twenty bonds is payable in lawful money or not. It seeks to avoid that issue, about which there is greater division among the people of the United States than there is here in the Senate. If this bill is successful, by funding the public debt the Government of the United States will save $20,000,000 of gold in a year; enough in itself without any other provision to pay off the whole of this debt in forty years. If it should fail in its purpose by the refusal of the bondholders to take the new bonds in exchange for the old, it can do no harm; it is simply an offer refused; and then it will be for Congress to determine whether or not the people of the United States must go on paying six per cent. interest in gold, free from all tax, to the end, I may say, of time. That is a question I am perfectly willing to postpone.

In regard to another question mentioned by the Senator from Pennsylvania, there is a provision in this bill which, in my judgment, will do more to promote specie payments than any other provision that can possibly be introduced. The people of the country do not favor a reduction of the amount of greenbacks now outstanding. They demanded of us a repeal of that law which authorized the cancellation of greenbacks and the diminution of the amount further and further under existing laws. This bill restores the old provision of the act of February 25, 1862, by which the owner of a greenback may at any time put himself on a par with the bondholder by converting his note into bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if that note must not be put out again?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily. It may remain in the Treasury, or it may be used—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It cannot be canceled;

it must go out. If it is used for paying other duties it goes out, because, as the law stands now in relation to that subject, there must be a certain amount of greenbacks always kept in circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. The fallacy of the Senator's argument—and I will not anticipate that, because when the third section comes up I desire to submit my views upon it, not at any considerable length, but more than I shall say now—the fallacy of his argument is the idea that the Treasurer must pay out greenbacks as rapidly as they come in. If he can properly pay them out in the payment of debts well and good. But I will not answer that observation now.

There was another observation made by the Senator from Pennsylvania that I want to correct his mind about. This bill does not confer additional power on the Secretary of the Treasury. Not one particle of power is given by the bill to the Secretary of the Treasury. This section is a limitation upon his power. He may now take your six per cent. bonds, payable forty years after date, and sell them at par for lawful money.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me, I think it does give a great deal more power to the Secretary of the Treasury in this respect: it enables him to employ agents, paying them just what he pleases, for the purpose of converting these bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will correct that.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall be glad to hear the correction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the existing law, the Senator from Maine will bear me witness unless we pass some other law on the subject, the Secretary of the Treasury has the power without limit to employ agents, or any agency whatever he chooses, provided only the expense is not more than one per cent. Under the law as it now stands he employs agents. Whether that is wise or unwise I do not stop to argue. But under this bill he can employ no agent whatever who can be engaged in this matter or do anything.

Mr. CAMERON. I know he has the power under existing law; but there is no use for that power now, unless you give him authority to reinvest these bonds. At present that authority is utterly powerless; but if you go on to make another $2,000,000,000 of bonds he will have the right to convert them, and whenever he does convert them he pays what he pleases by way of commissions and allowances. I desire to prevent that; and I shall offer an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under this bill the Secretary cannot employ anybody. He cannot by himself or any one else sell a single dollar except of the particular kind named in this act, and then he can only lift a bond bearing a higher rate of interest by issuing a bond bearing a lower rate of interest; that is, under the first section of the bill he cannot sell a five per cent. bond running twenty years unless he can get what is equivalent now to the market value of a five-twenty bond; so that this is a vast limitation upon his power under the law as it stands. If Senators want to leave in the hands of the Secretary this unlimited power, and then shield themselves from responsibility by saying he has the power to do all this, that is one way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask my friend a question. According to my recollection of those bills, for the purpose of negotiating bonds or other securities he might negotiate he had power to expend a sum of money not exceeding one per cent. He has negotiated nearly the whole, as I understand, except a very small sum. What is there left?

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will reflect a moment, under the law of April 12, 1866, the Secretary may go on and convert any description of bond described in the act of 1864, which is a bond bearing six per cent. interest and running forty years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has he the right to use the fund for that purpose?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly he has.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then that ought to be restrained by law.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was the subject of complaint two years ago by me that that law gave him such extraordinary power. Now, I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senate, so far from this bill giving the Secretary of the Treasury any power whatever every section of it is a restraint upon his power. The first section is a vital and material restraint upon his power. It takes away from him all authority, all license, all discretion unless he can negotiate, par for par, the new bond for the old.

It is due to the Secretary of the Treasury that I should make this statement: he has never come before the Committee on Finance to urge us to pass this bill, or, so far as I know, ever asked a single member to urge the passage of the bill. It is a restraint and limitation upon his power. I have no doubt he is satisfied with it. He has stated to myself and to others that he thinks he can, if the market continues favorable, exchange a considerable portion of these bonds, if they are left twenty-year five per cent. bonds for the existing six per cent. bonds; but we must leave him free to make that exchange on the best terms he can by selling the new bonds at a rate that will enable him to buy the old; and if we do so, and he makes the exchange, it is for our benefit. If he fails, there is no harm in it. That is the way in which the bill appears to me.

I am indebted to the Senator from New Hampshire for his courtesy in yielding the floor.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. CRAGIN. These personal explanations are rather long.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from California made one remark to which I desire to reply. He said he regretted my speech, but there were certain greenback localities, and the intimation was that I had come from one of them, and I was in some way pandering to that sentiment. I have as little occasion, perhaps, to pander to public sentiment as any other Senator here. I am not a candidate for anything, and do not expect to be very soon. But I would say to that Senator and to others, when they come to discuss this question, instead of indulging in general declarations about good faith and preserving the nation's honor, it would be better if they would condescend to argue the law for a moment. I did not argue it as a question of opinion, nor as a question of choice; I simply argued it as a question of law. Those who generally argue on the other side hardly ever condescend to argue the laws which creates and determine the quality of what are called greenbacks or legal-tender notes.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to enter my protest against having the Republican party committed to the dogma that the five-twenties are to be paid in coin. As a question of law it is a dogma that cannot be sustained. There is not a Democratic lawyer in the country who has ever read Blackstone and Kent, and who can read these statutes, but what can meet Senators on the stump and beat them on this legal question; and I protest against the Republican party being committed to that doctrine throughout this contest.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. CRAGIN. I must decline to yield any further.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not know the Senator had the floor.

Mr. CRAGIN. I shall only occupy a few moments.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will my friend allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio, with the thermometer at 90°, whether he wishes us to come here this evening?

Several SENATORS. Oh, yes; let us finish the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope we shall have no night session. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island to move to suspend the evening session for to-night.

Mr. ANTHONY. What does the Senator from Ohio wish?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better sit along and get through with this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine because I believe it will defeat the objects of this bill. Being strongly in favor of the passage of the bill, I am opposed to that amendment. If the Government finds itself in a condition to pay any considerable amount of its indebtedness within twenty years it will have ample opportunity. Some eight hundred millions of the public debt will be outside of the bonds provided for by this bill, if it becomes a law, and I apprehend that that is more than can be paid in the next twenty years. I am in favor of this bill because it looks to a large reduction of interest on the public debt, and a consequent reduction of the burdens of the people. The amount of indebtedness likely to be funded under this bill, if it should become a law, is about seventeen hundred million dollars. The interest on this amount at six per cent., as at present authorized, is $102,000,000 per annum. By this bill only $700,000,000 are to be funded at five per cent. The annual interest on this amount would be $35,000,000. If the other $1,000,000,000 is divided equally between the four and a half and four per cent. bonds, the annual interest will be $42,500,000, or a total interest of $77,500,000 on the entire $1,700,000,000. This will be a saving of $24,500,000 in the amount of interest paid by the Government. In other words, the burden of the people will be lightened to that extent. A tax of ten per cent. on the income, supposing it remains at six per cent., would be only $10,200,000, or less than one half the reduction of interest under this bill.

If States were allowed to tax the five-twenty bonds, as other property is taxed, the aggregate tax would not begin to amount to $24,500,000, the amount that will be saved by funding them under this bill. This reduction of interest is equal to a tax of one and three eighth per cent. on the principal, or about twenty-four per cent. on the income.

The reduction of interest on the public debt will reduce the rate of interest generally in commercial and business transactions among the people. Industry will be relieved all over this land. Those doing business on borrowed capital will be able to make more profits, and consequently pay more for labor. I regard it as of the first importance that the rate of interest should be reduced in this country. It will benefit all our industries, and tend to elevate the condition of the laborers. The Government must begin this work, and now is a good time.

I am for this bill for another reason—because it puts further off the time for the payment of this large debt. A very large amount of this debt is now due, if the Government chooses to pay it. It cannot be paid without crushing the people with taxation. It should not and must not be done. The debts incurred by the States, counties, and towns, for the patriotic purpose of prosecuting the war for the Union are very great. Indeed, they are more than the people ought to be called upon to pay in the next twenty years. The resources of this country are almost beyond calculation.

The wealth of the nation is increasing more than three times as fast as its population. The individual wealth of the people is increasing annually more than the total amount of the national debt. In 1860 our aggregate wealth, not including property owned by the United States or by any State, was over sixteen thousand million dollars, being an increase of one hundred and twenty-six and a half per cent. over that of 1850. The increase of our population was only about thirty-five per cent. Supposing we increase one hundred per cent. during each ten years in the future up to 1900 the result will astonish the world. In 1870 our national wealth will be over thirty-two thousand million dollars; in 1880 over sixty-four thousand million dollars; in 1890 over one hundred and twenty-eight thousand million dollars; and in 1900 over two hundred and fifty thousand million dollars, or more than eight times what it now is. The people can then pay eight dollars as easy as they can pay one now. This generation has paid largely in life, toil, and treasure for the blessings we now enjoy. If we transmit them to a future generation unimpaired they should pay the national debt that now hangs over us as their price for the legacy of liberty and human rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to amend the amendment of the Committee on Finance by striking out the last section of it, which is in these words:

And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms, anything in the several acts relating to United States notes to the contrary notwithstanding.

I am opposed to the enactment of such a law as is contemplated in this section, because I believe it will virtually result in specie payments, for which the country is not prepared and of which it has had no notice. The practical effect of it in the country will be that small borrowers, men of small means, men who must take money where they can get it, will be compelled to enter into contracts payable in gold; and thus indirectly, and not in a bold and manly way, you attempt the resumption of specie payments. That object is desirable, of course, but the country is not prepared for it, the people do not anticipate it. Almost every scheme of resumption heretofore has contemplated a notice to the people, notice of a twelvemonth, of eighteen months, of two years; but here, immediately upon the passage of this section, you say that contracts for payment in gold shall be legal. The man who wants $300 to improve his farm has not the choice of places to which to go and get this small accommodation. Probably there is but one moneyed man in his vicinity, one of those men that we find in the West who have gone from the East without conscience, who have no scruple about exacting five per cent. and sometimes even ten per cent. a month. Many a farmer will want a few hundred dollars to carry on his operations, and when he goes to borrow the money he is told, "You can have it; but evidently Congress contemplates that in a short time there will be a resumption of specie payments, and I must be prepared for that time. Now, I will give you this money in greenbacks, but you must enter into a contract with me to pay me in gold."

I do not believe the Senate contemplate that state of things. I do not think they intend to do this injustice. I do not believe the country contemplate it or desires it or will endure it. Instead of "taking the bull by the horns" boldly and repealing your legal-tender act and letting the whole country come to a resumption of specie payments, you attempt to do it indirectly by commencing with the small dealers and the men who borrow small sums of money throughout the country. This will be the effect of it. They will be oppressed; they will be compelled to enter into these contracts. It is true the Senator from Ohio may tell us that a contract of that kind would be usurious; but why should it? A dollar in greenbacks is a legal dollar, and so is a gold dollar. How, then, could such a contract be pronounced usurious? What court in the land would so declare? We have nothing to do with the construction of the law; it is the enactment of it which is our province. We cannot guarantee against a construction by the courts that such a contract would be legal.

I say this is not contemplated, not expected by the country. They have had no notice of it. When the time comes for the resumption of specie payments ample notice should be given and the whole country placed on an equality in regard to it. By this kind of special legislation the small borrowers of the country, the poorer men of the land, will be compelled to pay specie, while the larger dealers, the men borrowing large sums, will be dragged on in their own good time. I say it is unfair, partial, and oppressive to the country, and I hope the Senate will reject this portion of the committee's amendment. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] in his very fine speech the other day, said that the effect of this provision was that men would make their contracts as they pleased, and he added, let them take their choice. He regarded it as a matter of contract in regard to which each man would have a right to act for himself. If the honorable Senator had seen a great part of the western world he would find that it is the money-lender who is a law unto the money-borrower. They do not meet on equal terms. It is the man who has the funds to lend that makes the law to the man who wants to borrow money. You propose here to give him this assistance to enable him to exact a gold contract from the borrower. I do not believe the country expects it. I believe the country will reject it, and I hope the Senate will.

Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. We have existing laws that require the payment of all duties in coin, and yet under a construction of the law, as it now stands, any contract that is made for the procurement of the coin cannot be enforced. Is it not reasonable, while we are under the necessity of collecting our duties in coin, that the parties who make contracts to obtain that coin may make valid contracts which can be enforced? The Senator from Minnesota talks as though all the people who go from the East to the West are parties with their pockets filled with "rocks" and without conscience.

Mr. RAMSEY. I do not say all; I say many.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am afraid the Senator judges of the East by himself. I believe he went from the East to the West. I want this law passed for the protection of the poor men who are going West to buy land, among other reasons. Men, as the Senator from Minnesota, who have large possessions in land are now able to dispose of them at an inflated currency price, take a mortgage for payment for the property at a long term of years, and when that comes due the party who has purchased the land finds to his surprise that he is obliged to pay some forty or fifty per cent. more than he would have been compelled to had he had an opportunity to make a coin contract. Take, for instance, a man who is going to build a house: he cannot pay for in for a long term of years; he is a mechanic; if he could obtain a credit upon that house upon any terms which he would venture to risk he might afford to take it and buy it, but under present circumstances it is so dangerous that no man with ordinary prudence, unless he is possessed of extraordinary wealth, is willing to make a contract payable at any future term of time.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this idea of the Senator from Minnesota is at all a valid one. Every Senator must be aware, I think, that contracts that are made where the usury laws are attempted to be evaded, where property of any kind is put in above its value, are always decided to be usurious; and so it would be in this case. If a contract was made where the consideration was currency, and the agreement that the interest should be paid in coin, the courts, I believe, would hold it to be usurious.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am decidedly of the opinion expressed here by the Senator from Minnesota, and I differ with the Senator from Vermont. I do not believe when that law is passed any law in any State of the Union against usury can be enforced. I believe that it is in effect a repeal of every limitation upon the rate of interest now existing in the statutes of the States. I cannot think there is a doubt upon that point. The Senator from Vermont says, and truly, that the laws now require duties on foreign imports to be paid in coin, and he urges that it is nothing more than right and reasonable that the men who have to pay the coin into the Treasury upon those importations should be allowed to make a contract for the coin. He is right; but there is no sort of difficulty in his making a contract as the law now stands. He can go anywhere where he can find a man with coin to sell and buy the coin and pay for it, and then he has it, and then he can meet his obligations to the Government. But buying coin to be delivered now is one thing and buying coin to be delivered sixty days or sixteen months hence is a very different thing. The first he can do; the second, it is the purpose of this clause in the bill to enable him to do.

Now, the Senator from Minnesota says, and I think he says with absolute truth, that the practical effect of this provision will be to change all contracts from currency contracts to coin contracts; at least all men who want to borrow will be compelled to borrow of those who stipulate to be repaid in coin, whether they borrow to be repaid in sixty days or six months or six years. The lender will require the contract to be redeemed in coin. And what is the effect of that? Why, in two months after this provision is passed every borrower in the country is a purchaser of coin, of necessity, to redeem his contracts, to meet his obligations. He is upon the market seeking to purchase coin; he must have it because his mortgages can be canceled in no other way; so that your borrowing classes who have not any coin at once become responsible for paying the indebtedness of the country in coin of their own contracts. At the same time your Wall street operators, your speculators there, are operating upon the price of coin. The capital of the country is released by the law as it stands; they are released from the obligation of furnishing a dollar of coin to any body; but the borrowers of the country are put under obligations by virtue of their own contracts to procure it. Your coin speculators have the necessities of the borrowing classes then to operate upon, and when coin goes up one cent or five cents, it is the pocket of the borrower that feels it; and the borrowing classes have then a double difficulty to deal with, the exactions of the lender, always quite as much as the borrower can stand, and the ingenuity and the schemes and the contrivances of the coin speculator in the great markets. I do not believe that this is the way to commence to bring about specie payments. The capital of the country should take the lead in this matter, and not the necessities and the poverty of the country. The question is suggested to me now for the first time. I am speaking to it as from first impression. I believe the operation of it will be just as has been stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. RAMSEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 6, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Harlan, Howe, Osborn, Ramsey, and Wade—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Howard, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Thayer, Vickers, and Yates—22.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by striking out the three first sections of the amendment, and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The words proposed to be inserted in lieu of the first three sections of Mr. SHERMAN's amendment were read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue, upon the faith and credit of the United States, in sums of not less than fifty dollars each, coupon or registered bonds to an amount sufficient to redeem all the interest-bearing bonds of the United States, except the five per cent. bonds, to be known as the "consolidated debt of the United States."

And be it further enacted, That the bonds issued under the provisions of this act shall be payable in fifty years from the dates thereof, and shall bear interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum; the said interest shall be paid semi-annually, and at such dates as will cause an equal amount thereof to be paid quarterly, to wit: On the first days of January, April, July, and October, in each year; and the principal and interest of the said "consolidated debt of the United States" shall be paid in coin as hereinafter specified.

And be it further enacted, That the said bonds shall be issued solely in exchange for and in redemption of the heretofore mentioned interest-bearing bonds of the United States, and such exchange and redemption shall be made at any time prior to the 1st day of January, 1870, at such places and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

And be it further enacted, That the said bonds shall be subject to a national tax of one half of one per cent. per annum, to be paid semi-annually in coin at the date of maturity of the interest thereon, and the amount of said tax shall be specified on the face of said bonds; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as he may prescribe in making payment of the interest on said bonds, to deduct therefrom the tax hereby provided, and to cover the same into the Treasury of the United States.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain, as nearly as may be, the residences of the persons or corporations owning the bonds upon which said tax of one half of one per cent. shall be collected, and he shall thereby determine as accurately as is possible the amount of said tax paid by each State respectively through persons and corporations resident therein, which amount shall, by said Secretary, be paid over annually to the State from whose citizens and corporations the same was received. And such taxes shall be in lieu of all State, municipal, or local taxation on said "consolidated debt of the United States."

And be it further enacted, That the gradual reduction and final extinction of the said "consolidated debt of the United States" shall be accomplished in the following manner, to wit: All the taxes paid under the provisions of this act on bonds held or owned by persons and corporations not resident in the United States shall be applied annually to the payment and liquidation of the principal of said debt and to no other purpose, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall for ten years, from and after the passage of this act, redeem annually by purchase, in coin, $10,000,000 of said debt; from the tenth to the twentieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $20,000,000 annually; from the twentieth to the thirtieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $40,000,000 annually; from the thirtieth to the fortieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $60,000,000 annually; and from the fortieth to the fiftieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $80,000,000 annually, or until the whole of said debt is redeemed.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this amendment proposes to submit to the bondholders the simple proposition to change their six per cent. bonds without taxation for five per cent. bonds running fifty years with one half of one per cent. taxation. The amendment does not propose to put upon the market this consolidated debt of the United States, amounting to nearly two thousand million dollars, and using the proceeds to redeem the outstanding bonds. In this particular the amendment differs from the amendment of the Committee on Finance, which provides for exchanging these new bonds for the old bonds, or for using the proceeds of the new bonds to redeem the old ones. The amendment of the Committee on Finance necessarily raises the question whether the five-twenties shall be paid in gold or in greenbacks. My amendment avoids that disturbing question, a question upon which gentlemen of unquestioned capacity and character entertain widely different opinions. My amendment gives the bondholders the privilege, from its passage to the 1st day of January, 1870, of exchanging their bonds bearing an interest of six per cent. for bonds bearing an interest of five per cent. less one half of one per cent. taxation, and having fifty years to run.

There has been, and there will doubtless continue to be, unless we remedy it, much complaint that millions of dollars of active capital, invested in the bonds of the United States, are exempt from municipal or State taxation. In the dark and trying hours of the war the necessities of the nation imposed upon Congress the policy of exempting the bonds of the United States from taxation. It was clear to the comprehension of all that the exemption of these millions of capital, invested in the bonds of the Government, would work inequalities among those who bore the burdens of local taxation. Congress could not permit if it would the municipal or State authorities to tax the bonds of the United States, and thus impair if not destroy the credit of the Government. Congress could not, in those days of stern necessity, provide for the taxation of bonds, either for local or national purposes. But the pressing needs of the country are now over; the opportunity is now given us to consolidate our national debt upon new terms and conditions. It is in the power of Congress now to do something to equalize the burdens of State taxation. Many of the States, especially those east of the Alleghenies, owe large amounts for moneys borrowed to fill the ranks of the armies during the war. Hundreds of millions of bonds held in these States where local taxation bears heavily on the people escaped contributing anything toward the burdens of State taxation. By imposing upon the bondholders a tax of one half of one per cent., and paying over that tax to the treasuries of the States where the persons or corporations who hold the bonds reside or do business, Congress does something to equalize taxation and to lighten the burdens of the people. The inequalities of taxation and the burdens of taxation are greatest where the largest amounts of bonds are held. The taxes received upon the bonds held abroad go into the Treasury of the United States, and may be used toward paying the interest on or extinguishing the principal of the bonded debt.

Mr. HOWE. Would it not suit the purposes of the honorable Senator just as well to make the interest on the bonds four and a half per cent. and exempt them from taxation as to make it five and take out one half per cent?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Why not?

Mr. WILSON. I think the two thousand millions of active capital invested in the consolidated debt of the United States ought to pay something toward the support of the State governments. It is a source of complaint among the people that the money invested in Government bonds contributes nothing to the support of the schools, the poor, the roads, or to pay the county or State taxes. The inequalities of taxation in States or municipalities are in proportion to the amounts invested in Government securities. Those communities that came forward in the most prompt and patriotic manner during the war and furnished money to carry on the contest suffer most from the inequalities of taxation. Those sections of the country where many of the people believed the bonds of the Government were worthless, who would not invest in bonds themselves, and who advised their neighbors not to invest in Government securities, are burdened the least by the inequalities of taxation. I notice, however, that those persons who denounced greenbacks as wanderers and vagabonds like Cain, and who denounced the bonds of their country as worthless, who predicted the repudiation of the obligations of the Government, incurred for the preservation of the national existence, have the most now to say about the inequalities of taxation. I therefore propose that in funding anew the debt of the United States we do something to relieve the people of the States from the inequalities of taxation that press upon them.

I propose that the consolidated debt of the United States shall be paid mainly by the increasing population and wealth of the country. My amendment provides that the Secretary of the Treasury—shall for ten years, from and after the passage of this act, redeem annually by purchase in coin $10,000,000 of said debt; from the tenth to the twentieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $20,000,000 annually; from the twentieth to the thirtieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $40,000,000 annually; from the thirtieth to the fortieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $60,000,000 annually; and from the fortieth to the fiftieth year thereafter he shall in like manner redeem $80,000,000 annually, or until the whole of said debt is redeemed.

The property of the United States is now estimated to be $22,000,000,000. It is proposed to pay $10,000,000 annually for the next ten years; in 1878 the property of the United States will have increased to $37,466,000,000. From 1878 to 1888 it is proposed to pay $20,000,000 annually; in 1888 the property of the United States will have increased to $65,184,000,000. From 1888 to 1898 it is proposed to pay $40,000,000 annually; in 1898 the property of the United States will have increased to $114,824,000,000. From 1898 to 1908 it is proposed to pay $60,000,000 annually; in 1908 the property of the United States will have increased to $263,724,000,000. From 1908 to 1916 it is proposed to pay $80,000,000 annually; in 1916, forty-eight years hence, the property of the United States will have increased to $323,212,000,000, and our debt will have been extinguished. By this plan it is proposed to pay during the next twenty years only $300,000,000 of the $2,000,000,000 of the consolidated debt. The balance of the debt, amounting to $1,700,000,000, will be paid during the following twenty-eight years. Twenty years hence the property of the United States will have increased more than threefold, and the debt will have become a light burden, easy to be borne. Our national debt can easily be carried and easily extinguished if the nation is honest and if we make wise provisions for its payment.

TELLER OF THE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

Mr. FLANDERS introduced a joint resolution, (H. R. No. 334), on which he demanded the previous question.

The resolution was read. It provides that for the present Congress and commencing thereafter with the Clerk of the House is directed to pay from the contingent fund of the House to the messenger and acting teller in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House the difference between his present pay and the pay of the file and engrossing clerks of the House.

Mr. FLANDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is that in addition to the twenty per cent. which we have already increased it?

Mr. FLANDERS. I understand not.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand it does, and I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BENJAMIN rose to debate it, and the joint resolution, under the rules, went over.

SETTLERS ON CHEROKEE NEUTRAL LANDS.

Mr. CLEVER. I introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 335) for the protection of settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas, on which I demand the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians, made July 19, 1866, proclaimed August 11, 1866, there is a provision purporting to authorize a sale by the Secretary of the Interior of the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas, but which reserves from said lands having improvements of the value of fifty dollars, not being mineral and occupied by any person for agricultural purposes, and which gives to occupants the right to purchase one hundred and sixty acres each of said lands, under and by virtue of which about eight hundred families are provided for; and whereas between August 11, 1866, and June 6, 1868, about twenty-seven hundred additional families have settled on said Cherokee neutral lands, each family occupying one hundred and sixty acres, on which improvements have been made at an average cost of about five hundred and ten dollars, beside expenditures for living of $150 for each family, said settlement and improvements being made without objection from any source and on the faith that the settlers would be protected in the right to acquire title to said lands as other settlers on the public lands; and whereas on the 30th day of August, 1866, a contract was made by and between JAMES HARLAN, Secretary of the Interior, and the American Emigrant Company, for the sale of certain portions of said lands, which contract has been assigned by said company to James F. Joy, said contract and assignment being on file in the Department of the Interior; and whereas a supplemental treaty between the United States and said Cherokee Indians was made April 27, 1868, ratified June 6, and proclaimed June 10, 1868, all without any knowledge thereof by any of the persons occupying said lands, and which ratifies said contract with the American Emigrant Company and the assignment thereof to said Joy with certain modifications provided in said supplemental treaty, but which makes no provision for the protection of the persons or families who have settled upon and improved said lands, but purports to ratify a sale of said lands including the improvements thereon: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where any person, prior to June 10, 1868, shall have settled on any tract of land of one hundred and sixty acres or less, in the body of lands known as the Cherokee neutral lands, and shall have made improvements thereon of the value of fifty dollars, and occupied such tract for agricultural purposes, such person, his heirs or assigns, so occupying any such tract of land shall, after due proof made in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, be entitled to enter and receive a patent for the lands so occupied on paying $1 25 an acre within one year, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. And the money so to be paid for said lands shall be paid over to said Cherokee Indians.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know whether this legislation proposes to interfere with the treaty which was ratified by the Senate on the 6th of June last.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It proposes to protect twenty-seven hundred families who have settled on these lands and made improvements without objection, having expended each nearly one thousand dollars in improvements. We want to prevent them from being turned out of their possessions and deprived of their rights by a treaty which assumes to dispose of public lands without the authority of Congress. The facts in relation to this preamble and resolution are perhaps sufficiently stated therein in view of the debates already had in this House; but I may say a few words as to the duty and power to pass the resolution. On the 31st December, 1838, a patent was issued to the Cherokee nation of Indians for the Cherokee neutral lands. This patent was issued in pursuance of a treaty and on the authority of the act of Congress of May 28, 1830, which, however, provided that—"Such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct or abandon the same."

By treaty of July 19, 1866, proclaimed August 11, 1866, the Cherokees ceded to the United States these lands in trust to be sold for not less than one dollar an acre, reserving to actual settlers on the lands on the 11th August, 1866, the right to purchase the lands by them occupied at an appraisement therein provided for. In pursuance of this treaty, Secretary HARLAN made a sale of the lands not occupied by settlers to the American Emigrant Company, August 30, 1866. Secretary Browning claiming this sale to be invalid, on the 9th October, 1867, sold the same lands to James F. Joy. The emigrant company, to settle the conflict, assigned their contract to Joy. By a supplemental treaty, made April 27, ratified June 6, and proclaimed June 10, 1868, this assignment and sale are confirmed. Between August 11, 1866, and June 6, 1868, some twenty-seven hundred families settled each upon one hundred and sixty acres of these lands and made large improvements, and yet this sale and supplemental treaty profess to sell out their lands, improvements, and all without compensation, and leaving the settlers to be turned out of possession or to buy their lands at such prices as may be imposed on them by Mr. Joy. I object to the sale to Joy because it is unjust to the settlers; I object to it because it is made upon the authority of a treaty; and this House has again and again declared a treaty cannot authorize a sale of public lands. The sale to Joy is void. But if a sale could be authorized by treaty, the sale in this case is void. The treaty purports to cede the lands to the United States in trust to sell them. The execution of a trust cannot be provided for by treaty; and, at all events, it can be regulated by law; and the joint resolution before us is a mere regulation of the execution of the trust, or its execution by law. I have said that the treaty professes to cede a title to the United States in trust; but the Indians have no title to cede. The title of all public lands is in the United States. The Indians only have a possessory right. If it be said the Cherokees had a patent, I answer, the patent was granted in pursuance of a treaty which could not convey the legal title. So far as any title rests on the act of Congress of May 22, 1830, the act expressly provides that the title shall revert to the United States when the lands are abandoned by the Cherokees, as they have been. The fifth section of the Indian appropriation act of March 3, 1863, confers no authority to sell public lands by treaty. If the Indians by treaty can sell the title to lands they occupy or even as tribes acquire title, then they may sell to foreign nations, which never will be permitted. The Indian tribes are not nations in the sense of the treaty-making power. If it be said this joint resolution violates Joy's contract, I answer, his contract is unauthorized and void. Congress may disregard it and contracts still more valid when the public interests require it. For the purpose of doing justice the resolution now before us was introduced at my instance to-day, as it was a week ago, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I always believed this was an outrage, but it ought to have been corrected at some time prior to the confirmation of the treaty.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It can be corrected now, as I can prove to the satisfaction of anybody.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAXATION AND THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1425) to equalize taxation and reduce the interest on the public debt; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the bill be reported.

The bill was accordingly read in full. It provides that upon all gains, profits, and income arising from the bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, payable to any person, State, municipality, body politic or corporate, company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of the Treasury of the United States there shall be charged yearly as a tax for every $100 thereon ten dollars, and for a lesser sum in the same proportion. Said tax shall be assessed and collected by the Treasurer or other disbursing officers of the United States charged with paying any of the interest upon the debt of the United States in the same currency in which said interest is paid, and said tax shall be instead of all other taxes assessed or levied as tax upon income from any of the interest-bearing securities of the United States.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on page 185 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed on the day on which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House."

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, this bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. This does not propose a tax on the people, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes it is a tax on the people. Tax bills, tariff bills, and money bills are required by this rule to be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of considering the bill in the House at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The rules cannot be suspended during the morning hour. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

PROTECTION OF LIFE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. ORTH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1426) for the better protection of life in the Navy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

GREAT AND LITTLE OSAGE INDIAN TREATY.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I offer the following preamble and resolution, upon which I demand the previous question:

Whereas on the 13th day of June, 1868, the House of Representatives adopted a resolution relating to the treaty lately concluded with the Great and Little Osage Indians, in the following words, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to furnish to this House copies of all instructions, records, and correspondence connected with the commission authorized to make the above-named treaty, and copies of all propositions made to said commission from railroad corporations or by individuals, and the President is requested to withhold said treaty from the Senate, or if sent to the Senate to withdraw the same, until a full investigation can be had and report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House."

And whereas on the 15th day of June, 1868, the President, in reply to said resolution, transmitted to this House a message and a report from the Secretary of the Interior purporting to give the information requested; and whereas the said report of the Secretary of the Interior did not contain all the records, correspondence, and propositions connected with the commission authorized to make said treaty; and whereas the chairman of said commission was Hon. N. G. Taylor, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and a subordinate officer of the Interior Department; and whereas a portion of the records of said commission must have been suppressed by said officer if the Secretary of the Interior is correct in the statement that "no propositions made to said commission from railroad corporations or by individuals have come to the knowledge or possession of this Department." Therefore,

Resolved, That the President is again respectfully requested to furnish to this House copies of all instructions, records, and correspondence connected with the commission authorized to negotiate the late treaty with the Great and Little Osage Indians, and copies of all propositions made to said commission from railroad corporations or by individuals.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know that there is any objection to the furnishing of the information called for by the resolution, but it seems to me that the language of the preamble is hardly respectful to the Secretary of the Interior. The use of such word as "suppressed" is hardly appropriate.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Can I have an opportunity of making a statement to the House?

The SPEAKER. If debate arises, the resolution goes over under the rules.

Mr. BROOKS. I must object to the resolution unless it is put in a different shape.

The SPEAKER. The resolution being a call for executive information, it must go over if any gentleman objects.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I will modify the resolution by inserting the words "it is believed;" so that it will read: "And whereas it is believed the said report of the Secretary of the Interior did not contain all the records," &c. I will also strike out the word "suppressed" and insert "withheld."

Mr. BROOKS. Then I withdraw my objection.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINNESOTA LAND GRANT.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 333) to protect the existing land grant of the Minnesota valley railroad, in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DONNELLY. I demand the previous question.

The joint resolution, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to permit to be filed in the proper office the plat of the location of the Minnesota valley railroad through unsurveyed lands of the United States within the State of Minnesota; and from the date of such filing he shall withdraw from settlement all such lands as would, if such lands were surveyed, inure to the State of Minnesota for the benefit of said road.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. What necessity is there for this resolution? If the lands are unsurveyed, how can they be brought into market?

Mr. DONNELLY. I would ask consent to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending the call for the previous question, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 16, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Mr. DONNELLY. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] will withdraw his objection for two minutes, I can explain this resolution so that there will be no objection to it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I insist upon my objection.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DONNELLY and Mr. MULLINS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes five, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to debate the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution giving rise to debate goes over under the rule.

REFINING OF BULLION.

Mr. WINDOM. At the request of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] I introduce the joint resolution I send to the Clerk's desk, and I ask the previous question upon it.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 337) continuing the refining of bullion in the Mint of the United States and branches was then read a first and second time.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that the Mint of the United States and branches shall continue to refine gold and silver bullion, but no contract to exchange crude or unparted bullion for refined bars shall be made until authorized by law; and section five of the act of March 3, 1853, and section three of the act of February 20, 1861, shall be repealed.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. AXTELL. As a member of the Committee on Coins, Weights, and Measures, this subject having been before that committee this session, I ask unanimous consent to speak upon this joint resolution for five minutes.

Mr. DELANO. I have no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

Mr. AXTELL. I desire to inform the House that this subject has been before the Committee on Coins, Weights, and Measures, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] is the chairman, and we were unwilling to report any such measure to the House.

Mr. BROOKS. Would it not be in order to move to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order, except by reconsidering the vote ordering the main question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the joint resolution should pass.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and upon a division there were—ayes 36, noes 66.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BROOKS. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays. While the yeas and nays are being taken, we may be able to find out what the joint resolution is about.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. AXTELL. Would it be in order to have the sections read which it is proposed to have repealed by this joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It would not, for it would be in the nature of debate.

The question was then taken upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 95, nays 34, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Boies, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Driggs, Eckley, Eli, Eliot, Fields, French, Garfield, Hamilton, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Hulburd, Alexander H. NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Cary, Chandler, Dixon, Eldridge, Ferriss, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Higby, Jenckes, Knott, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Alden, and Van Trump—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Dewesse, Dodge, Dannelly, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsley, Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Twitchell, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, John T. Wilson, Wood, and Woodard—69.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 1284) to change and more effectually secure the collection of internal revenue on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to amend the tax on banks, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORRILL of Vermont, and Mr. BUCKALEW conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 139) excluding from the Electoral College votes of States lately in rebellion which shall not have been reorganized.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has this resolution been before the Committee of Elections?

Mr. HIGBY. The Committee of Elections are unanimously in favor of it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then let them report it. I move that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order if the previous question should not be seconded.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Elections to state whether the committee has not acted on this resolution?

Mr. COOK. As a member of the committee, I will state that the Committee of Elections have agreed to this resolution.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 50, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. Higby and Mr. Ashley of Ohio.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 58.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. This resolution has been before the Committee of Elections, and it has been unanimously agreed to.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution then goes over under the rules.

CIVIL-SERVICE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the House now resumes the consideration of the motion pending at the adjournment last Monday, that the rules be suspended so as to make the civil-service bill the special order as soon as the general appropriation bills are disposed of, and not to interfere with the tax bill.

Mr. JENCKES. I yield for a moment to gentlemen to introduce bills.

ARKANSAS TAX COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back Senate bill No. 564, concerning the tax commissioners for the State of Arkansas, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that all acts and proceedings which have been had or performed by any two of the tax commissioners in and for the State of Arkansas, shall have the same force and effect as if had and performed by the three of said commissioners.

Mr. SCHENCK. This is a Senate bill, and provides that the action of two commissioners where the other was sick and did not reach the place shall be legal. The committee recommend that it pass as it came from the Senate.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The bill contains nothing but post routes. It provides for no general legislation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. PILE. I desire to present the petition of the National Board of Trade, which met several weeks ago in Philadelphia, and ask that it be ordered to be printed in the Globe, as it is an important paper relating to the Mississippi river.

It was ordered accordingly. The petition, which is as follows, was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

SECRETARY AND TREASURER'S OFFICE.

BOSTON, June 6, 1868.

Whereas a bill is now pending before Congress having for its object the granting of a charter to certain individuals for the purpose of constructing a canal or channel through Pass l'Oute, one of the outlets of the Mississippi river to the sea, with the right to collect tonnage dues or toll from all vessels making use of the same; and whereas the imposition of such a tax would be a serious detriment to the carrying trade of the country by necessarily increasing the cost of transportation on the products and manufactures of all sections: Therefore,
Be it resolved, 1. That the Mississippi river, being a national highway, should always be kept free from its highest navigable point to its outlet, and no charge of any nature whatever should ever be exacted from the shipping navigating its waters.

2. That Congress be respectfully requested to refuse the passage of any such bill as is referred to in the preamble.

3. That Congress be requested to pass a bill providing for the removal of all obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi river and its tributaries, the work to be done under the direction of Government officers, and not, as heretofore, by contract.

The above were unanimously adopted at the first meeting of the National Board of Trade, held in the city of Philadelphia, on the 6th of June, 1868.

F. HALEY, President.

Attest: HAMILTON A. HILL, Secretary.

FEES TO CONSULAR AGENTS.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 328) exonerating certain vessels of the United States from the payment of tonnage fees to consular agents in Canada. It meets with the approval of the Committee on Commerce.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was read a first and second time. It provides that no consul or consular agent shall exact tonnage fees from any vessel of the United States touching at one or more ports in Canada on her regular voyage from one port to another in the United States, unless said consul or consular agent shall perform some official service required by law for such vessel when she shall thus touch at a Canadian port.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR PAPERS IN EVIDENCE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from the Treasury Department in relation to making certain consular papers record evidence in courts of justice. It is a matter of importance, and will be of great convenience in the trial of cases in which the United States is interested. I ask, therefore, to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of the copies of certain papers, documents, and entries.

The bill was reported. It provides that copies of any and all papers and documents filed or remaining in the office of any consul, vice consul, or commercial agent of the United States, and of any and all entries in the books or records of any such office, shall, when certified under the hand and official seal of the proper consul, vice consul, or commercial agent, be admissible in evidence in all courts of the United States, and shall have, as evidence, the same force and effect as the original papers, documents, or entries.

The Clerk read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Solicitor's Office, July 11, 1868.

SIR: Inconvenience sometimes arises from the want of a provision making properly certified copies of consular papers and records evidence in our courts. I have, therefore, prepared a short bill supplying this defect, which I herewith inclose, and I have the honor to request that, if it meets the approval of your committee, you will report it to the House of Representatives, with a view to its passage by that body.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
EDWARD JORDAN,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, Chairman Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

The bill was read a first and second time, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1429) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization," passed April 14, 1802; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT STOCK IN CANALS, ETC.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of the property of the United States in certain canals and navigation companies, wherein the United States hold stock, which have for many years been non-interest paying.

PENSION BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Senate have asked for a committee of conference on nine pension bills, the amendments being verbal. If there is no objection the House will reciprocate the request.

No objection was made; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. PERHAM, VAN AERNAM, and BEATTY.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 567, relative to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance. I have the authority of the committee to which it would be referred to move that it be considered in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. ELIOT. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not yield the floor for that.

OUTRAGES IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. ARNELL. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas outrages, assassinations, and murders of unparalleled atrocity continue to be perpetrated at the South upon law-abiding and unoffending Unionists by bands of masked and armed desperadoes, in such numbers and to such extent as to terrify whole communities and paralyze labor in its lawful and peaceful avocations:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Government to extend full and ample protection to all its faithful, loyal citizens at the South, white and colored, and that a special committee, to consist of three members of this House, be appointed to investigate these alleged outrages; and said committee is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers, and to report to this House, with all reasonable dispatch, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. I object only to the latter part—the appointment of a committee.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to the whole. I have information of some thirty or forty outrages in Minnesota and Illinois—awful outrages.

EVENING SESSIONS FOR DEBATE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Gentlemen around me desire that there may be an evening session for debate every night this week. I therefore move that evening sessions be ordered at half past seven o'clock during the week.

Mr. RANDALL. With the understanding that no vote is to be taken?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No business whatever—just a speaking school.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE TO PRINT REMARKS.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, asked and obtained consent to print a speech on the question of the purchase of Alaska. [It will be published in the Appendix.]

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House testimony, &c., in the case of the election contest of Jones vs. Mann, second congressional district of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

FINES ON MAIL CONTRACTORS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in compliance with the act of July 2, 1836, a report of fines imposed and deductions made from the pay of contractors for carrying the mails of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SCHOOL TRUSTEES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of a mass meeting of citizens of Washington, protesting against the passage by the House of Representatives of the Senate bill transferring the duties of trustees of colored schools to the trustees of white schools; which were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CIVIL-SERVICE BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules for the purpose of considering the civil-service bill. The effect of the motion would be to bring the bill before the House now, neither the appropriation bills nor the tax bill being pending.

Mr. WELKER. I would like to have the motion read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Suspend the rules so as to make the civil service bill a special order as soon as the general appropriation bills are disposed of, and not to interfere with the tax bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I would ask the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] if he did not intend to put in the tariff bill?

Mr. JENCKES. No, sir.

Mr. WELKER. I hope the rules will not be suspended.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 70, noes 49.

Mr. JENCKES called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. PIKE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 68, nays 62, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Beck, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Roderick R. Butler, Cary, Chandler, Cook, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Eila, Eliot, Ferriss, French, Garfield, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Higby, Hooper, Hulburd, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. MAYNARD stated, during the roll-call, that he was paired on this question with Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. BENJAMIN asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers of Robert V. Keller, copies to be left on the file.

WASHINGTON TARGET-SHOOTING ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-shooting Association in the District of Columbia, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the "Washington Target-shooting Association" in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the said bill, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out of said amendment, after the word "provided," in the first line, the following words: "The amount of real property or estate to be held by the said association shall not exceed in value the sum of $50,000; and provided further that."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN D. BALDWIN,

M. WELKER,

A. J. GLOSSERENNER,

Managers on the part of the House.

JAMES HARLAN,

GEORGE VICKERS,

ROSCOE CONKLING,

The report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUTRO TUNNEL.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that the rules be suspended in order that I may have an opportunity to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House will hold an evening session on Tuesday evening, at half past seven o'clock, for the purpose of receiving and considering the report of the Committee on the Public Lands on the Sutro tunnel.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope not; that is nothing but a huge gambling operation.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was not agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT. I move that the rules be suspended, for the purpose of taking from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 567, relating to the Freedmen's Bureau, and providing for its discontinuance, in order that it may be considered at the present time.

Mr. BROOKS. I think I must call the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules unless some time can be allowed to discuss this bill. I know it will be passed; but I would prefer to have a little discussion on it.

Mr. ELIOT. If the gentleman desires to discuss this bill for ten minutes, I will consent to yield that time to him.

Mr. BROOKS. That is a great deal of time; we are usually allowed one minute. We are profoundly grateful to the gentleman for his generosity.

The question was upon the motion to suspend the rules in order to take the Freedmen's Bureau bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. ELIOT. If the bill can be considered as before the House, I will yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.]

No objection was made, and the bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The first section of the bill, which was read, provides that the duties and powers of the Commissioner of the Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees shall continue to be discharged by the present Commissioner of the bureau, and in case of vacancy in said office occurring by reason of his death or resignation the same shall be filled by appointment of the President on the nomination of the Secretary of War, and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and no officer of the Army shall be detailed for service as Commissioner or shall enter upon the duties of Commissioner unless appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all assistant commissioners shall be appointed by the Secretary of War on the nomination of the Commissioner of the bureau. In case of vacancy in the office of Commissioner happening during the recess of the Senate the duties of Commissioner shall be discharged by the acting assistant adjutant general of the bureau until such vacancy can be filled.

The second section provides that the Commissioner of the bureau shall, on the 1st day of January next, cause the said bureau to be withdrawn from the several States within which said bureau has acted and its operations discontinued as soon as the same may be done without injury to the Government. But the educational department of the said bureau and the collection and payment of moneys due the soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, shall be continued as now provided by law until otherwise ordered by act of Congress.

Mr. ELIOT. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] for ten minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. I have hardly had time to read this bill sufficiently to fully understand it. But it is presumed that we know all about it, by a sort of happy instinct, so that it is hardly necessary to discuss it or to know anything about the scope and effect of it. This bill turns up in the House for the first time this morning, and will be put upon its passage and made a law, so far as this House can make it a law, within twenty-five or thirty minutes at the furthest. We do business by steam, at high pressure, at the speed of a locomotive in full course, sixty and sometimes eighty miles an hour. Put into plain English, this bill, as I understand it, creates General Howard supreme and absolute sovereign over the affairs of the Freedmen's Bureau so long as he may choose to continue at its head, without any interference upon the part of the President or the Secretary of War. It makes him entire master and controller of the bureau. This bill provides that:

No officer of the Army shall be detailed for service as commissioner or shall enter upon the duties of commissioner unless appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and all assistant commissioners, agents, clerks, and assistants shall be appointed by the Secretary of War, on the nomination of the commissioner of the bureau.

Thus this bill, as I have said, makes General Howard supreme in all his appointments. I believe it has been established in a speech made by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BOYER] that, notwithstanding the declaration of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] that this bureau has cost but $6,000,000 a year, the actual cost is $15,000,000. I ask my friend from Pennsylvania whether I am right?

Mr. BOYER. From some investigation which I have made in relation to the expenses of the Freedmen's Bureau, I verily believe that the annual cost of the bureau is at least $15,000,000 a year.

Mr. BROOKS. So that, in point of fact, the sum of $15,000,000 annually is confided to the absolute and supreme disposal of General Howard. I do not know how honest this General Howard may be; but this is too much money and too much power to be put at the disposal of any one man. General Howard's prosperity has been wonderful. This, it is said, has arisen from the contributions of individuals and societies; but, however that may be, I can only say that he has in course of erection on one of the beautiful hills adjacent to this city one of the most palatial residences to be seen in this or any other city of the Union. The second section provides in the beginning for the discontinuance of the bureau on the 1st of January next; but that provision is afterward nullified by the words "as soon as the same may be done without injury to the Government." The provision is in these words:

That the commissioner of the bureau shall, on the 1st day of January next, cause the said bureau to be withdrawn from the several States within which said bureau has acted, and its operations discontinued, as soon as the same may be done without injury to the Government.

Who is to judge of this "injury to the Government?" General Howard. And it is not likely that General Howard will ever think it for the interest of the Government to discontinue this bureau so long as he may be at the head of it. But even if the bureau could be discontinued without, in General Howard's estimation, "injury to the Government," the bill makes the following provision:

But the educational department of the said bureau, and the collection and payment of moneys due the soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, shall be continued as now provided by law, until otherwise ordered by act of Congress.

So that this bill, pretending to be a discontinuance of the Freedmen's Bureau, provides in reality for its continuance and perpetuation, subject only to the future action of Congress. I object, therefore, to the bill as deceptive in its provisions. It is not an abolition or a discontinuance of the bureau, but its prolongation and permanent establishment until repealed by further action of Congress. The bill contains this additional provision:

Provided, however, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any State which shall not, on the 1st of January next, be restored to its former political relations with the Government of the United States, and be entitled to representation in Congress.

Who is to judge of this restoration to "former political relations" and the right to representation in Congress? Is this to be determined by General Howard, or by the two Houses of Congress and the President of the United States? The bill contains no exposition, no declaration whatever on this subject. My objection to this proviso is that under it, in such States as Mississippi, Texas, and Virginia, and other States that may not be restored to their "former political relations," this bureau is to be continued indefinitely until the two Houses of Congress shall repeal the act. Here is a bill which in the beginning pretends to discontinue the Freedmen's Bureau, but in the end provides for its continuance through all time in certainly three States of the Union, unless the commissioner of the bureau or the two Houses of Congress should hereafter otherwise determine. Sir, we may disguise this matter of the Freedmen's Bureau as we please, it is nothing but an electioneering machine from the beginning to end. It is the contrivance of this Congress to manipulate, control, regulate, and dominate the southern States of this Union in order to keep those States subject to this Congress. Through the agency of this Freedmen's Bureau the northern people have heavy additions to their burdens of taxation. The northern people, who pay $1 25 per pound for tea, the people who buy sugar, the people who buy coffee, the people who are taxed in every form, are taxed for the support of the Freedmen's Bureau. It is to affect the elections of the South, to manipulate and control the southern States; and it costs, not the $1,500,000 as pretended here, not the $6,000,000, as alleged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] but the $15,000,000 proved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER.] This enormous sum is to be imposed upon the tax-ridden dupes of the North, tools of the North in that respect. We are to be ground to powder by taxation solely for the purpose of keeping up northern electioneering agents in ten States of the South to manipulate and control elections in those States.

Mr. PIKE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BROOKS. Not out of my time. My time is precious.

Mr. ELIOT. How much longer does the gentleman ask?

Mr. BROOKS. Five minutes.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield five minutes longer to the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. Why not move that it shall expire on the 1st of November or December next, when this Congress reassembles? Why have it expire at some indefinite time? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is generally frank in his political maneuvers. I will not use those words, but in his political manipulations and intentions. Why not, if he intends to end this bureau, end it December 1, in a frank and honorable way, instead of these ambiguous terms extending it over all time. And I tell the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] he may as well end this Freedmen's Bureau at one time as another. Our northern countrymen, our western countrymen, cannot longer manipulate and control the negroes of the South. There is an instinct even higher than intelligence and education, because it is God given. The instinct of the negro is at last discovering that he is being used, as his donkey or mule or his horse is used, by northern adventurers for the purpose of riding into the capital of the United States from the plantations of the South. The Freedmen's Bureau had as well be ended at first as at last. Its day is over, or nearly over, and it will be hardly able to manipulate the negroes during the election. The instinct of the negro has discovered at last, as in Mississippi and southern Georgia, what is the object and intent of this Freedmen's Bureau, and there soon will be an end to it throughout the southern States. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for the opportunity he has given me, so seldom given to my side of the House.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask leave to offer an amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMS. Allow it to be reported?

Mr. ELIOT. I will hear it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause in section two, and insert the following:

That said bureau shall be immediately withdrawn and discontinued in all the States now represented in Congress, and shall be discontinued in the remaining States, as soon as they shall be restored to their former political relations with the Government of the United States.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman allow me five minutes to state why that amendment should be adopted?

Mr. ELIOT. There is no use, as I could not let the amendment be offered. The gentleman from Kentucky is opposed to the Freedmen's Bureau. He has been consistently opposed to it from the beginning, and I do not know but if I were in his situation and represented the political feelings he does on the general subjects embraced in the bureau I should feel as he does. I have been familiar also with the opinions of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] From the inception of the bureau to the present time he has been one of its most bitter opponents.

Now, sir, there have been some things said by the gentleman from New York which I heard indistinctly, but to which I propose to reply briefly. It is of no use, so far as the gentleman and his political associates are concerned, for me to state again, as I have before, the precise expense which this bureau has been to the Treasury of the United States; because these same old stories are reiterated which have been commenced at the White House and echoed through the Democratic prints, that the expenses of the bureau have ranged from ten to twenty million dollars. Sir, on the 1st of January last, every dollar that had come out of the Treasury for the support of this bureau, from its commencement, was between three and four million dollars, beside the amount of stores and clothing issued from the quartermaster's department. In the bill passed in July, 1866, no appropriation at all in money was made. From the first inception of the bureau down to the present hour there has not been an appropriation by Congress of a sum equal to the smallest amount that the gentlemen have charged against it as its annual cost.

I wish to say in this connection that besides the speech which I had the honor to make here some time ago I took a great deal of care and pains to prepare a report upon this subject, showing the precise expenses and the operation of the bureau under General Howard; showing the good it had done and the evil it had prevented. Gentlemen will find in the folding room at their credit some twenty or thirty copies of that report, in which I assure them they will find material to answer all the charges which have been made against this bureau on account of its expenses. They will find moreover that, had it not been for the unprecedented and unexpected animosity which the measure received at the hands of the Executive, by the provision which was made in the first bill all the expenses that the bureau could have charged upon the treasury of the United States could have been paid out of funds which should have been appropriated to the bureau from rebel sources. It was designed that the rebellion which created the war should pay for the whole expense of this bureau, and that would have been the case but for the fact that the rebels, pardoned and unpardoned, with their hands red with the blood of Union men, property by the thousand was turned over by the President taken from the bureau under whose charge it was, in order that the expenses might be thus defrayed.

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] will pardon me for saying he has made a statement unjust, unfair, and untrue against the gentleman who now holds the office of Commissioner of this bureau, because he has recently been building a house for himself in the city of Washington. I do not, of course, impute to him the making of a statement that he does not believe. But, sir, I do not believe there can be found a man more upright in his dealing than the Commissioner of this bureau. I have known him long. I believe him to be a man of high integrity, and one of the last that would permit himself to be made richer by a single dollar from the public money that does not legitimately belong to him from the salary he receives as a major general of the Army.

Sir, when General Howard went into the Army he had a few thousand dollars. During the existence of the war he by great economy saved a few thousand dollars more out of which he has built a house, putting in it all he has, and being compelled to give security, as I understand, for the payment of the full indebtedness. General Howard has laid on the battle-field of his country his right arm, and I believe he would consign the other in companionship with it before he would permit himself to be a party to any transaction involving a taint of pecuniary fraud. It is not fair because of certain personal hostilities which have grown up against him in the church with which he is connected, about which I do not propose to speak, that gentlemen ordinarily so careful should throw out slurs and reproach upon his private character. Gentlemen should not permit themselves to be organs of communication through this House to the country of stories like that to which allusion was made.

As regards the remark of the gentleman from New York in reference to the proviso contained in the printed bill, I will say to him that the bill on the Speaker's table does not contain that proviso. It was stricken out in the Senate, although it was reported to the Senate by the committee; so that the bill stands free from that objectionable feature—objectionable in the view of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS]—although I believe myself that the provision was wise and proper. The gentleman complains that this bill provides for the termination of the bureau. It is very well known that when the first law was passed creating it it was designed in its nature to be temporary. Why, sir, if it had not been for Andrew Johnson and those who have supported him the bureau would have ceased to exist before this time. It would have discharged all its work. It has been opposed and hindered at every step. That it has encountered the animosity of gentlemen from the southern States, such men as Wade Hampton and Forrest; that it has encountered the opposition of such men as General Rousseau of Kentucky, and all those men who were disposed to crush down the negro and permit the rebel to control now, after defeat in the field, as he did control before in council, I am not surprised. But I apprehend that there are gentlemen now on this floor who, if it were needful, would come to the rescue of this bureau and would show that the loyal men—the loyal white men in the South—have had no agency like that of this bureau to sustain them at home in their strife and struggle with rebels. This bill peremptorily terminates the life of the bureau on the 1st of January. It is believed that under existing circumstances it would not be safe or prudent for the operations of this bureau to be discontinued at an earlier day than that. We were disposed to let the country see that although this measure in its character was temporary, although it has been continued against our desires, because of the animosity which has been exercised toward it, the hostility shown to it by the Executive and his friends, yet that we were disposed at the very first moment practicable to withdraw its operations, leaving the fate of the negroes and of the loyal whites in the hands of their own respective States.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the gentleman to say that the bureau is to be absolutely withdrawn on the 1st day of January. I suggest that it would be better to strike out the words "as soon as the same may be done without injury to the Government." I think that may not be quite clear.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will agree to that amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. The object of those words is simply this: if the provision is peremptory that on the 1st of January it shall be withdrawn, no fact, however important to the Government, could permit it to continue another day. I will consent, however, to the amendment being offered.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move to strike out the words "as soon as the same may be done without injury to the Government." That will require the Commissioner to withdraw the bureau absolutely on the 1st of January.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ARNELL.]

Mr. ARNELL. I hope sincerely that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will not prevail, and in order to show the necessity for the continuance of the bureau, and that it is best that the time of its withdrawal should be left indefinite, I ask the Clerk to read an article from one of the Nashville papers received to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Ku-Klux—Murders, robberies, and outrages by the Klan—School teaching and Bible reading proscribed.

Accounts reach us from Giles, Marshall, Hamilton, and Bedford counties of fresh outrages perpetrated by the Ku-Klux on colored people. The horrors practiced by these wretches grow more intensely black every day. They roam through the country and perpetrate their crimes with apparent impunity and a satanic determination and disregard of consequences perfectly appalling.

From Giles county a dozen or more colored men arrived yesterday morning by way of the Alabama railway. Their narrative of suffering is heartrending. They all have families depending on them, are farmers who cultivated pieces of land, and were just housing their crops. They had from thirty to fifty acres each under cultivation, besides other little property in the way of stock. They are men rugged and knotted up with ceaseless toil in an up-hill struggle, not only to make a little for future contingencies, but even to make bread wherewith to live. Honest laborers, out in the fields from early dawn to dewy eve, earning, as they simply express it, "meat and clothes for their little ones." They all lived in the neighborhood of Cornersville, about twelve miles from Pulaski, in Giles county.

A Mr. J. Clark, a very mild and gentlemanly man, who used to teach school down there, was compelled to quit by the persecuting members of the Klan. He is even afraid to write about their doings. George Bose, a colored teacher, had a prosperous school of over forty children, was also compelled to give up his school, and is now in town. The Klan is represented as being perfectly reckless, and the house of one widow Gordon, twelve miles from Pulaski, and five from Cornersville, is said to be the headquarters. They meet there almost nightly, and hold deliberations and plan their infernal work of blood. The wives and families of these colored fugitives are now in the woods living in the best manner they can. They, too, are driven out of their houses. Giles county needs purging.

Assassination of the Registration Commissioner of Overton County.

Editor Press and Times:

On the 1st day of July five armed men appeared before the dwelling house of James Francis, commissioner of registration for Overton county, and pointing their guns in at the windows demanded his surrender. On being informed by Mrs. Francis that her husband was not at the house, they proceeded to search the premises, took what arms they could find, and such other articles as they chose to appropriate.

By this time some confederates, who had concealed themselves on the farm, called to them to "come on, they had him." At this the ruffians left, taking their booty. A short time after they were gone Mrs. F. heard two guns fire, and supposing her husband had been shot, she and two neighboring women followed in the direction of the firing. Directly they heard other guns, and in a few minutes twenty or more shots were fired. Continuing to follow the trail she came upon a waste-house in an old field, some mile or more from her house, where she found her husband lying dead. His hands were tied, and he was literally riddled with bullet-holes.

Marshall County.

A letter from Marshall county of the 1st gives a fearful account of the resurrected rebels in that district:

MARSHALL COUNTY, July 1.

We have gathered some further particulars about the cruel intentions of those infamous wretches, the Ku-Kluxers, or resurrected rebels, as they call themselves. On the night of the 15th of June those infamous wretches went to the house of Mr. Lewis Strickland and abused him, and wore him out in calculations were to serve in a like manner the person of Berryman Scales, Mr. Willis, and also R. Royster, for the sole cause of boarding a teacher at his house. They expressed an intention to hang Mr. Jenkins for his habit of reading the Bible to those of his own race, thereby making them as wise as the white men, as they allege. Mr. Jenkins is the minister in this vicinity and is worthy of protection. He is allowed to preach but once a month. Five hard-working, honest citizens were dragged out of their beds in the night and maltreated in the most shocking manner. While the whipping was being done the cause given for it was that he voted for Brownlow, and if he did not vote the Conservative ticket next time he would be killed. John Street, one of the officers of Chapel Hill, openly declared that there never has been any peace, and that they only retired awhile to rest and gather force for another rebellion. The son of another squire has been engaged in these night law-breaking and citizen-terrifying expeditions. He had his right arm wounded. Three of the Klan have been wounded, one mortally, but they are busily recruiting, and have an immense amount of guns and revolvers, and they swear they will fight again. There is a regular war here between the whites and blacks.

Outrages in Bedford county.

SHELBYVILLE, July 7, 1868.

Editor Press and Times:

The facts are simply these: Mr. Dunlap is a northern or western man, first sent here by some society to teach the colored people. He has been in our midst three or four years, leading a quiet, unobtrusive life, well qualified to teach, devoted and correct in the work. He has never attempted to force himself upon the notice of the white people, but has attended to his own business, offering no contempt or insult, nor permitting it to be done by his pupils toward any person, but, on the contrary, as some of our best conservative citizens are ready to testify, readily and promptly rebuked and corrected any inproprieties on their part that came to his knowledge or were suggested to him. He has been honest, upright, and just in all his dealings with white and black since he has been here. He has had no quarrels or difficulties with any one so far as known to us.

He was here during the cholera scourge of the fall of 1866, and Hon. Edmund Cooper has testified in public speeches that he kindly and faithfully waited upon the sick and dying, and was of great help to him in discharging his charities and benevolence to the poor and needy where most others fled the dreadful plague.

On the 4th of July, Mr. Dunlap, as he had done on former occasions, formed a procession of his large school, and under the school banners and stars and stripes, marched around the square and out to the grounds of Hon. William H. Wisner, where they had a large gathering and pic-nic. They sang, danced, and celebrated the glorious Fourth in a social gathering of their own race principally. Enough whites were present, the writer among the number, to testify that there was no disorderly conduct, profane swearing, or dissipation upon the ground.

After night, and when many had retired to repose, no friend of law, order, and peace dreaming of a raid from the Ku-Klux, they made their appearance on the square, about fifty in number, mounted on caparisoned horses, revolver in hand and whistle in mouth, and proceeded directly to Mr. Dunlap's house. He shut the door in their faces. They fired a shot into the house; forced the doors; promised to spare his life if he surrendered; disarmed him of his pistol, (and still have it,) and made him mount behind one of them.

They then went to the house of Jim Franklin, a colored man, and found him in bed; made him follow them. They returned to the square, gave three cheers for Andrew Johnson, and proceeding a short distance from town, stripped and whipped their victims with a strap most unmercifully, cruelly, and shamefully, and discharged them, with orders to Dunlap to leave immediately, or his life would be taken.

The supposed offense of the colored man was that he wore the sash of a marshal. Threats were made against others, and the brave and gallant troop left, no doubt vastly proud of their achievements.

LEWIS TILLMAN.

Mr. ARNELL. I desire to state that in Middle Tennessee the only guardian for these colored persons that is capable of ferreting out these outrages and bringing them to public notice is this much-abused bureau. I hold in my hand two sworn statements from ex-Federal soldiers, who did gallant service in the Army.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELIOT. I now ask for a vote on the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Is this bill to be pressed through without allowing the minority of the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs to say a word upon it?

Mr. ELIOT. I will yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] on the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the cost of the Freedmen's Bureau, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] has time and time again asserted in this House that only about three million dollars have been drawn from the Treasury for the purpose of supporting the operations of this bureau. Now, sir, I am prepared to prove to this House, if I had time, that this bureau has actually cost the Government, not in money appropriated and taken from the Treasury, but from various sources, taken altogether, the sum of $16,000,000 up to the 1st of January last. I have never seen the statement which the gentleman from Massachusetts has made in his report; but he has made the statement in the House, and repeated it time and time again, that only about three million dollars have been taken from the Treasury for this bureau. That statement was intended to leave upon the House and the country the impression that the entire cost of this bureau has been only $3,000,000. Now I say, as I said some time since, when I made some remarks upon this subject, that this bureau has cost the Government in property and in money over sixteen million dollars, and I am prepared to support that statement by the report and statements of General Howard himself.

Now, in regard to the continuance of this bureau, it is proposed to discontinue it after the 1st of January next, provided it may be done "without injury to the Government." I offered, or desired to offer, an amendment to the effect that this bureau should be discontinued now in all the States which are at present represented in Congress, and that it should be discontinued in those States which are not represented in Congress as soon as they shall be restored to their former political relations with the Federal Government. Why does not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] accept that amendment? What is the necessity for continuing this bureau, with all its vast expenditures, until the 1st day of January next? The reason assigned for its continuance heretofore has been that the southern States were in such a disorganized and disarranged condition that it was necessary to have this bureau in order to protect the freedmen in their rights and privileges; that the civil institutions and civil officers down there were not adequate to the protection of that class of people.

Now, there are to-day three of those States represented on this floor; three of them are now restored to all their relations with this Government, having State governments established which are competent to afford the most ample and abundant protection to the freedmen, giving them even greater civil and political rights than are given to the whites. Then where the necessity for continuing this bureau for a single hour in those States? If the gentlemen who have advocated this bill heretofore were sincere in the reasons they have assigned for the further continuance of this bureau, then I must say that those reasons no longer exist, at least so far as they apply to the States which have been already restored. I wish to ask what better reason will there be for withdrawing this bureau from those three States now represented here on the 1st of January next than exists to-day? None whatever. But there is one reason to which I desire to call the attention of the House as being the reason which prompts the chairman of the committee [Mr. ELIOT] and the majority on this floor to favor the continuance of this bureau, which is so plain that no one can mistake it. One of the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] for the continuance of this bureau was in a letter which he incorporated in his speech, and of which I will read an extract, as follows:

"3. The bureau should be continued one year longer to act as a sort of moderator between white and black during the exciting contest now impending over the whole country. It can thus assist wonderfully in reconstructing the South on a loyal basis. To continue the bureau one year more than is provided will cover most all the exciting political issues about to be made in the election for President, and this is of no little importance to the whole country."

I have shown that the reason heretofore assigned for the continuance of this bureau, the protection of freedmen in their rights, is not now applicable to some of these States, and will not be applicable to the others so soon as they shall be restored to their former political relations. Why should this bureau be continued in these States? Why should you not as to these States do now what you propose to do in January next? Why is it more appropriate to discontinue the bureau in January next than now, unless we intend the bureau to operate as a political machine to control political sentiments and to accomplish political ends in those States. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent and cannot be denied—the gentleman from Massachusetts knows it, and dare not deny it—that all the reasons heretofore assigned for the continuance of the bureau have now ceased to exist. There is at this time no reason why this bureau should not be withdrawn from States so soon as they are reorganized and restored to their former political relations. I cannot see, therefore, why the amendment I have proposed should not be accepted, and why it should not be adopted by the House. But, sir, if the object is to have the benefit of this institution, as indicated by the correspondent of the gentleman from Massachusetts, until after the presidential election, why not discontinue it on the first Wednesday after the presidential election, when they have realized the benefits and accomplished the ends desired instead of postponing until the 1st of January as proposed.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, the only point that has been made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ADAMS] is the same one attempted to be made by other gentlemen here in regard to the expense of the bureau. I have answered it two or three times already; and I only want to say now one word upon the point. The gentleman knows or ought to know that all the expenses of this bureau would have been defrayed from the collections of cotton made by the labor of freedmen under the operations of the bureau. Not one dollar of expense would have been imposed upon the Treasury of the United States if it had not been for the action of President Johnson in returning property, both personal and real, to the rebels from whom it had been taken. It is by that action, and that alone, that any expense for the support of the bureau has been put upon the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] denies specifically the charge made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ADAMS,] the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BOYER,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] that the expense of this bureau has been within the time stated $16,000,000?

Mr. ELIOT. I deny it emphatically. The gentlemen have had before them the figures which would have shown them their statement is not correct.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. They all affirm that it is true.

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly; and the gentleman's President has stated the amount at $20,000,000. There is no truth in any such statement.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. President Johnson, I believe, stated the amount as $12,000,000.

Mr. ELIOT. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, by the second section of the thirteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution authorizing Congress to "enforce by appropriate legislation" the abolition of slavery, we are empowered to use for that purpose this bureau whenever it may be necessary. So long as it is impossible for the State governments in the South to do this it would seem to me to be reasonable to continue the Freedmen's Bureau, and I should be in favor of such continuance. But as a member of the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, I am in favor of discontinuing this bureau just as soon as the people of those reconstructed States shall themselves be able to secure to the freedmen of the South that which it is the duty of the nation to see secured to them. The reconstruction of these States will, I trust, speedily be followed by such a condition of things in the South as will enable the States themselves to accord to the freedmen the protection to which under this thirteenth article they are entitled.

I am therefore in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] making compulsory the discontinuance of this bureau on the 1st of January next. I should be in favor of discontinuing it in each of those States as fast as they are reconstructed but for the fact that it will require time for the State governments there to acquire the power to carry out to the freedmen the guarantees of this new amendment of the Constitution. It will be our duty to furnish these State governments with the means of doing it. It will be our duty to furnish the militia of those States with arms which will enable them to protect these freedmen. Already measures have been inaugurated which will result in a provision for that necessity of the case, but time will be required to consummate these arrangements. Therefore it would be wrong for us to violate this constitutional amendment by discontinuing the Freedmen's Bureau at once. But I cannot see, if arms are furnished by the Federal Government to the militia of these States to enable them to protect themselves and the freedmen within their limits against outrages, why we cannot safely withdraw the Freedmen's Bureau and the Federal Army. I cannot see why the State of Tennessee hereafter cannot protect the freedmen within the limits of the State of Tennessee. I trust the State of Tennessee will be able to do that. I confess, sir, I am a little surprised to hear gentlemen from Tennessee admit, as they seem to admit, the inability of the State government of Tennessee, of the loyal people of Tennessee, to afford this protection. Why are they not able? Is it because they have not arms in their hands to defend them against the outrages of these rebels? If that is the reason let us give them out of the immense supply of unnecessary arms now on hand, enough of arms so they can protect themselves and the freedmen against these outrages.

Unless there is some reason, then, not suggested on this floor to-day, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will be adopted, and the Freedmen's Bureau be discontinued in every reconstructed State as soon as the 1st of January next.

Mr. BOYER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to correct some of the fallacies in his calculation?

Mr. ELIOT. I cannot yield. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ALLISON's amendment was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ELIOT demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOKS and Mr. BECK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 81, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Bromwell, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Beckley, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French Garfield, Griswold, Hamilton, Higby, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, William Lawrence, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomerooy, Raum, Robertson, Root, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Eihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wolker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, Mungen, Niblack, Phelps, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, and Van Trump—31.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Deweese, Dodge, Eggleston, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelley, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, McCormick, McCullough, Morrell, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nicholson, Nunn, Polsey, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Taffe, John Trimble, Upson, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, Woodward, and Woodward—63.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTH CAROLINA MEMBERS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Nathaniel Boyden and Oliver H. Dockery, claiming seats from the third and seventh districts of North Carolina, instruct me to report they find the credentials in due form of law, but that these gentlemen are unable to take the oath of office prescribed by the statute of July 2, 1862, because one of them, Mr. Boyden, was a member of the Legislature of North Carolina under the confederate government, and the other, Mr. Dockery, served in 1863 for three months in the confederate army. The disabilities incurred by these acts have been removed by act of Congress, and therefore the committee recommend that these gentlemen be admitted to their seats upon taking the oath of office required by the act prescribing an oath of office to be taken by persons from whom legal disabilities shall have been removed.

The SPEAKER. The President of the United States having notified the House of his approval, on the 11th of July, of the act referred to, it has therefore now become the law. The question is on agreeing with the report of the Committee of Elections.

The report of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. NATHANIEL BOYDEN and Mr. OLIVER H. DOCKERY then appeared, and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868.

Mr. BROOKS. A very sensible oath.

BRIDGE IN BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. MOORHEAD obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, who asked unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution for the appointment of an additional commissioner on the commission relative to a bridge in Boston harbor.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be reported; after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The joint resolution was reported. It authorizes the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy to appoint an additional commissioner from civil life to determine the question of the feasibility and propriety of throwing a bridge across a portion of Boston harbor called "Maverick bridge," so that said commission shall consist of five.

Mr. PIKE and Mr. BANKS objected.

NIAGARA FALLS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill providing for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, now in Committee of the Whole, be postponed to the 10th day of December next, and made the special order immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There will be no objection, I take it, to a simple postponement.

Mr. JUDD. I will strike out so much of the resolution as makes it the special order if the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KELSEY. I still object.

Mr. JUDD. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I cannot yield for that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman will have a right to move to suspend the rules for a special purpose which would override the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any such rule in the Digest. Two motions to suspend the rules cannot be made at the same time if the maker of the first motion insists upon it.

SOLICITOR AND NAVAL JUDGE ADVOCATE.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1430) to abolish the office of solicitor and naval judge advocate, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMISSION OF DUTY ON BELLS.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution (H. R. No. 339) authorizing the remission of the duties on a chime of bells imported for presentation to the Episcopal church at Hoosack, Rensselaer county, New York; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROSWELL BATES.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Invalid Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Roswell Bates, asking for a pension from 1817 to 1852; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I now move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the tariff bill; and pending that motion, I move that all general debate on the bill be closed in thirty minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Cannot the gentleman say thirty-one minutes?

Mr. MOORHEAD. No, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think he ought to give us another minute.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Not at this stage of the session.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Surely on a bill of this importance he might let us have thirty-one minutes. I move to amend his motion so as to make the time thirty-one minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the motion so as to close debate in two hours.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. As the gentleman from Illinois is so liberal, I withdraw my amendment.

The question was put on the amendment; and there were—ayes 57, noes 46.

Mr. MOORHEAD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MOORHEAD and Mr. GOLLADAY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to close debate, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. Is it in order to move to postpone the bill until next session?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CULLOM. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion to postpone will be reserved until the vote is taken on the motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as that motion, if adopted, would suspend the rule allowing the motion to postpone to be made.

Mr. CULLOM. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House or the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union can take a recess at any time they please, but the House will meet at half past seven o'clock this evening in Committee of the Whole (Mr. CULLOM in the chair) for general debate exclusively.

The question was taken on Mr. MOORHEAD's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 56, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Benton, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Buckland, Roderick B. So the motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAVES in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1349) to increase the revenue from duties on imports and tending to equalize exports and imports.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all general debate on the bill is closed in two hours.

The pending paragraph of the bill was as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the articles herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following specified duties and rates of duty, that is to say: on all copper imported in the form of ores, three cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all regulus of copper, and on all black or coarse copper, four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein; on all old copper, fit only for remanufacture, four cents per pound; on all copper in plates, bars, ingots, pigs, and in other forms not manufactured or herein enumerated, five cents per pound.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised at the vote that has just been taken, nor will I be surprised at any motions that may be made to delay action on this bill. I congratulate the country and the House upon the fact that we have now reached this bill, and that the Representatives of the people will now have a chance to express their views upon this subject.

I do not intend to make a speech; I do not want any speaking. It is now so late in the session that the time for action has arrived; and I want voting and not speaking. But I deem it proper to spend a few minutes in calling the attention of the House to the history of the action of the Thirty-Ninth Congress upon the tariff question. These facts are somewhat important, and I invite the attention of the House to them; and particularly I urge upon gentlemen here who are in favor of the tariff to examine those facts. During the Thirty-Ninth Congress, at every time and at every step when we had action on this subject, we had a large majority; just about as large a majority as we have on the vote to-day. Time after time, again and again, the yeas and nays were called, and votes were had, and on each occasion we had a large majority. But by superior financiering of some kind, we were intercepted at every step, and finally failed to get a tariff bill passed into a law.

I will proceed very briefly to give the history of the tariff bill of the last Congress, House bill No. 718. On the 25th of June, near the termination of the long session, the Committee of Ways and Means reported that bill to the House. It was passed through the House and sent to the Senate. The Senate postponed the bill until the commencement of the next session, until the December following. And I believe they postponed it mainly at the suggestion of the gentleman who occupies the position of Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to know the gentleman's reason for the statement he has just made, that the Senate postponed the tariff bill at the instance of the Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I never heard of it before.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If the gentleman will only be cool and keep his seat, I will endeavor to give him all the light I have on the subject; and which, perhaps, may be all he will want to know.

The gentleman to whom I referred, who has the title of Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue, represented to the Senate that the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means, which was a small, delicate, genteel bill, as the House may see by examining the files of the last Congress, merely amending the tariff—he represented that that was not a perfect bill; that we wanted an entirely new tariff bill, one that should contain every article upon which any tariff duty was imposed. The Senate supposed there was something in that, and agreed to postpone the bill, with the understanding that he would prepare the details, the outlines, the groundwork of an entire tariff bill, and have it ready for them at the commencement of the next session.

At the commencement of the next session here was his bill, containing three times as much as the bill which passed the House, which was merely a bill amendatory of the tariff. In his bill there were included hundreds of articles upon which the tariff was not changed at all, neither enlarged nor reduced. They were put in merely as a make-weight, as I believe, put in merely to kill the bill, to prevent its passage during that Congress. And it had that result most effectually. I have frequently told that gentleman that he had drugged that bill to death.

There were hundreds, perhaps thousands of drugs named in that bill; and every drug was named and carried out with its rate of duty, either ad valorem or specific. The rates in more than two thirds of the cases were not changed, yet they were all inserted, and had to be gone over and considered. The result was that so much time was occupied in the Senate that, Congress meeting early in December, the bill was not reported to the Senate until January, 11, 1867. It was then ordered to be printed. That bill afterward came to the House.

But before leaving this point, as my sensitive friend, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] seemed a little anxious about the Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to whom I unfortunately referred in this connection, I deem it proper to say to the House and to the country that if it is necessary or important that this Government should keep an officer in its service at a large salary for the purpose of guarding the interests of the foreign manufacturer, the foreign importer, the foreign agent in New York, then the Secretary of the Treasury has been signally fortunate in the selection he has made, and Mr. Wells is the proper man for the place. I want to put that on the record before leaving this point.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MOORHEAD. I cannot yield to the gentleman. There are two hours allowed for general debate, and he will have a portion of that time.

This bill came from the Senate to the House. We had to take it up—how? Not as in the form of amendments to our bill. It was an amendment, it is true; but it was a single amendment, because the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted a new bill. I am not a parliamentarian nor a tactician. I have been in this House a considerable time; but I have not yet learned all the rules, and I do not expect that I ever shall. But under the ruling made by our very able Speaker, (and I do not doubt its correctness,) when that bill came in here it required a two-thirds vote to take it up. The bill had passed this House and gone to the Senate. The Senate had adopted the plan of Mr. Wells, making an immense bill. They had passed upon everything embraced in our bill and a thousand things beside. Yet, although as to nearly all the articles embraced in the original bill both Houses agreed upon the same rates we were not able to enact the bill into a law, because we could not get the Senate amendments considered here without a two-thirds vote.

This is a fact in the history of this measure. It is new, perhaps, to some gentlemen who were not here at that time. It is not new to the old members; it is not new to you, Mr. Chairman; it is not new to the Speaker of this House; for we tried every method to get the bill up. Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, who was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, implored the House on different occasions to take up the bill, and made various motions with that object. By reference to page 1658 of the Congressional Globe for the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress it will be found that on the 28th of February, 1867, after the Committee of Ways and Means had reported the bill back to the House, a motion was made to suspend the rules, on which the yeas were 106, the nays 64. We could not obtain quite the necessary two thirds, and hence the bill could not be taken up. On the same day we made another effort, and on a similar motion the yeas were 102, the nays 69; there being all the time, as will be seen, a large majority in favor of considering the bill.

I have thus referred to the history of this measure for the sake of calling the attention of the tariff men here to the facts of the case. I do not want them to allow themselves to be hoodwinked in that way again. We have got this bill now in such a position that a majority can put it through, and I ask the tariff men of the House to put it through. I do not want to make a speech; but I have here some statistics which show the importance of passing this bill. They exhibit the immense drain of gold which has been going on from this country, showing that something must be done to stop this drain unless we wish to go into bankruptcy, and demonstrating that this bill is a step in the right direction. I ask the Clerk to read the statistics which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The drain of gold and the tariff."—The published statements of our imports and exports for the eleven months ending May 31, 1868, show of imports $229,241,447 against about two hundred and fifty-eight million for 1867, and about two hundred and eighty-three million for 1866. Our receipts of revenue on these imports are $102,503,849, against about one hundred and twelve millions for the same period in 1867, and $123,000,000 in 1866. Of these imports, $73,000,000 in gold values were dry goods. Our exports, exclusive of specie, for the same period were $163,249,520, as against about one hundred and sixty-five million for the same period in 1866-67, and $203,000,000 in 1865-66. The balance of trade against us was paid for by an export of gold amounting to $41,979,398, in the eleven months ending with May, 1866; $34,642,660 in the same period ending with May, 1867, and the enormous sum of $64,486,258 for the like period ending with May, 1868, nearly twenty millions more than our export of gold has ever reached before in the same period. Mr. J. Ross Browne, in his report of our production of the precious metals, estimated our total annual product of both gold and silver at $75,000,000. Taking into account the amount of specie leaving directly for Europe from San Francisco it is evident we are draining every dollar of gold we are producing to pay for these imports.

"The balance of trade against this country has been $723,266,717 gold since 1861. To meet this we have exported $436,391,029 of Government bonds, and $286,965,688 of coin above our imports. From 1860 to 1861, both inclusive, our importations were $476,923,616 in excess of our exports, and the excess of our coin export over import was $421,551,794, making a balance of trade amounting to $1,002,195,331 against us for eighteen years, with a loss of coin amounting to $11,517,667, or an amount equal to the whole gold and silver product of the country for that period. The consumption of foreign goods in 1865 was equal to $12 22 per capita for a population of thirty-five millions, and all of our factories were stopping for a lack of support. In 1867 this consumption amounted to $11 15 per capita, whereas it was only $11 81 per capita in the crash of 1857, and averaged but $5 44 under the tariff of 1842.

"There is no other country on the face of the earth, not even excepting opulent Great Britain, that could have endured such a drain on its gold and such a tax on its industry as is shown by the above figures to have been sustained through a term of years by this. The fact that we have sustained it and live only proves the extent and variety of our resources and our exceeding vitality. To remedy our losses and build up that prosperity we so much need, there is no other instrumentality than the one now presented. It must either be improved, and at once, or the losses must continue, and prosperity be remitted for another doubtful term. To prevent this, and to garner what is so essential for the country and for all its parts, we trust that Congress will not adjourn before the opportunity afforded by partisan zeal has been wisely and effectually improved."

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the facts set forth in the statistics just read by the Clerk ought to be carefully examined and pondered upon; and they should satisfy any man, or any set of men, that unless we can stop this drain of gold to foreign countries we must go into bankruptcy. I know of but one way to stop that, and that is through the tariff. I have been the advocate of a tariff for many years. I have been denounced frequently for my advocacy of the principle of protection to our home industries. Some of the free-trade papers have gone so far as to say "MOORHEAD has tariff on the brain." Well, Mr. Chairman, I have, and I will continue to have it upon the brain until I can induce the whole country to stand up in favor of the development of our great national resources, and until we lift the country out of the mire into which it has been thrown by free-trade doctrines.

Now, sir, I want to read a little myself. I will read a short paragraph which appeared in a New York paper, for which I am indebted to the able report of my colleague [Mr. MORRELL] on the warehousing system; and I should like very much to have the House listen to it. I do not expect I can get the House to give me its attention for any great length of time; and therefore I shall be brief.

Now listen to what this New York paper says:

"One of the immediate effects of a high tariff is to keep up the price of labor, which is more than four times as high in this country as it will average in Europe. I am for unqualified free trade. I would sell out the custom-houses, discharge the leeches that swarm around them, and allow people to sell and buy products and goods wherever they found it for their interest to do so. This will bring us to a true and normal condition. I see clearly what the effect would be. Commercial disturbance would be the natural result, for it would be a great and radical change. We should be on an entirely new foundation. The first effect would be to stop manufacturing here, and the country would be filled with foreign goods, many of which Europe would never see her money for. A commercial revulsion would follow, laborers would be out of employment, and the price of labor would come down, down, down, until it touched the European standard."

Shall I read the last words? "And then success is secured." Think of that, Mr. Chairman! After you bankrupt the country, get labor down, down, down, until it touches the European standard, and then success is secured! Why, sir, it puts me in mind of a story I heard when I was a boy: a simple-minded woman was raising a child of her own, and some wag, not contemplating the result of his advice, asked her why she did not teach her child to live without eating. She went to work to practice the advice. She kept her child without eating on and off, trying to teach it to do entirely without eating for weeks, and at last the child died. The woman lamented the death of the child, for, said she, "How sad it was I lost the child just as I had taught it to do without eating." [Laughter.]

Now, here is the free trade doctrine, they endeavor to teach us to do without a tariff, and just as we get well enough learned, so that, according to this writer, success is attained, we are literally dead to all prosperity.

But I did not intend to say half as much as I have on this subject. I only wanted a few minutes to appeal to members of the House, and then let the discussion go on, hoping that when it is ended we shall get at a speedy vote. I have shown members of the House that during the last Congress when we had a majority we did not succeed in getting a tariff bill through. Now, I appeal to members not to succumb to that same kind of influence that defeated us before. I expect there will be all sorts of amendments offered. You will find one gentleman who thinks he will strike a hobby by moving to take the duty off tea and coffee. He will get up and appeal to you about the poor people who pay the duty on these articles. You will find a great many other amendments of various sorts offered. But I ask my tariff friends to scrutinize these amendments, and when you find them coming from an enemy of the bill vote them down. This bill is by no means perfect; it is far from what I would have had it. The sub-committee to which this subject was referred some months ago when the tax bill was in the way, could not do anything about it until that was disposed of. That is the only apology I can make for bringing this in so late. We reported to the Committee of Ways and Means a pretty good bill, about the size of the one reported by the entire committee last year. The committee postponed that bill till December next, but from the pressing necessity for action upon the subjects of copper, lumber, and some other articles, the sub-committee were authorized to prepare a small bill which we have reported, and which is now before the Committee of the Whole. It consists of only ten pages, and it can be passed in half an hour. I ask the friends of the tariff to stand by it, and vote down amendments unless they are recommended by the committee. That is asking a good deal, I know, but the bill which was postponed till December next I trust will be taken up when all the various other subjects will be acted upon. But I will not spend any more time. I yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. GRISWOLD] for two minutes.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I did not wish the gentleman to yield to me for the purpose of discussing this bill, but merely to express for his special benefit, as well as that of the House, my regret that he should have felt called upon to invite attention to the fact that the Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Wells, was, in his judgment, inimical to the tariff question. I feel bound, for one, to raise a demurrer to that interpretation of the acts and sentiments of that gentleman. It is unlike my colleague on the committee thus to characterize the motives and opinions of a man holding such a position. I am bound to say, from the intimate knowledge I have derived from association with the Commissioner, I feel entirely certain that while we may differ with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and upon some points possibly with me, he is not opposed to a tariff, but that on the other hand he is as much in favor of a proper tariff as either the gentleman from Pennsylvania or myself. I have felt that I could not resist the sense of duty which impelled me to express these sentiments in regard to that gentleman.

Mr. MOORHEAD. In reply to my worthy and esteemed colleague, I must say that I feel justified in what I have said about that gentleman. It is the result of long examination and investigation, and I am as perfectly satisfied of what I say as ever I was of anything in the world. I said it knowing what I was saying, and I am ready here and anywhere to take the responsibility of it.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means authorized him to report this bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If I should answer the gentleman exactly as he deserved, I might say that his question was not a proper one. But I have already stated that I was authorized by the committee to report it, and so it appears on the record, and no member of the committee will say I was not authorized to report it.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman seems to intimate that I put an impertinent question. I do not see it in that light. It seems to me this House has a right to know whether the bill that is now before the committee was the result of the action of the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I suppose he means to inquire whether this bill was reported by a majority of the entire committee, or by a majority of a quorum.

Mr. CULLOM. That is what I want to know.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] I am sure, did not so understand the gentleman. It may be proper that I should say to the gentleman that the bill has the concurrence of a majority of the entire committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I was about to say that it very frequently occurs in committees that only a quorum is present when bills are acted on, and from some remarks that have been made I was induced to believe that it was only a majority of a quorum that ordered this bill to be reported to the House and not a majority of the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL. Then how is it that he knows all these points?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not stated that I knew anything about it. I asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] the question, because I wanted to know what the fact was in reference to it.

Mr. O'NEILL. I presume my colleague from Pennsylvania knew what he was doing when he reported the bill, and knew what he was authorized to do.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. O'NEILL. I supposed that the gentleman from Illinois was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and felt outraged because he had not been consulted about the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman from Illinois simply wanted to know whether a majority of the whole committee were in favor of the bill, and had ordered it to be reported to the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. If my colleague answers in the affirmative, will the gentleman from Illinois vote for the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. No, sir; he will not. I only wanted to know what the position of the Committee of Ways and Means is in regard to this bill.

Mr. MYERS. I hope the gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. McCARTHY.]

Mr. McCARTHY. Being new in legislation and not well conversant with the history of it, I have had occasion to ask how long this office of Special Revenue Commissioner has been in existence, and I am told about three years. Now, sir, it strikes me as a strange condition of things that men who are sent here from different portions of the country, representing different interests, many of them manufacturing interests, some of them free-trade interests, must necessarily have placed over them a Commissioner to regulate and direct their organization of a tariff. I see no necessity of any such officer. And so far as I know of the actions of this gentleman, he starts from Washington, he goes through Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, and lands in Liverpool or London, being entirely in the interest and under the control and advice of the commercial interest of the country, and never going about visiting the manufacturing interests and arriving at a practical knowledge of the wants of those interests. I understand that to be the fact. We have a large interest in our section of country, and, so far as I know, this gentleman has not the least idea or knowledge of its wants. I think the remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] is correct, that while this gentleman may be an advisory officer it is beyond his province or duty or power to regulate and manage the operations of a tariff bill as between one House and the other.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I would ask my colleague if the information is true that the Commissioner to whom he refers does undertake to regulate tariff bills as between the House and the Senate?

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that he does regulate that matter when he takes into his hands the entire formation of a tariff bill, retaining it until so late a period in the session as to defeat its passage. I understand that to be this gentleman's power in relation to the organization of the tariff; and more than that, the feeling outside in the country is that that gentleman is not a representative of the manufacturing interest, but of the commercial interest of the country; that he is absorbed soul and body by the free-trade interest.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the tariff either in the abstract or in its details. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means I voted in favor of reporting this bill, and I would have been very glad had it been more extended, embracing all those articles which in the legislation of the last Congress it was thought wise by the Senate and House to include in the change of existing law. The fluctuations of trade and the ceaseless triumphs of industry require a periodical revision of our system of imposts. I will not deny that in my votes upon this measure I am actuated to some extent at least by local, not to say sectional considerations. The part of the country which I have the honor with other gentlemen to represent is in need of industrial quite as much as of political reconstruction. The war put a stop to our industries, blighted our prosperity, and has placed us in a condition where we must start out in the career of business anew. The doctrines which prevailed with us for a great many years were what are called free trade, anti-tariff doctrines; and they had a fair practical development. Among the other teachings of our great war, not the least important, perhaps, was the effect of this so-called free trade upon the public welfare. The peculiar industry of that region tended to foster that doctrine. Manufactures were not fostered; shipping was not fostered. There were neither miners to penetrate the earth for the ores, nor mariners with the daring spirit of commerce to skim the sea for the productions of other lands. The agricultural products of the country were kept until enterprise from abroad came for them, bringing in exchange whatever was wanted by the people.

A more injurious and pernicious system of political economy I cannot conceive; and we have felt the effects of it. I say "we;" I mean the population of that part of the country. We felt the effects of this system when we found ourselves as a section involved in war. A cordon of bayonets on one side, and a rigorous blockade on the other, hemmed us in from the outside world, and we were driven to depend upon our own resources.

We had been fighting the fishing bounties, given originally as an encouragement to seamen in the hope of fostering a Navy, instead of seeking to avail ourselves of those bounties. The navigation laws had been assailed by us from time immemorial, instead of availing ourselves of their benefits and opening up our three thousand miles of coast to a maritime commerce that might have equaled the commerce of all the rest of the world. Our inlets, our bays, and harbors were, therefore, wholly unimproved and unoccupied except by foreign sails. And when the war came upon us, and we were hemmed in, we had neither ships nor seamen. And, for the purpose of opening the blockade and getting our supplies from abroad, we were driven to the ship-yards of England, Scotland, and France, and depended upon the sailors of every nation under the sun.

I had occasion, during the last Congress, I think it was, to recur to the article of salt, which our part of the country might produce in great abundance, sufficient to have supplied the wants of the entire region. But the theory had prevailed there that salt was one of the necessities of life, and therefore no burden must be imposed upon it. I recollect one of our prominent public men used to say, as an illustration of the doctrine, that the poor man's cow in the mountains of Tennessee consumed more salt than the broker in Wall street, and to tax salt, therefore, was an intolerable inequality of burdens. What was the result of that theory? The moment the war closed in upon us and cut off the outside supply the people were absolutely famished for the want of that necessary of life, and a barrel of salt passed in exchange for the piano in the parlor.

There were abundant salt-springs had we been in condition to work them. We had salines lying below the surface, but it was too late then to penetrate to them, to develop them, and engage in salt manufacture. The great salt deposits in Louisiana lay there wholly unimproved, in fact hardly discovered, until long after the war began. On the other hand, sugar had been protected and its production encouraged by our legislation. As a consequence the South had no lack of sugar, and until the supply was cut off by the occupation of Louisiana it was cheaper and more abundant than in the other parts of the country.

The South furnishes facilities beyond any other part of the country for manufactures. All the Alleghany region of country, comprising the western part of Virginia, eastern Kentucky, eastern Tennessee, western North Carolina, western South Carolina, northern Georgia, and northern Alabama, abounds in manufacturing facilities, its water-power, its forests, the productiveness of its soil, its mineral wealth, and especially the abundance of coal lying exposed at the surface. Nothing that enters into industrial pursuits except productive labor and capital to stimulate and sustain it is wanting to make that region one of the most wealthy and populous of America.

The tariff policy which has done so much for cold, bleak, sterile, barren New England, which has made Pennsylvania to flourish and blossom as the rose, if applied to that region would produce there the same beneficent results.

The change which has come over our country as the results of the war, as yet only partially felt and observed, necessitates a change in our industries, in our labor, in the general economy and enterprise of our people. I believe that the policy known as the tariff policy, as that term has been used in our political dialect, will be our building up, our salvation. I believe it will reward and dignify labor, and make productive industry not only profitable but respectable. It will infuse a new spirit into our people and give an altered tone to society. It is for this reason, representing my immediate constituents, that I am at this time in favor of the legislation proposed in this bill.

One of the interests, for example, embraced in the bill is copper. It is designed to give further protection to the domestic copper found in great abundance in various parts of the country, not a little of it lying in my own congressional district. There are there copper mines already partially developed, producing annually not less than two millions of refined copper, and giving employment to a great number of people, and capable of being extended almost indefinitely. The copper mines of Lake Superior and of California are still more productive, the domestic supply being fully equal to the demand. Another interest protected by the bill is zinc. The increasing demand and value of this metal, both in the metallic state and as a pigment make it important to develop the domestic mines. In southwestern Virginia and in eastern Tennessee there are mines of zinc very promising which are already beginning to be developed, and the product of which is already very large and likely soon to become still greater. Then there are iron mines and other mineral treasures lying there awaiting development by the investment of capital and other application of labor. If judiciously protected against the undue competition of older and better established works abroad, population will be attracted, skilled industry will be awakened, a new prosperity will dawn, and the blessings which always attend well-rewarded labor will be ours. However it may be elsewhere, the tariff policy is essentially the true financial policy for the South. Instead of being satisfied, as hitherto, with producing raw material alone, our real interest requires us to give it form fit for immediate use. But I will not enlarge.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. DRIGGS.]

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, like my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] who has just taken his seat, I might perhaps admit that in giving my adhesion to this bill I am somewhat influenced by local interests. But, while making that admission, I still contend that I am governed by broader and more national views of the industrial interests of the country, and not solely by any local consideration or any peculiar interest in my own district. We have in the district which I have the honor to represent two or three large interests, in the development of which we are deeply concerned, and which are embraced in the terms of this bill. One of them is the copper-mining interest. Upon copper there is at present a duty of only about seven per cent. ad valorem, the duty being two and a half per cent. per pound on pure copper, one and a half per cent. per pound on ores and old copper, making, as copper ranges at about twenty-three cents per pound, a duty of only about seven per cent. The committee has very carefully, and I believe fairly and ably considered this question. They have investigated all the points bearing upon this great interest. All that we ask is simply what was agreed upon in this House two years ago—an increase of the duty on copper from its present rate to about twenty per cent. We ask an increase of five cents per pound on pure copper imported in ingots, four cents on regulus and old copper, and three cents on pure copper from foreign ores.

Sir, while I do not desire to injure any interest engaged in smelting foreign ore, still I know it to be a fact that unless we have some protection more than that afforded by our present laws $50,000,000 of capital invested in the production of copper in my own district will be lost and the mines will be closed. This is a fact; it is no idle tale told here to induce gentlemen to support this measure, but it is true.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are some other important interests in my district. We have a large interest in iron and salt and lumber, though I believe lumber is not embraced in this bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Yes, it is.

Mr. DRIGGS. I have not investigated thoroughly the question with reference to iron; but in regard to copper I know that our section of the country needs all that is asked in this bill, and that without it we cannot exist as a copper-producing community. There are about forty thousand people engaged in this branch of business. And, Mr. Chairman, let me mention an instance of the patriotism of those people. During the war they sent to Europe and brought to this country hundreds of Swedes, paying their passage; yet they afterward allowed these men to be enlisted by the United States recruiting officers; and in a regiment which I raised myself there was an entire company composed of Swedes, thus brought here at the expense of our copper-producing men of the Lake Superior region, who not only paid the expenses of their passage to this country, but supported their wives and children after the men had enlisted in the Army.

Now, sir, I hold that no interest will be brought before this House that so strongly appeals to us as this one.

Mr. Speaker, probably no portion of the country has so deep an interest in the success of the bill before the House as the district I have the honor of representing here; and I deem this an opportune time to place before this honorable body some facts connected with the history of a section which has not hitherto received that attention its importance justly merits, trusting, as I do, that it may have some influence upon its passage.

In the year 1835 a difficulty arose between the State of Ohio and the then Territory of Michigan concerning their boundary line, and great excitement existed on both sides. Militia were called out and moved toward the disputed territory, which was a strip of about ten miles in width, including the mouth of the Maumee river and the then village, now city, of Toledo. There was immediate danger of collision and bloodshed, but the dispute was fortunately settled by the interference of the General Government. Ohio, having most weight and influence in the national councils, succeeded in obtaining the boundary line she claimed, and Michigan was consoled by an immense addition to her natural area, of a comparatively unknown and wild region now known as the "Upper Peninsula," lying between Lakes Michigan and Superior.

This region was reported to be rich in minerals and precious stones, but particularly copper, as far back as 1636, by the Jesuit missionaries, who doubtless obtained their information from the Indians. The first attempt at regular mining was in 1770, when an English company was formed, the partners being his royal highness, the Duke of Gloucester; Mr. Secretary Townshend; Sir Samuel Tucket, baronet; Mr. Baxter, consul of the Empress of Russia; and Mr. Cruikshank, residing in England, and Sir William Johnson, baronet; Mr. Bostwick, Mr. Baxter and Mr. Henry, residing in America.

A vessel of forty tons was built above the Sault Ste. Marie, and miners and supplies were sent to the south shore, and work was prosecuted about twenty miles west of the Ontonagon river, for about two years. The venture did not turn out profitably, and the company was dissolved in 1774. The mass of copper now lying between the War and Navy Departments in this city was discovered on the west branch of the Ontonagon river, about 1800, not more than twenty miles from the working of the English company. This block or mass is mentioned in most of the works on geology and mineralogy as the largest known in the world, and was visited at different times by General Cass, Hon. Henry R. Schoolcraft, and others.

During the last war with England, or soon after, Dr. Francis Le Baun, of Plymouth, England, visited Lake Superior, and took with him a piece of the great copper rock of Ontonagon, which was placed in the British Museum.

After the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union quite an interest sprang up in regard to the newly-acquired territory, and Dr. Douglass Houghton was appointed State geologist.

The first proper scientific explorations of the mineral lands of Lake Superior were made by him while employed as State geologist, and subsequently while engaged in a connected linear and geological survey under the direction of the General Government. His publications were annual reports, in which he described the geology of the country, and the minerals he had discovered; but he withheld designations of localities of metallic veins, of which he was doubtless aware, as he had traversed the region where they occur. It is supposed that he reserved a more full description of the minerals and ores, with the localities, for his final report, which he unfortunately did not live to write, as he perished in the field of his labors by the capsizing of his boat, in the fall of 1845, in a violent snow storm, and most of his notes and papers were lost with him. In 1843 explorers and adventurers began to flock to the district with permits from the Treasury Department or Land Office to examine and locate the mineral lands; and for their protection against the Indians, Fort Wilkins, on Copper harbor, was in that year established by the Government and garrisoned by two companies of soldiers. In this year Mr. Julius Eldred, of Detroit, having purchased the great copper rock of the Ontonagon Indians, after much labor and expense removed it to the Sault Ste. Marie, intending to exhibit it in different parts of the United States and Europe, and expecting to make his fortune by so doing; but information having reached the Treasury Department, a revenue cutter was dispatched from Detroit for the purpose of seizing it, which was done notwithstanding the protest of the owner, and the vessel proceeded with her prize to Detroit, whence it was sent to Washington. I am glad to say that the owner was afterward reimbursed by a special act of Congress, obtained principally through the exertions of General Lewis Cass.

In the year 1845 a Government mineral agency was established at Porter's island in Copper harbor, for the purpose of registering, and certifying the permits issued in Washington, which numbered several thousands.

Explorers, miners, and adventurers of all kinds flocked to the country to locate and register their permits. Locations were made at random; and reports prepared by incompetent persons (so-called geologists) were scattered all over the country. Mining companies were formed in the principal cities on the certified permits, and speculation in mining stocks was prevalent throughout the country. Stock gambling became the rage, and the result, as might have been foreseen, was to injure the confidence of the people in all mining adventures, and especially in Lake Superior, the site of so many absurd speculations. A few mining companies continued work, though under the most discouraging circumstances, as the country was covered with dense forests, through which it was difficult to make roads, and communication with the more settled parts was difficult and expensive.

Under the system of permits Government exacted a percentage of three per cent. on the copper mined, which was paid to the mineral agent; but after a few years it was discovered that the expense of collection far greatly exceeded the receipts, and the system was wisely abandoned. A price was fixed upon the land, those occupying under permits having the option of paying so much per acre for a given time; after which all the United States lands were subject to entry without any reservation of mineral rights. This wise determination on the part of the Government, and the passage of a liberal general mining law on the part of the State, gave an impetus to mining, and new companies continued to be organized.

The interruption to navigation caused by the falls of the St. Mary's river, which connects Lake Huron and Lake Superior, added very largely to the cost of transportation of supplies to the mines, and of copper to the eastern markets; and for several years Congress was flooded with petitions for aid toward cutting a ship-canal of about a mile in length.

Steamers and sailing vessels had been hauled over the Portage at the Sault Ste. Marie, for the purpose of navigating Lake Superior, from the head of the falls. All supplies, machinery, &c., for the mines arriving from the eastern cities were landed at the foot of the falls, hauled a distance of a mile by tram-road or by wagons, and then loaded on the vessels above by means of scows; and the same process was necessary in getting the copper to market. This added largely to the expense of working the mines, to say nothing of the irregularity and delay which was unavoidable.

In 1853 a grant of seven hundred and fifty thousand acres of land was made by Congress to the State of Michigan for the purpose of building the ship-canal, and in 1854 the splendid work which now connects the two lakes was opened, when an immense impulse was given to the mining of both copper and iron.

This copper was shipped to the eastern market and sold for over forty millions dollars, contributing this enormous amount to the material wealth of the country. Unless crushed down by foreign competition the product will be largely increased, as the mines never looked better; and with the improvements in machinery and skill in mining gained by experience, work can be prosecuted much more effectually, as well as more economically, than heretofore. The number of mines organized is about one hundred and fifty, of which only forty are now working, and many of these with greatly reduced forces, the present price of copper ruling lower than it can be produced for except at a loss. These mines have built up thriving towns, such as Houghton, Hancock, Eagle River, Eagle Harbor, Copper Harbor, and Ontonagon, and Rockland, with churches, stores, and dwellings fully equal to those of the eastern States. They have erected mills for stamping and washing copper ores, and works for smelting which are not equaled in the world. They support a population of from thirty to forty thousand, who are intelligent, industrious, and law abiding. In exploring and working these mines, building the towns, and employing the labor, capital has been invested exceeding fifty million dollars. For the past two years this important interest has experienced unprecedented depression, so much so that the present market value of its capital is less than ten million dollars. The cause of this excessive depreciation is briefly stated in the fact that the high cost of labor, supplies, and taxes, without any offset from a corresponding tariff, has prevented even the best and richest mines from making any adequate return for the capital invested, and compelled the utter abandonment of many which formerly promised to be profitable. Great distress prevails in the mining districts owing to the stoppage of some of the mines, and the reduction of force in others, by which large numbers of men are thrown out of employ. Why is this? Here is an interest of national importance endangered, a hard working population of some forty thousand souls whose earnings for the best part of their lives are invested in their little homes, threatened with ruin and desolation, and thriving settlements on the verge of depopulation and consequent destruction! I say, why is this? It is because there is no adequate protection for the producers of copper; and foreign importations of copper ores are flooding the country, the product of Chili and Cuba, of peon and slave labor, and our highly-taxed mines are forced to compete with them. Seventy-five per cent. of the outlay in mining is for labor, and the balance is for steel, iron, coal, powder, fuse, &c., all of which are heavily protected, while the product, copper, is alone among metals admitted into the country on a merely nominal duty. In the recent national struggle the mining districts came promptly forward and sent fifteen per cent. of their population to the seat of war, and to replace the labor thus lost raised a fund of $100,000 for the purpose of bringing miners from Norway and Sweden. Arrangements were made to pay the passage of these emigrants, whereby their expenses to this mining region were to be advanced and deducted from their earnings. Ships were chartered and the men with their families embarked; but on their arrival in this country the majority of them could not withstand the extraordinary offers of the Government recruiting officers, and were enlisted in the Army and moved to the South, thus entailing upon the miner not only the loss of their advances, but throwing upon them the burden of support of the families abandoned by their natural protectors.

In common justice and fairness, the copper-mining interests should be placed upon something like an equal footing with other interests, aside from the fact that they are adding largely to the wealth of the country; and policy would dictate that the relief asked for in this bill should be afforded unhesitatingly and at once.

The district which I represent is of as much importance as any other in the United States, which the figures following will plainly prove:

In the year 1867 it produced in pig iron and iron ore, 500,231 tons, valued at $3,500,000; lumber, valued at $30,000,000; fish, 60,000 barrels, valued at $600,000; salt, 450,000 barrels, valued at $900,000; copper, 9,200 tons, valued at $4,500,000; amounting to $39,500,000.

My constituents are looking hither hopefully, but most anxiously, for the passage of this bill, for on it now rests the question of success or ruin. If it passes the mines will be able to resume work, and give employment to a large population now idle; if it fails the closing up of the mines is inevitable, and the prospect of their ever being worked again doubtful, as most of them are of great depth with large openings.

Should they cease work they will be filled up with water, entailing certain ruin to the proprietors. Desolation will then become widespread among the working population, and Government must look elsewhere and be dependent on foreign countries for its copper. All, or nearly all, of the ores imported from foreign countries are carbonates, which require sulphureted ores to flux them advantageously. Our products are principally sulphurets and copper in a native state, and consequently require no foreign ores to create a flux or aid in smelting them. This is proved at all the American mines where copper is constantly cast into ingots without the admixture of foreign ores. The argument raised by those engaged in smelting foreign ores that it is necessary to mix the same with American ores to smelt them, is simply ridiculous, for the reason, as before stated, that American ores require no admixture with imported ores. We admit that they need the American ores to mix with the foreign to aid them in smelting the same, but what we contend for is that we do not need the foreign ores at all; that we can produce all that is needed for home consumption and exportation if Congress will give us the small increase in the tariff we ask. The present duty on foreign copper imported pure in ingots is only two and a half cents per pound; on old copper, one and a half cents; and on copper ores, five per cent. ad valorem; being about seven per cent. all around. The rate we ask in the pending bill is five cents per pound on pure copper, four cents on old copper, and on regulus of copper and all black or coarse copper four cents on each pound of fine copper contained therein, and three cents on each pound of fine copper contained in foreign ores. This, at the present price of copper in the market, is equivalent to about twenty per cent. ad valorem. Many other mineral products of the country are now protected by a tariff nearly three times as great as that which we ask for copper; and while we are not opposed to this, and while in the present condition of the country we are in favor of protection to every American interest, we respectfully submit to this House and the country whether it is just that this vast interest should be left without any adequate protection, while many other similar interests are so fully provided for. I quote from a memorial on this subject already presented to the House:

"The copper mines of Lake Superior, California,

Tennessee, Vermont, and in other parts of the country, are suffering extreme depression because the price of copper has fallen below the cost of production, and unless they obtain relief in the way of a fair tariff there is imminent danger of a general stoppage of copper mining throughout the country.

"Our recent national struggle has necessitated the imposition of such heavy taxation upon the industry of the country that, with a few exceptional cases, we cannot compete with foreign products without the aid of protective duties.

"This fact has been recognized in regard to the majority of our industrial products, but owing to the opposition of a few interested parties, (the smelting works at Baltimore principally,) the article of copper has been hitherto overlooked entirely, although those most heavily engaged in mining have for the past two or three years been begging Congress to have it placed on something approximating an equal footing with other metals, of which they are large consumers in their mining operations.

"The amount of capital actually invested in the Lake Superior mines and mining lands is not less than $50,000,000, and the present market value is less than $10,000,000. The cause of this excessive depreciation is briefly stated in the fact that the high cost of labor and supplies and heavy taxes, without any offset from a corresponding tariff, have prevented even the richest mines from making adequate returns for capital invested, and compelled the abandonment of many which formerly promised to be profitable.

"Upon these mines a population of from thirty to forty thousand souls depend for support, and the towns and villages on the lake have been built up by them.

"These settlements must become depopulated and go to decay, and the lands become a worthless waste, if the mines are abandoned for want of sufficient protection against copper produced by foreign cheap labor. Already at Portage lake unemployed and hungry men demand work to supply themselves and families with food and fuel, and threaten the worst features of mob violence unless provision is made for them. To prevent the destruction of their property several of the mines levied new assessments to provide means of employment for the men during the winter months, though working at a heavy loss.

"During the past twenty years the mines of Lake Superior have produced over eighty thousand tons of fine copper, thus adding to the material wealth of the country more than forty million dollars. Their development has rendered the United States independent of foreign countries for this important metal, and they surely have just claim for protection.

"With a duty of five cents per pound on ingot, pig, bar, and rolled copper, four cents per pound on pure copper in regulus, and three cents per pound on fine copper in ores, the mines can manage to keep on working, and pay a fair return on the capital invested. Without it there is certainty of a general stoppage, entailing immense loss of property, and a vast deal of distress among an industrious and hard laboring population, whose all is dependent on the active working of the mines.

"Opposition to the passage of the tariff, so sorely needed by copper mining interest, has come from the smelting works on the seaboard, who claim to have a large capital invested for the purpose of smelting foreign ores. Aside from the immense capital invested in the mines, there are smelting works at Houghton, Ontonagon, and Lac La Belle on Lake Superior; Detroit, Michigan; Cleveland, Ohio; and Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, which have more capital employed than those at the sea-board, and are entirely dependent on home-produced ores.

"The estimated consumption of refined copper in the United States is per annum twelve thousand tons.

During the past year (1867) there were produced—
From Lake Superior.....	about 9,000 tons
From Tennessee.....	about 1,000 tons
From California, Vermont, and other points.....	about 2,500 tons
	12,500 tons

"Added to this were imported—
From Chili in ores and regulus, equivalent to fine copper.....	1,750 tons
From England, in ores and regulus, equivalent to fine copper.....	500 tons
From Canada, in ores and regulus, equivalent to fine copper.....	500 tons
From Cuba and other countries, in ores and regulus, equivalent to fine copper.....	250 tons
	3,000 tons

"It can be plainly seen from the figures that there is no doubt about the supply from our own mines being sufficient for home demand.

"The passage of a fair tariff will lead to the development of new mines, and the country will export copper instead of importing it. At present all imported is paid for in gold or exchange on London. Copper ores pay but five per cent. ad valorem under the existing tariff, and the amount of revenue accruing therefrom to the Government is comparatively insignificant in amount."

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any member of this House who has investigated the subject, and who knows the facts above stated to be true, will oppose this bill; and I hope and trust that it will pass and become a law. Unless it does I assure you that the destruction of all the mines in my district is no idle tale, but a reality which will speedily follow the rejection of this much-needed act of justice, and in order to prevent which I earnestly beg this House and every member within my hearing to give it their vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I should not have risen at this time but for a single remark which dropped from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MOORHEAD,] and which was seconded by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCCARTHY.] I very well remember the occasion to which the gentleman refers when in the Thirty-Ninth Congress we labored here for many hours attempting to secure the passage of a tariff bill and were prevented by the filibustering efforts of a minority of the House. I labored with my friend from Pennsylvania against that effort to break down the tariff bill, and I entirely sympathize with what he said in condemnation of the efforts so persistently made to prevent the action of this House on the tariff measure which certainly would have passed but for factious resistance.

But, sir, I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania make the remarks he did in regard to the Special Commissioner of the Revenue. I desire to say to the House that I totally dissent from the opinion he has expressed concerning that officer. Previous to this session few members of the House have had better opportunities than I have to know the character and the amount of labor that gentleman has performed for the country; and I do not believe any man appointed by the Government in the civil service has done for this country more work and more valuable work than he has. Finance is a science both complex and difficult, and its foundations rest on statistical knowledge. The whole subject of the tariff is one of the most delicate to manage properly of any that can be considered by a deliberative body. Any man who expects with rough instruments to make a tariff machine that will run with any degree of success will be mistaken. He is like one who attempts to mend a clock with a crowbar. The questions entering into a tariff are of a most delicate nature and involve the rights and interests of many classes of the community. Now, what we have needed in this country more than anything else has been an array of carefully-arranged facts, gathered from all sources and brought to the attention of Congress as the raw material out of which to construct financial legislation. Into the financial chaos resulting from the war Mr. Wells threw the whole weight of a strong, clear mind, guided by an honest heart, and during the last three years he has done more, in my judgment, to bring order out of chaos than any one man in the United States. He has furnished us what we most needed—classified knowledge of the subjects of financial legislation.

Mr. MOORHEAD. What has he done to favor the protection of American manufactures?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will call my friend's attention to a single point. Who drew the tariff bill which he and I tried to pass, but which was defeated in consequence of the efforts made against us in the last hours of the session? That tariff bill was prepared from beginning to end by a special commission, of which Mr. Wells was a leading member.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I beg to differ with the gentleman. He did not draw the bill the committee reported, and that is the one I referred to. The one he prepared was with the purpose of killing the tariff.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If the bill reported by David A. Wells and his associates had become a law it would have been a great improvement on tariff laws as they then existed. The gentleman, I am sure, will admit this. I do not desire to speak further on this subject except to say this: I differ from my friend in one respect on the subject of tariff. It is my conviction that one of the worst things that could happen to the friends and supporters of American industry would be to pass a prohibitory tariff. I do not say my friend from Pennsylvania would go that length, but there are many protectionists in this country who would make a tariff bill a Chinese wall around the country and prohibit all importation. I have sometimes thought that the gentleman leans a little too much in that direction. I desire to say I am not that kind of a tariff man.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask my friend—

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield.

Mr. MILLER. Nobody advocates such a doctrine as that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say he does, but I do say there is danger in that direction. Prohibitive legislation would, in my opinion, soon precipitate us into free trade and all its resultant evils.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman—

Mr. GARFIELD. I decline to yield. I do not say that any gentleman in this House proposes a prohibitory tariff in terms, or means to propose one, and I hasten to say that I do not charge this bill with being of that character; but I do affirm that the tendencies of a very considerable number of tariff men in this country are in that direction, and unless they take heed, unless they consent to a rational, considerate adjustment of the tariff such as can only be made by the full light that a careful statistical study of the subject will bring, I fear from them more than from any other source a reaction which will bring us by and by into free trade and all its consequences of evil to the manufacturing interest of the country.

Now, I say these things at this time for the purpose of indicating the ground upon which I answer the charges made against the Special Commissioner of Revenue. I do not believe the tariff men of this country will denounce David A. Wells. What I ask is that we shall take into consideration the immense financial facts of the situation. We have now an annual product of our great manufacturing interest, amounting to nearly one million eight hundred thousand dollars. That must be guarded, not by force of arms, not by denunciation and clamor, but by careful, prudent legislation, which will not be so extreme as to bring reaction and overthrow. Our manufactures need stability, permanence, and a steady policy. I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORHEAD] has been successful in getting this bill before the House, and in consideration in Committee of the Whole. He has had my assistance at every step. But I desire to say to him that, in my judgment, it is not the best mode of defending a tariff bill to denounce every man who does not pronounce the shibboleth after our fashion as an enemy of the tariff. We have appointed a Special Commissioner of the Revenue to gather facts and report them to Congress, to bring out the great considerations that underlie trade, and to explore the sources of revenue. He does not bring us theories but facts, and while he does that we ought not to be afraid of the results of his work. For my part, I am not afraid to welcome truth and to follow wherever it may lead. To shrink from such investigation, is to confess that we have no faith in our positions. I trust every true friend of protection will welcome and challenge the fullest investigation. I have an abiding faith in the principles on which our prosperity rests, and I should be sorry to think that a full exhibition of all the facts in the case could endanger my position. I have no such fear, and I trust the protectionists on this floor will harbor none.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOKS obtained the floor, but yielded ten minutes to

Mr. PIKE, who said: I was one who voted not to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering this bill. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his remarks, spoke of those who voted against going into Committee of the Whole as if they were "anti-tariff," and he calls upon members of the House who are "tariff" men to stand by this bill not only in general but in detail, to support not only the bill he has presented, but to support all the amendments he may submit, and to vote blindly and without reason against any amendments that he may not give his assent to; and that too, when the bill comes before the House in the dubious attitude of having a doubtful assent of the majority of the very committee that has authorized him to report it; for, when questioned on that very point, he declined to say whether or not it had the assent of the majority of that committee.

Now, sir, for one, I protest that I am not an "anti-tariff" man, and I protest that I am not in favor of free trade. A "free-trade" man is a person described by the gentleman himself in one of the extracts he had read today by the Clerk; that is, he is a person in favor of abolishing custom-houses and allowing unrestricted trade, collecting the revenues of the country from direct taxation either by means of the internal revenue system, or of the land tax prescribed by the Constitution. Very likely there are members of this House who are in favor of free trade. I do not know whether it be so or not. I know that I am not, and I suppose the large majority of the House are tariff men, perhaps all of them are as contradistinguished from free traders. We have now a tariff which yearly yields this Government a revenue of $16,000,000 in gold, and in some years $180,000,000. It is a tariff of an average of forty-seven per cent. upon all dutiable articles. One would think that that was a tariff, as Captain Cuttle would say, "As is a tariff." It yields the largest revenue and averages the highest percentage of any tariff ever upon our statute-book. Can those of us who are indisposed to disturb such a tariff as that be called anti-tariff men? Under what nomenclature is it that the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman upon this floor can call us "anti-tariff" men.

What is this bill which he introduces here as a small bill, to be disposed of in five minutes' consideration, in any half hour when the House may turn its attention to it? Is it a general bill, in which the great industrial interests of this country are considered? By no means. Is it a bill for the purpose of regulating or increasing the revenues of the country under a system which, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has said, has puzzled the wisest statesmen from the formation of this Government to the present time? By no means. It has no pretension of that sort. But it is a bill which apparently comes from a few interests who have got together and persuaded the able and intelligent gentleman who presented it that they are in a suffering condition and should receive from this Congress pecuniary relief. We are asked here upon the heel of this session, after the House has voted to adjourn on the 16th of July, and when the whole House is expecting to get away by the last of this week, to enter upon a new consideration and adjustment of this most difficult and important branch of the public revenues for the benefit of these few local interests. The first one that appeals for our assistance is the copper interest. It is the first named in this bill. Well, how stands the copper interest? In a depressed condition. It asks that you relieve it by raising the price of copper by additional duties? That is the first proposition. What is the effect of it? Why, in the other end of the Capitol the other day a Senator from Michigan stated that one half of the copper produced in this country was consumed by ship-builders, and two gentlemen from Michigan upon this floor [Mr. BLAIR and Mr. DRIGGS] stated that if copper was allowed to come in for the use of ship-builders untaxed, it would destroy the great copper interest of Michigan. Then this proposition which is to be passed now as a matter of great public necessity, is to levy a tax upon the ship-builders along our whole coast for the benefit of the copper interest of Michigan. That is the bold proposition before the House.

Mr. LYNCH. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PIKE. I have but a few minutes, and my colleague must excuse me. I by no means say that either the Senator from Michigan or the Representatives from that State were correct in their statements. I do not place the consumption of copper by ship-builders at so large an amount as they do by any means. But I do say that so far as that consumption is concerned, either for the purpose of coppering vessels or for the purpose of bolting vessels, or any other purpose connected with ship-building, this is simply asking a contribution from the ship-builders of the country for the benefit of the copper producers.

Will gentlemen thus array interest against interest, and if you will do it I ask you as the Representatives of the American people which is the national interest? Is this great interest of commerce that bears our flag to foreign ports of no consequence to you? Are you disposed to drive what little remains of it out of the ocean entirely, and substitute for the stars and stripes the cross of St. George in the few remaining ports where our grand old flag still, in defiance of your legislation, persists in flying, and for the benefit of a manufacturing interest of this character? Is it fair? I submit, gentlemen, is it fair here at the very heel of the session to do that? And am I to be driven out of the tariff church because I object to it?

The next interest that asks relief here is the iron interest. Well, it is nothing new for the iron interest to be discussed here in connection with the tariff. The duty on iron has been run up from time to time, I do not know how high, but it is ever on the ascending grade; and now the question is, shall it go still higher? Of course we use it largely in ship-building, and every dollar of increase of price will be paid partly by ship-builders, who are poor as poverty itself compared with the great iron manufacturers of the country. Is it the policy of the House to make the poor still poorer?

I have no cause of quarrel with iron-workers. I would give them ample protection, but I do claim that consumers have some interest in this matter as well as manufacturers, and that this difficult and delicate matter of adjusting the relative necessities of the two should not be decided now at the heel of the session and under the authority of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is to give the word of command and vote in or vote out propositions as he may dictate, and without regard to what others think of their merits.

Iron is used by everybody, and we should adjust the tariff upon it in general consultation and upon a general bill. I have no idea of aiding anybody in crushing out this great interest, even if it were possible to do so, as it is not; nor do I wish it to crush out the interests of those I represent.

Salt is another of the favorites of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In this bill he increases the duty, already exceedingly large, thirty-three and a third per cent, while lumber, which my constituents produce, and which, no doubt, they would like to have protected, is left at the modest rate of something like twenty per cent., the only change made being from ad valorem to specific duties. I do not complain of the lumber adjustment, but it illustrates the scale of favor which the leading pursuits of my people get as compared with the favored elsewhere.

There is no expectation that this tariff measure, even if it should pass the House, will be considered in the Senate, and it seems but a waste of time to discuss it now. We can more profitably turn our attention to other matters which it is possible for us to consummate before we finally adjourn.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOKS resumed the floor.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman will yield I will move that the committee now rise. It is about time for the committee to rise, considering that we are to have a night session.

Mr. BROOKS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. PIKE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly arose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 1349, to increase the revenue from duties on imports and tending to equalize exports and imports, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 938, to authorize the sale of twenty acres of land in the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The recess having expired, the Speaker resumes the chair, and in the absence of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. CULLOM,] will call to the chair the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. TROWBRIDGE.]

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for debate only. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, believing that the great and overshadowing question of reconstruction is progressing fairly and certainly toward the consummation so anxiously wished for by the loyal men that saved our nation from the parrioidal hands that would have blotted from the roll of nations the name of our fair country; believing, as I said, that the great question whether those who thus endeavored to destroy, by every means in their power, should again hold the places of trust in that Government, or those who in its hour of dark disaster stood by the flag of our fathers, has been decided in favor of the latter, I shall to-day, Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes allotted to me, discuss the question of the currency, that life-blood of every nation; and I do this with diffidence, following in the wake of so many able financiers of this House. And I now frankly confess that I have no new facts or figures, and should any gentleman fancy that he sees his own facts or figures in my argument I trust he will here accept my apology, as this question has been discussed by the statesmen of their respective eras during the past centuries. And in order that we have a clear idea of our position let us look for a moment at the definition involved when we say currency, "expansion of the currency," &c., and a clear understanding of what enters into and makes the currency will settle many of the vexed points now troubling us.

The definition used and quoted for long years until its familiarity has given it much force, is as follows, namely: "Coined gold, silver, and copper, and notes issued by banks or the Government, payable on demand." This definition comes far short of my idea of currency, which is nothing more nor less than any article used to facilitate the exchange of commodities, and I will adopt the definition of Mr. Pitt, "That it consists in anything that answers the great purposes of trade and commerce, whether in specie, paper, or any other term that may be used."

Under this definition, then, or even under the one first quoted, how much currency do we as a nation require? In answering this question we settle most of the great questions of finance, and to answer it by a comparison made between this country and the older countries of Europe, must necessarily be as fallacious. The necessity for an exchanging medium will always be greater in a new and sparsely settled country than in an old and densely populated one. Extent of territory, when that territory is peopled by an energetic business people, adds to the demand. Public improvements, such as railroads, canals, public buildings, and even private improvements, demand and call for more currency, and it is by confining its meaning to the narrow limits of my first definition that we are apt to make mistakes in estimating the amount that the country can carry on demand.

The notes that the Wabash merchant, under the old régime before the war, gave to his New York or Cincinnati jobber for the goods he purchased, were as much a part of the currency as are the greenbacks with which he now makes his purchases; not as safe, but nevertheless currency. Then to determine the amount necessary we must take into consideration the area of our territory, extending across a continent larger than England, France, and Prussia combined, with a net work of railroads unparalleled anywhere. Soon the great iron artery will be spanning our whole country, furnishing the great through route to China. With everything as yet in its infancy and unfinished from the cabin in the far West to our magnificent Capitol above us, farms to be opened, and manufactories building, railroads reaching out here and there with a rapidity unknown anywhere else, no calculation can tell how much we need or can use. You have no past to judge from, for nowhere upon the page of history do you find the counterpart of ours, nor can you institute a comparison with our past. During the last ten years of our history take, for instance, the item of postage. Five times as much postage is paid to-day as was paid ten years ago, consequently five times as much of a circulating medium to transact this little item of business as previously needed. Glance at the table of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNES,] showing how New York stands.

New York may be taken as a representative city of the United States. The business of that city for the past eleven years, as represented by the business of the banks, has been as follows—I give the average per day for three hundred and thirteen days of each year:

1856	$23,278,000
1857	26,968,000
1858	15,393,000
1859	20,867,000
1860	23,401,000
1861	19,269,000
1862	22,237,000
1863	48,428,000
1864	77,984,000
1865	84,796,000
1866	93,541,000
1867	93,101,000

It will here be seen that the business of the country last year was four times in excess of that done in the great speculating year of 1857, six times in excess of 1858, five times greater than in 1861; that it reached the exact point in 1862 which it occupied in 1856; that in 1863 it increased over one hundred per cent.; in 1864 near seventy per cent.; in 1865 ten per cent.; in 1866 ten per cent.

Many believe that the war has largely expanded the currency. I cannot and do not subscribe to this theory. By the war gold and silver are no longer currency, simply bullion merchandise. The system of long credits has gone, I hope, never to return. Previous to the war the merchant of my district purchased his goods from the eastern cities on long credits; these goods were again sold by him to his customers on a credit; the notes of these different parties entering into and for a time forming part of the currency, in extent equal to all the rest. Previous to the war we had in circulation gold, silver, bank notes, checks, notes, &c., to an amount I have no means of ascertaining, but I believe far greater than our present circulation.

You have forced the growth of the last ten years of our country back into its old size, and with what results let the groans of the great

West prove to you as they have been coming up calling for help. You can hear the cries now, as she feels her life's blood being drawn from her veins and her limbs chafed and swollen by the gyves of contraction. In the language of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] you have not done enough by simply leaving the tourniquet as it was; you must loosen it, let in more circulation. Why, pause for an instant and reflect; $200,000,000 of the life-giving current taken away since the close of the war, and you are no nearer specie payment than when the war closed. But, says my hard-money friend, the price of gold proves that we have a redundancy of money. No such thing; if it did we had less when the war closed than now, for gold was lower. When Atlanta fell the currency was reduced, the great cause that made gold go to 280 was the fact that there was a doubt in the minds of some as to our ability to conquer the South; not because we had too much paper, but too little confidence. And this same thing enters into the price of gold to-day, and any return to a gold basis before it is settled will be only at the expense of the people. All values are unsettled by it, and could we by any means return to a specie basis it would only be knocking off one third of the value of every species of property except the debts, public or private. You would take away one third of the debtor's means, while the creditor, Shylock-like, could claim his pound of flesh because it was so denominated in the bond.

I have no words of scorn for the bondholders. They made a good bargain with the Government, as the most of men would have done under similar circumstances. The blame rests alone upon that party and those men who decried the public credit; those men who, in the forum and on the stump, proclaimed that the nation was "dying, dying, dying," until our neighbors believed the cry and thought the dead man's estate would be far from solvent. Upon these rests the odium of this hard bargain. The country needed the money to carry on the war, to buy food and clothing for our soldiers, ammunition for our battle-fields. She had no time to wait, her necessities were immediate and pressing, and she was compelled to make such bargains as she could; but, thank God, the "sick man" is recovering; in spite of evil predictions he is still alive and fast approaching convalescence. There is no doubt of our ability to pay; and now comes the great question of how we shall pay this debt hanging so heavily over us. For one, I am opposed to any repudiation. Not one dollar should be taken from the nation's creditor; but, on the other hand, not one cent should be taken from the nation's coffers and given to the creditor more than stipulated in the bond—"the flesh, but not one drop of blood." But I need not detain the committee to go over the arguments so ably adduced on this floor to prove that a large portion of our bonds, when due, will then be payable in the lawful money of the Government, let that be gold or greenbacks.

For my part I am willing to leave the construction of the contract to the courts and am ready to abide the issue; but to my mind the most serious point to be considered is the manner by which we are to provide the lawful money that is to liquidate these bonds, for a mere change of name without other relief does not reach the disease. Our people are burdened with taxes, pressed down by a weight that must be lightened or it will grow intolerable. How can we best relieve this pressure? Honorable gentlemen say let it alone, and as an argument say that the present generation has done enough; let the next pay the debt. I agree with my learned friends as to the argument; but does letting it alone relieve the present generation? Let any of those in favor of the let-alone policy but take pencil in hand and solve the problem when that debt will pay itself in interest alone at compound interest every six months, with gold at forty, and he will be surprised to find that this generation, by letting the debt alone, will pay it several times in interest and the principal yet remain as a legacy for our children. Raising by taxation enough to pay the debt in less than ten years is not my plan of letting it alone. You might talk of leaving the debt for future generations were it not that it is day by day eating up our substance. We must have some plan to stop so much interest, and then we can let it alone, and in no other way. And now, Mr. Chairman, come the dangerous shoals of our financial course.

I know that many of the wise patriots and financiers of our land believe they see beneath every attempt to relieve the people the murky form of repudiation. For my part the hue and cry has no terror to me, as repudiation can only come when our people are crushed down; until every ray of hope is gone; only by keeping up the interest on the bonds paying the principal in gold; exempt them from taxation; then contract; reduce the currency—the means of the people; and in my opinion you are fast finding the road to universal bankruptcy, from which may be seen leading repudiation. For my part I would issue as many greenbacks as the country can carry; how great that amount may be I will not pretend to say. With these greenbacks I would redeem the five-twenty bonds as they become due; the balance not so redeemed I would refund at a low rate of interest taxable on its face, if not at such a low rate that the people might see that the bondholder was assisting in carrying the burdens of the nation. Bondholders, of course, will cry aloud, but the currency that you force upon our crippled soldiers and the widows and orphans of those who fell that our country might live, certainly ought to be good enough for the bondholder. I believe that the business of the country calls for and requires more currency, and our highest duty to a suffering people is to relieve them as far as is in our power from the crushing load of taxation.

But we are met by the hue and cry of expansion. I am distinctly in favor of expansion. Our country, as well as everything else, must keep pace with our growth as a nation. Already you can see—Brother Jonathan-like—the extremities protruding far beyond the financial unmentionables of our country. No wonder, then, that cold piercing winds cause the body-politic to shiver as we vainly endeavor to make upper and nether garments meet upon our fast-growing body. Expansion is the natural law of currency and a healthy growth as a nation. Hume well says:

"It is of no manner of consequence with regard to the domestic happiness of a State whether money be in greater or less quantity. The good policy of the magistrate consists only in keeping it, if possible, increasing, because by that means he keeps alive a spirit of industry in the nation, and increases the stock of labor, in which consists all real power and riches. A nation whose money decreases is actually at that time weaker and more miserable than another nation which possesses no more money, but is on the increasing hand. This will be easily accounted for if we consider that the alterations in the quantity of money either on the one side or the other is not immediately attended with proportionable alterations in the price of commodities."

The workman has not the same employment from the manufacturer and merchant, though he pays the same price for everything in the market. The farmer cannot dispose of his corn and cattle, though he must pay the same rent to his landlord. The poverty and beggary and sloth which must ensue are easily foreseen. Another English writer says:

"That the greatest distress among the laboring classes of England was in 1816, when gold was par, when the new sovereigns lay at the bankers' uncalled for, and when Spanish dollars sold at four shillings and three pence."

How did our currency stand in 1861? Total amount of gold in country $275,000,000; silver $110,000,000. Total coin $385,000,000. Held by banks and the Government $97,674,507; amount of coin in circulation $287,325,493; bank notes in circulation $202,005,767. Total amount notes and coin in circulation $487,991,260. How stands the currency to-day? Legal tenders and fractional currency, $387,142,457; bank notes, $293,887,941. Total, $681,030,398; but to be deducted from this amount held by banks as reserve $157,430,099; supposed to be held in Treasury probably $45,000,000 more. Total out of circulation, $202,430,099, leaving actual circulation $478,591,299; or $11,399,061 less than the circulation in 1861.

No wonder, then, that the giant of the last six years' growth feels the iron cutting into his flesh as you attempt to force his limbs into the iron boots of contraction.

My plan is to increase our circulation until it will be commensurate with the increase of our country in every other particular.

How stood the figures in 1863? From the best data at hand the New York banks in three years inflated their circulation $185,348,634. If other banks did the same we then had an entire inflation of $700,000,000, which, added to the circulation then out, $535,000,000, would give us $1,200,000,000. And when, financially, did we ever have a better year than 1863? No one broke up; and yet to-day you hear the cry of the dead and dying, financially, all around you.

France has a circulation per capita of thirty-dollars. England twenty-five; and we, with our extent of territory and improvements, certainly require more than either, and the Government should furnish it. The Government credit to-day furnishes the sole basis of the bank currency. I would remodel the national bank system so as to take away the power of issuing bills. I do not propose to blot them out of existence, but to take away that branch of their business, once, perhaps, a necessity, but now an expensive luxury.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. CULLOM.) Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to ask the gentleman where he obtains his data in regard to the circulation of our currency?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I cannot give the particulars now. But I can assure the gentleman they are correct, and that I have obtained my information from authorized sources.

Now, let me illustrate: A goes to B, and in order to assist him to pay his debts, says: "Now, B, you give me your notes for $100,000 and pay me the interest and I will loan you $90,000 of my notes that your indorsement will make good, and you can pay your debts with them." Now, if A's credit is better than B's he may in this manner get rid of his notes easier. But if he is solvent and pays his notes and interest promptly, how much has he made by the transaction, as he has only borrowed of A $10,000 more than he returns to him, with this difference, that on the total amount of his own notes he pays six per cent. interest in gold while A pays nothing on his notes given in exchange? Then, as is readily seen, B is paying for the use of $10,000 the interest on the entire $100,000, that is sixty per cent. in gold on the $10,000, and this privilege of loaning is rendered a monopoly by restricting the amount of bank capital so that only a few have this golden opportunity.

I believe that Government alone should furnish the currency of the country, thereby saving millions in interest now paid banks for furnishing a currency that without Government indorsement would not be worth a farthing. And just in proportion as you change the bonds into greenbacks have you settled the question of taxation of bonds. The greenbacks entering into circulation can be taxed as so much money on hand without difficulty; and while you are reducing the taxes you are increasing the taxable property. That the bonds are to be taxed either directly or indirectly seems to be a foregone conclusion. Whether it is policy to tax the people of one State to be paid into the coffers of another is at least of doubtful propriety. The retention of one per cent. for distribution to the State can only result in this. The States paying the largest share of the taxes, either by internal revenue or by tariff, are to be the losers. You can hardly delude the people into believing that it is right that the heavy tax-paying communities of the North shall be taxed to distribute to the southern States. Indiana may be allured by the glittering bait of $900,000 to be paid into her coffers by the General Government; but when she finds that this has been drawn from her hard earnings, and an additional sum to be paid as a bonus to southern States, she will spurn your offer. You may compare the tax tables and prove to them that the older States pay all the taxes, and she will in answer show that we of the West, the consumers, are the ones that after all bear the burden; we may not pay the tax to the collector, but we do to the manufacturer and the importer. Every cup of coffee, every draught of tea, the coat worn, and the wagons driven, have, by their enhanced value, paid the tax that is under this proposition given to the support of the South, and she will repudiate your plan as equally unjust to the East and the West. You can tax the bonds directly more honestly than by this method. And in connection with this point I wish to allude to the bill lately introduced by my colleague [Mr. HUNTER] on this subject.

The first section provides for an issue of a new bond; principal and interest payable in gold at six per cent., interest payable semi-annually, one per cent. to be retained and paid to the States in lieu of taxes; the holders of five-twenty bonds to be allowed to exchange their bonds for these, or refusing to do so are to be forced to take greenbacks. This bond is simply a five per cent. bond, interest and principal guaranteed in coin. If my colleague had reflected for a moment he would have seen that we had a similar bond already out, the ten-forty; and let us see how much the bondholder has been obliged to disgorge, how much he pays for converting a greenback bond into coin and that coin-bond protected from taxation; he is forced to take a bond that now is quoted above par; for by looking at the market quotations of bonds in New York you will see the five per cent. ten-forties above par. Should the gentleman be so lucky as to secure the passage of his bill, not a bondholder in the country but will see that he has achieved a glorious victory. He has changed his uncertain bond into coin.

The bill proposes to settle the dispute as to whether the principal of the five-twenties is payable in gold or currency by agreeing to pay gold, and in return for this the bondholder deducts one per cent. interest. How stands the bargain, taking it for granted that the bonds are payable in lawful currency? Say the bonds are, in round numbers, $2,000,000,000 and gold forty per cent., then the gold value of the bonds would be $1,428,571,428. Then to settle this matter we give $571,500,000 in gold, and to compensate us for this we deduct one per cent. of the interest. Let us see how much that would be. One per cent. on the principal, $2,000,000,000, having fifteen years to run, would be $30,000,000 per annum. The present worth of an annuity of that kind would be far less than $200,000,000, that is, the Government gets $200,000,000 while the bondholder gets $571,428,572, the bondholder making by the bargain the snug little sum of $371,428,572 in gold, and he has escaped what the people demand, that the bondholder's property should share the burdens of the Government.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Does the bondholder in this case get more than the Government agreed to pay him for the money he advanced?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I think he does. I believe the five-twenty bonds are payable in greenbacks.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Then it ought to be corrected by the Supreme Court of the United States, or by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. If the gentleman had been here when I began my speech, he would have heard me say that I thought the matter should be left to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BURLEIGH. There I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The difference between us is that I believe I will beat him when I get to the Supreme Court.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Do the people demand repudiation of the national debt?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The people do not demand repudiation, and the only way to save repudiation is to make all the property of the country pay taxes equally. If that is repudiation, then I am for repudiation.

Mr. BURLEIGH. No doubt of it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. If it is proposed to tax a part of the property of the people to protect the property of another part of the people, then I am opposed to it.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Did the Government agree to give greenbacks to the man who came forward in the hour of its need and loaned the Government the gold he had earned and saved?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The Government made the man take greenbacks who risked his life in its defense, and when they made the pension list they promised him the same they promised the bondholder; and today they make him take greenbacks. What is the superior merit of the bondholder who took bonds at forty cents on the dollar that he should be preferred to the soldier of the war and his widow?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: the Government having taken my gold and agreed to repay me in gold, am I to be required to take payment in greenbacks at forty cents below par?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. That is exactly what I say, that where the Government agreed to pay in gold it will pay in gold; but where the contract is otherwise it will pay in the same currency in which it pays the rest of its debts. The Government did not come and beg the soldier to go into the ranks; it said, "You shall go."

Mr. BURLEIGH. I was not a soldier-broker or anything of the kind. It was gold that I gave, and not soldiers; and the Government agreed to pay me in gold.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. If the gentleman had been a soldier, and had given his blood for the preservation of the Government, he would appreciate the difference between a bondholder and a soldier, and he would realize the injustice of distinctions in favor of the bondholder as against the soldier.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Chairman, I understand the situation of my friend. He is, as I understand, a candidate for reelection in his State. Hence I will not interrupt him further.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken, as he has been all the way through. I am no candidate for anything. I am only standing up for the rights of the people as against a portion of the people who, through false pretenses, have, in the late Democratic convention, attempted to foist upon us Seymour and a bondholder's party.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Does the gentleman suppose for one moment that I advocate that party or its candidate? I would sooner affiliate with the devil and his host. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that he does not affiliate with that party. I was fearful that he had been affiliating with the party that nominated Seymour at the New York convention.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The gentleman certainly had no ground for any such suspicion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I was certainly justified in thinking that the man who could stand on this floor and boast that he had obtained more official appointments at the hands of Andrew Johnson than any other man, would support that party.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Does the gentleman from Indiana boast of anything of that kind?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I do not say who made such a boast. I leave it for the gentleman to say.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The remarks of the gentleman are a fitting commentary on his loyalty and fidelity. I never made any boast of that kind.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I resume my remarks at the point where I was interrupted.

Not a single greenback will be added to the currency under this bill, for greenbacks are being daily exchanged for a similar bond and a premium paid. The only result arising from this bill will be this: under the guise of giving the country more greenbacks you provide the means by which our only chance to pay our indebtedness in lawful money will be closed entirely and a guarantee given that the bondholder will not be taxed. The people will not be so easily hoodwinked. You must either tax your new bonds as other property is taxed or you must reduce the rate of interest so that it will be plainly seen that the holders of the bonds are doing something for the Government. What rate of tax does many on-hand notes at interest pay in your several States, and then answer why these bonds should only pay one per cent. For my part four per cent. is as high as I can be got to go if you are to exempt them from taxation. What is the difficulty? Now, in the West the Government has been paying too high a rate of interest until all the surplus is locked up in bonds. Suppose a farmer wants to borrow a thousand dollars by mortgaging his farm, he cannot find an opportunity, for he is met at every hand by the response, "My money is in bonds at six per cent. in gold, equal to nine per cent. in currency, and no tax. If I take your note I will be taxed from two to three per cent." No wonder he refuses to change the investment, for many cannot and ought not to bear any such rate.

The last clause of the sixth section of the bill under review [Mr. HUNTER'S] is as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and empowered to collect from duties upon imports only such proportion of the same in coin as may be necessary to meet the obligations of the United States which are payable in coin, and the residue he shall receive in the lawful currency of the United States.

And I here enter my solemn protest against legislating upon the tariff bill in this covert manner. Here is a proposition to reduce the tariff just in proportion as the amount so collected should bear to the whole and the price of gold, in other words, gold now at forty per cent. If one half the customs are collected in greenbacks, it will reduce the tariff on everything twenty per cent. Now, those manufacturers who claim that they are only kept alive by protection, will by this fell swoop have that protection taken away; but the West complains not so much of the tariff, but of the unjust discrimination against our western products. How will it be with our grain, our pork, our beef, now just sufficiently protected as to keep out Canada? By this reduction you open the markets of New York and New England to Canada. Articles of luxury, now but little taxed, instead of being increased, decreased; all the mistakes and blunders of our present tariff made more glaring. What we need is a reduction of interest, equal taxation, a fair and judicious tariff, and time will take care of our national debt and solve our financial trouble.

Mr. BLAIR addressed the committee on the issues of the present political campaign. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. ELA. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity, lest I may not get another, to say a word in defense of a vote given on the resolution of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB], and the bill so ungraciously reported by the Committee of Ways and Means taxing the interest on Government bonds ten per cent. These bonds now bear comparatively none of the burdens of the country, and their exemption from taxation causes great dissatisfaction and discontent which ought in some way to be remedied. They are not allowed to be taxed under State authority, because the right to tax is without limit as to rate or amount, and might be used by States adversely to destroy the whole credit of the Government.

The power of the General Government to tax bonds is unquestioned. The acts of Congress only prohibited taxation by or under State authority. We have taxed the income from bonds for the last six years, and if we have no right to do so that tax ought to be refunded. We are proposing no new principle by taxing incomes unequally.

The first year of internal revenue taxation incomes from Government bonds were taxed one and one half per cent., while incomes from other sources were taxed three per cent. Subsequently incomes under $5,000 were taxed five per cent. while incomes above $5,000 were taxed ten per cent., which is the amount fixed in this bill to tax interest on these bonds, and which is, in my judgment, rather below than above the amount we ought to impose.

All our taxes have been laid unequally, and with regard to whether the commodity to be taxed was an article of luxury or necessity, and in proportion to its supposed ability to bear taxation. We have taxed shoes and leather two per cent., woolen fabrics two and one half per cent., paper three per cent., cotton manufactures five per cent., and whisky five hundred per cent. Congress having the right to tax, it is confined by no limits but such as justice, expediency, and necessity impose.

Justice requires that the present bonds should be taxed that the burdens upon property may be equalized, or that a new bond should be immediately issued bearing a low rate of interest to reduce the expenses of the Government. A new bond will not be easily put upon the market. Persons who get six per cent. in gold will not take less willingly. Those who have fastened themselves upon the revenues of the country and are sucking its life-blood will not release their grasp unless enticed to by the same measures which were taken to entice State banks out of existence to make way for national banks. Expediency requires that exemption from taxation, which has already caused discontent and dissatisfaction and raised the banner of repudiation shall no longer continue. But few comparatively would repudiate, yet the fact that some propose it had better be heeded in season. We must bear in mind that to those discontented we must add those who were engaged in the rebellion, who will never willingly pay for being whipped. Their allies in sympathy will pay, if at all, grudgingly. The interests of bondholders require that bonds should bear just taxation, and an over-taxed people require it.

I notice that the press, who are par excellence the defenders of the bond interest, are free to denounce all who would tax bonds as repudiators. They raise the idiotic cry if you have the power and right to tax ten per cent. you have a right to tax fifty or a hundred per cent.; granted. But does it follow that because you have the power to do an unjust thing that you will therefore do it? We taxed all manufactures five per cent. We had a right to do it. Did it therefore follow that we should tax them one hundred per cent. instead of removing it altogether, as we did when it became oppressive? Am I to be branded as a repudiator because I am tired of seeing the sons of toil bending their backs to the sun and their faces to the earth, building highways and keeping them in repair, and may only look up to see their bondholding neighbor roll by in his coach and exempt from that burden? Am I to be branded as a repudiator because I am unwilling to see the poor man's children kept in ignorance and at toil to build school-houses and provide schools for the bondholder's children, while he makes no contribution to that object? And worse than that, to pay the policeman who stands guard over the bondholder's safe, while I have a right to tax him, and am following established precedents by doing it. The whole debtor community have had one third added to their interest by exemption from taxation, and high rates of interest on bonds. It has also vastly increased taxation by the high rates of interest States, counties, and towns have to pay on their indebtedness.

If we fail to tax bonds others will take our places to do it, or to repudiate. Bondholders are interested to the amount of their bonds in defeating repudiation. It is therefore for their interests to have the bonds taxed to remove discontent and dissatisfied agitation, and many of the heaviest bondholders in my district have urged upon me the justice and necessity of their taxation.

Taxing in the form presented in the resolution is in accordance with the precedents both here and abroad, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COBB] had hardly introduced his resolution when the ocean wires flashed to us the information that the debtor nations of Europe were taxing the interest on their debt in the same manner as he proposed, only at a much higher rate. By taxing in this form now much clamor and agitation of the subject will be removed from the presidential contest, and the necessity of a new loan rendered less imperative during that contest. A new loan involves delay—involves undiminished burdens during that delay—involves the question of paying bonds in coin or paper, and the expense of negotiation; all of which will be better matured and considered after than during a presidential contest.

The bugbear that foreigners will send back their bonds which pay them five per cent. or more, while the rates of interest, according to the tables of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] are two per cent. in London, one and one half per cent. in Paris, three per cent. in Berlin, two and one half per cent. in Frankfurt, three per cent. in Amsterdam, and two per cent. in Hamburg, may frighten the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who presented it; but it ought not to prevent the House from doing an act of justice in providing additional revenue from a source better able to bear taxation than any other.

If these bonds come back it is so much the better. It will check importations and give additional employment to our own labor. They ought never to have gone abroad, and did not to any extent until the war was over. We have received in exchange for them imported luxuries which our people had been better without, and which have tended to depress our labor while being taxed to pay interest abroad.

Tax these bonds as they should be, and the rates of interest paid by States, municipalities, and individuals will be lessened, and all State and local taxation will be lessened. If it is not done labor and business must continue to sink and stagger under the enormous load until the evil corrects itself by business reverses and financial disaster, strewing their wrecks on every hand. Then by leaving capital idle and labor unemployed the payment of the debt, otherwise certain, will be subject to doubt.

Mr. JULIAN spoke on the policy of land bounties and in defense of the existing homestead system. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Chairman, when the civil war between the North and South terminated, chaos ruled supreme in the latter. State governments there were literally "without form and void," if those States were to be regarded as subjugated territory, and not a parcel of our common country existing under and by virtue of our Constitution. That they were a part and parcel of that country, and that they did exist under that Constitution, had never been denied by any one of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government. Congress, the Supreme Court, and the Executive had, time and again, by resolutions, decisions, and proclamations, asserted and reasserted that they were within the Union of the States and must then remain as States. It was in pursuance of this doctrine that President Johnson, soon after his accession to the Presidency, proceeded to restore order where this chaos reigned, by reacknowledging the rights of the States. Occupying the position of Commander-in-Chief of the armies, and martial law still prevailing, he spoke to those States as Commander-in-Chief when he said to them that slavery had ceased to exist in fact; but he at the same time showed the necessity of action on the part of the States themselves before it could legally cease to exist. His democratic training had instilled this doctrine of the rights of the States firmly into his mind—rights of the States, I mean, under the Constitution and within the Union.

The southern people, acknowledging the results of the war and wearied with its fearful carnage, appalled by their desolated homes and threatened with starvation, hastened to avail themselves of the opportunity to return to their allegiance—not sullenly, but cheerfully; so cheerfully that northern people and northern capital flowed into their midst and were welcomed warmly. Peace and quiet reigned supreme where a few months before the dreadful carnage of war had prevailed. This peace and this tranquility proved the humanity, patriotism, and statesmanship of Andrew Johnson. A man of the people, he knew their wants; a lover of the Constitution, he knew that adherence to its principles would accomplish the desired end. Would to God that his humane, patriotic, and statesmanlike plan had been adhered to, and that this poor, bleeding country, North and South, had been allowed to return to the old fraternal feeling. Would to God that the same chivalrous feeling which, on the termination of the war, animated the soldiers who had fought on both sides, had animated our law-givers. Had it been so, we should then have challenged the admiration of the civilized world, and the people of this great Republic would have been spared an untold amount of suffering.

No one doubts that it was the desire of President Johnson that the war should so terminate. No one doubts that it was the desire of those patriotic Republicans who joined the great Conservative party of the country that the war should so terminate. No one doubts that it was the desire of the great Democratic party that the war should so terminate. No one will doubt, in next November, that the great masses of the people of this country desire that it shall so terminate.

Who, then, prevented the consummation of this desirable end? I do not hesitate to say the Radical part of the Republican party. And for what purpose was this interference? Simply to retain in their grasp the power and patronage of the Government by the enfranchisement of an ignorant and degraded race. By the elevation of this race to the elective franchise all obstacles were to be swept from their way to power. The plan, revolutionary as it was, was to be carried out to the desired consummation let the consequences be what they might. If a twinge of conscience stole in the soul of one of their number who still retained a vestige of love for the old landmarks of liberty, he was to be upbraided with a taunt that he had "splinters from the ghost of the old Constitution sticking in his kidney." If a general of the Army, like the gallant Hancock, asserted the cardinal doctrine of a free Republic, that the military should be subservient to the civil authorities in times of peace, or that the writ of habeas corpus should be respected, he was to be dropped from the Army roll by the passage of a law over the President's veto. If the Supreme Court dare intimate its intention of maintaining its proper dignity by considering the constitutionality of one of their laws, then special legislation was to be resorted to for the purpose of depriving that court of its jurisdiction. If the President asserted his constitutional prerogative, he, too, was to be assailed and hurled from his place, to make way for some supple tool who would bow the pliant knee to their tyranny.

In this contest for power the Republican party resembles in their recklessness Sampson of old when led into the temple of the Philistines. He, blind with fury and hate against the surrounding masses, who scoffingly looked upon him and upbraided him for the loss of power and strength which his own folly had destroyed, stood between the mighty pillars of that temple, and rending them asunder all perished in one vast ruin. As Sampson seized those pillars even so did the Republican party seize upon the two great pillars which are the supports of our temple. I mean the Supreme Court and the Executive. By the power still left in this party they have striven and are still striving to uproot those pillars from their foundations and overwhelm at one fell swoop the masses of the American people. But not like the Philistines of old do those masses stand idly and listlessly by, to see themselves crushed by a hydra-headed monster. Andrew Johnson, placed by his countrymen as a sentinel upon a watch-tower, sounded the tocsin which woke them from their lethargy. Thus aroused, they spoke from the eastern boundaries of Maine to the western shores of California to show that "there was life in the old land yet." And from that time the mighty hosts of freemen of this great Republic have been heaving and surging and gathering their strength for the coming struggle. That struggle, sir, will vindicate alike the intelligence, the manhood, and the love of liberty which ever have animated and ever will animate the Anglo-Saxon race.

We have stood for the last few months upon the verge of a precipice, a dark abyss of anarchy yawning at our feet. This giant Republican party hoped by one last wild effort to throw off the life-sustaining restraints of the Constitution of our fathers. This was to be done by the impeachment and displacement of the constitutional head of our Government. They would then arrogate to themselves, as an oligarchy, all the powers of the Government. In other words, the aim was to establish just such a power in the Congress as was usurped by the Assembly of France during the reign of terror. But do any of them for a moment dream that, along with the attainment of such a power, they may also reach the fame and fate of Danton, Robespierre, and Marat, their counterparts in French history?

That power, like that which existed in the French Assembly, was not attained, is due to the wisdom of the framers of our Constitution, who wisely gave us two branches of the legislative department. The one to act as a check on the other. The Senate, thank God, existed, and stood as an effectual barrier against the rushing storm to check "the waters wild" of this storm. The Senate saved the Republic at least for the time. The Senate saved a patriot, and in saving him from partisan persecution they have made for themselves names which will be revered by generations yet to come. The Senate, by their verdict, have given peace and quiet to the North, and the people in the coming contest will, by the election of a Democratic President, give such a verdict against the misdoings of those now legislating as will revive the desolated South, and she will be again the "sunny land," with blooming fields and happy homes. She will once more be brought fairly and equally into the sisterhood of States, and cause the wealth of Europe, and even of the Celestial Empire, to flow into our coffers, and thence into the hands of our laboring artisans.

As "straws show us which way the wind blows," so the recalling of one or two little occurrences here may serve to illustrate the intensity of the hatred entertained by the impeachers against the President. Foiled in their plot of ruining him, they immediately cast about them for minor objects on which to wreak their long pent-up vengeance. A few days since, by resolution of the two Houses, a room was furnished and fitted up in the Capitol that an accomplished woman might there, without danger of interruption, pursue her noble and ennobling profession in the interest of the nation. In the midst of her quiet labors, although guaranteed by Congress against disturbance, behold her charged upon most furiously by "a gallant band of brothers from the old"—impeachment clique, supposed to be more capable of conducting this sort of campaign than the kind in which they had just failed so signally as managers. The reason for this sudden onslaught upon Miss Vinnie and her helpless statues, the casus belli, so soon after a solemn treaty of peace, was the fact that she—although her sentiments are said to have accorded with those of the Republican party—had refused to truckle to extreme Radical behests or to work the wires of the impeachment machinery. To this bold charge these iconoclastic woman-fighters were unflinchingly led by a doughty warrior who has ever shown himself eager for such a fray. Although the concussions produced on Fortress Freedom by the violent explosions of his wrath, on this occasion appeared to the veteran sentinels on duty far more startling than formidable; yet poor woman and poor art were terrified, and fled appalled before the fiendish charge and the brimstone cloud. The frenzied and persistent attempts of this great champion of the "woolly-head" to ride the woolly-horse were not quite so successful; and, unless he beware the former, though more docile just now than the mule ridden by a still greater general and sometimes bottle-corker in his strolling boyhood, may throw him at the November races.

The plan of reconstruction which President Johnson proceeded to carry out in May, 1865, was the ideal one previously agreed upon by Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet in accordance with the views then entertained by the Republican party. The States yielded ready obedience to the conditions imposed, and up to this point all moved smoothly toward restoration. The old constitutional lights, which had been dimmed by war clouds and threatened with total extinction, blazed forth again; old land-marks loomed up once more in the hazy distance, and lent their friendly guidance to wanderers over the benighted waste. But the Republican party, just here, snuffed danger. They knew that after the nation's long winter of discontent, the fruition of a spring-like peace would be to them but bitter, or, like Dead Sea apples, become ashes on their lips. They knew that the scepter of power must slip from their grasp and pass into the hands of their untiring foe, the great constitutional party of the North. It was at that critical juncture that they made a closer league with the powers of darkness. It was then that they concocted the hell-broth of African rule, and gloatingly stirred it into the political cauldron. They are now dancing, hug-like, around it as they administer the paralyzing potion with no stinted hand to the best, the bravest of the southern people.

It has been said that to crush the rebellion nearly a half million men lost their lives. Three years of almost uninterrupted Radical rule have followed, and thus far with what results? Three momentous results, indeed. We see now a truckling, mongrel platform, without an infinitesimal portion of patriotism, justice, or magnanimity in it, substituted for the glorious Constitution of better days; and while the dark hues of bondage have in one sense been lightened by the substitution of white slavery for black, the nation's hopes have been thereby most hideously darkened. It has been customary with those in authority to refer for guidance to the acts of their predecessors. With what degree of safety to the liberties of the people, to the observance of constitutional guarantees, or to the stability of the Government, can future parties, as they come into power, regard as guiding precedents the congressional acts of the last two or three years? Why, each party, as soon as it obtained sway, would, were such examples followed, throw everything into chaos; and, although the people might rise each time in their boasted majesty and vote them out and a new party in, it would be, at best, but exchanging one chaotic condition for another—the Radical for the Democratic, or the reverse, as the case might be; the void and formless monster would still brood above the waters.

In the name of justice and peace and national prosperity; in the name of good government, ay, of any government in contradis-tion to this ruinous anarchy that menaces our favored land; a land that has been, and may be again, the hope of the world and the terror of oppressors; but most of all, in the sacred name of the constitutional republican Government established by our ancestors; honored by their faithful observance; hallowed and sealed by their blood; in the name of five millions of suffering people; their homes desolated, hearts crushed, hopes blighted; in the name of all these I appeal, through its constituted and acknowledged leaders here assembled, to the great Radical party; a few years ago unborn from the womb of time, but lately Titan for strength; breaking from its bonds; shaking the land with its strides of progress; knocking fetters from millions and welding them on double the number; wresting scepters from sovereign States; sweeping those States themselves from existence and blotting out their lines in blood. I appeal to this great power in the land to say where, with those glaring examples of high-handed usurpation on record for the use of unscrupulous factions, ever prompt and eager to avail themselves of precedents in justification of contemplated villainies; where and when and how is such chaotic state to have an end? Do they envy and would they fain perpetuate here the condition of our wretched neighbors of Mexico? All hope of peace and order solemnly promised, but indefinitely postponed on each accession of a new party to power; a chronic, mortal anarchy ranking in the nation's heart eating out its very life; pillage, oppression, and reeking murder eternally ramping through the land. Can such be the condition they have in store for this proud people, this model Republic?

In this gigantic and unscrupulous struggle of the Republican party for power thousands and tens of thousands of whites—most of them men of intelligence and education—have been practically disfranchised in the South, while more than that number of ignorant, imbruted, vagrant, penniless negroes have been suddenly invested with the right of suffrage. And for what have this abject race been thus clothed with new rights, of which their enlightened masters have been so ignominiously stripped? Perchance, to reward their loyalty. Did they give any appreciable proof of loyalty during the war? On the contrary, they toiled and sweated, if they did not bleed, in aid of the rebellion; and although numbering two thirds as many as the whole white population; although, in numerous instances, inhabiting sections of country many miles in extent, where scarcely a southern soldier was to be seen for months, they never struck a blow for freedom. There was not, throughout the whole war, a single instance of even the feeblest attempt at insurrection. Thus did the negro falsify even in the "glorious" hour of his emancipation one of the noblest of sentiments, a sentiment hitherto accepted by none more cordially than by his present eulogists and vindicators—

"Who would be free, himself must strike the blow."

Was it done for the Union, for which this race cared not, and never will care, a copper's toss? Far from it; in truth, the very reverse of this. Their real aim, as is now well understood by all and pretty generally conceded by themselves, was to keep the country in a state of disruption until their party might be able to secure permanent control. Instead of investing those half million negroes with the right to vote had they doubly enfranchised as many intelligent whites of the North by giving each one of them two votes it would have been, for decency's sake, far better, and would have accomplished their fell purpose quite as effectually. Would the northern people have endured this? And yet the wrong inflicted thereby on the remaining voters of that section and the shock to good government would not have been one whit greater.

To show how insatiable is their lust of power and to what a fearful length it goads them on for spoils, a recent occurrence may be briefly referred to. A prominent member of the Radical party in answer to a direct query put to him during debate, declared, without shame or even hesitation, that the condition imposed by his party for the removal of disabilities from southern whites was, virtually, that they would vote the Radical ticket. Now, as to the admission of the African race to a prominent share in the conducting of our political affairs, this outrage has been blindly consummated in the face of certain disastrously resulting experiments made by pseudo-philanthropists and ignorant, wretched, vicious fanatics. The tottering relics of these miserably abortive governments, the fruits of these experiments, still stand; yet they stand only as a butt for satire, for true philanthropy a warning beacon, for civilization a reproach. They are a stench in the nostrils of the world, and if such absurd innovations of mongrelism here, such wild ingraftments on our political stock, be not speedily receded from, the repetition of Jamaica and St. Domingo must needs be upon us; and the black incubus that now weighs so horribly on the South must soon cause her to sleep the "sleep that knows no waking."

With the same object they gagged the judiciary, and wrested from the Executive the clear constitutional right of selecting the heads of Departments, who are not only his counselors, but his agents, for whose acts he alone is held responsible, and have aimed in various other ways to curtail and abolish his rightful powers. Why should they tamper thus by degrees with the Constitution and the Government? Why not at one fell blow destroy them both, then merge the three branches into one—a result to which all their acts have lately tended—by legislative enactment, and dub that one "the Congressional oligarchy of the free and independent States of America?"

The most solemn obligations imposed by the Constitution are no longer regarded when expediency demands their infraction; and, for all that Constitution can ever avail the country while under Radical rule, it may as well be at once buried away out of sight. But let the undertakers of this melancholy sepulture perform it with a solemnity befitting the momentous occasion. Perhaps some "suppressed" judicial ermine might be obtained as a shroud. The coffin might be appropriately made of slivers from the charter-oak, or the parchment of poor habeas corpus, if there is no further use for it, or the door of the Woolley bastle. Let the pall-bearers be the district satraps, both past and present, with a few of the Republican leaders from the Capitol here, if, indeed, they have respect enough left for the deceased to accord a decent burial, or sympathy befitting the sad office. Let the chief mourners be the southern States, (for heaven knows they have chief cause to mourn this illustrious dead,) and let them be represented at the grave by as many sad-faced maidens draped in the habiliments of woe. The border States might follow these, their tweeds not quite so black; then the great throng of the sorry and indifferent, the glad and the gay, mixed and merged, like all funeral crowds when the great have departed. Let the solemn cavalcade then pass beneath the shadow of the Bunker Hill shaft, where it is no longer likely Mr. Toombs will call the roll of his slaves. Let them pause there a while, and call a far different roll, that of the great fathers of the deceased Constitution and of those famous signers who hurled defiance at King George, and hear or imagine their answer from the spirit world. Let them then wind through the inevitable hub of the Juggernaut, whose wheel has so horribly mangled the deceased, and proceed to Plymouth Rock. Out of this a sarcophagus might be hollowed for its reception, and some of the "loyal" New England clergy—some of the far famed "three thousand"—might be induced to read the burial service, and offer up a "petition" (this time to Heaven, and not to Congress) as earnest and no doubt as sincere as the old one, that the defunct may rest in peace and never rise.

Now, seeing the danger which impends this great charter, let us inquire what is the object of the Constitution, (of all constitutions, in fact,) or, rather, what was its object, since it is to be, at least for a little while, a thing of the past? It cannot be designed for the protection of the majority, for they are self-protecting. It is to shield the weak against the strong. Take away this guarantee, and the minority have no earthly appeal from oppression. It is then a mere mob that rules. But the Republican party have found a precious though it seems a rather fluctuating substitute for the Constitution. That substitute is any platform (amended, altered, and juggled to suit immediate and pressing party necessities) by which they may hope to retain their supremacy. Their cardinal doctrine is that the majority may, without any curb or check whatsoever, do even as they will. As was done in times of full Puritanical sway, they virtually resolve, first, the world is the Lord's and the fullness thereof, (which most probably means the "spoons" of office;) secondly, what is the Lord's belong to His saints; and thirdly, we are His saints.

Now, let us examine the platform which, if the Radical party be continued in power, is to supersede the Constitution. To the most of it the sarcastic utterance of a great Frenchman is peculiarly appropriate. "The object of language," said he, "is to conceal our ideas." Some portions of it, had it not been adopted in solemn conclave, might well be regarded as ironical, and might have enabled it to pass as one of the grandest jokes of the age. Take the first paragraph:

"We congratulate the country on the assured success of the reconstruction policy of Congress, as evinced in the adoption in the majority of the States lately in rebellion of constitutions securing equal civil and political rights to all," &c.

Now, even the Republicans themselves—at least such of them as are not either fanatical or demented, or utterly unhumanized—must feel in their hearts and consciences, whatever policy may prompt their tongues to say, that with two exceptions there is not a gleam of truth in that whole paragraph. One of these exceptions is that the convention really do "congratulate the country;" but it is just as though one individual might congratulate another on having been robbed by him, delicately suppressing the fact that he is soon to be also hung, or destroyed in some other way. The other exception is that "constitutions were adopted in a majority of the States lately in rebellion"—adopted in the States, not by them. Mark that well; it speaks volumes: adopted in the States by carpet-baggers and vagabond negroes; even the unscrupulous Radicals, then, have not the hardihood to contend that these infamous constitutions were adopted by those States but only in them.

Paragraph the seventh abounds in the same species of sarcasm. The assertion that "corruptions call for radical reform," emanating, as it does, from that incorruptible source, is withering; the play upon the word radical, and its juxtaposition to reform, is quite inimitable.

In the twelfth paragraph, where "the convention declares its sympathy with all oppressed peoples," and in the last, where it recognizes "the great principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence as the foundation of democratic government," the irony becomes so glaring that the wonder is the convention did not organize some of its trained ferrets into a "smelling committee" to spy out whether there might not be a traitor in their camp in the person of the member—whichever he might be—that drafted the platform. Was he not endeavoring to "sell" them? The more especially should they have suspected this as there is another fine piece of pleasantry perpetrated here, and this time upon the word democratic, as before upon the word radical: "The great principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence are the foundation of democratic government." How scathing to them who adopted the platform! for while it cannot possibly, in consistence with truth, refer to the Radical party, it is, in every respect, applicable to their opponents.

Paragraphs ninth and eleventh are simply a bid for the foreign vote, with a swagger and a shaking of the fist in John Bull's face; for, with all the powers of the Government in their hands; they have done nothing. The eighth is such a wide plank and occupies such a conspicuously central position in the platform as to necessitate the belief that it was constructed by some one whose vindictive wrath had been foiled, or whose chances for political preferment had been hopelessly blasted by the sudden collapse of the impeachment bubble, pricked by seven Republican free-lancers. It sounds like the last growlings of a baffled fiend when he has failed to drag down to perdition an innocent victim, whose high estate he envied, on whose ruin he has built his hopes, and gloatingly set his malignant heart. The concerted growl of their sanction, as it rang around the walls of the menageries when read to them, may be better imagined than described. President Johnson is therein denounced as a villain of the deepest dye. He is called a usurper, a traitor, a wholesaler in corruption, and a dabbler in moral filth generally. Such are some of the vituperative and indecent expressions applied to the great head of the nation, merely because he will not debase himself to their level or be molded to their sinister designs. And these foul-mouthed maligners are the same, or cordially indorsed by the same, who have lately arrogated to themselves, with sanctimonious hypocrisy, to inculcate upon others the use of what they are pleased to style "decorous language." There surely should have been a special paragraph inserted recommending that this exceedingly courteous style of theirs should henceforth be adopted as a model of decorum in all communications between the three great coördinate branches of the Government.

This eighth paragraph also professes that they "profoundly deplore the untimely death of Abraham Lincoln." This they do just about as sincerely as they would "deplore" the sudden demise of Andrew Johnson at this time; the latter having simply endeavored to carry out, in good faith, the pledges to which the whole Radical party, with Abraham Lincoln at their head, had, time after time, committed themselves. For, with the recent history of that party before us, no one can doubt that had Mr. Lincoln persisted in executing the then fully indorsed reconstruction measures of his party, which there is every reason to believe he would have done, the blot of infamy attempted to be affixed to his name would have been of as deep and damning a dye as in the case of his successor.

The tenth paragraph says, "Of all who were faithful in the trials of the late war, there were none entitled to more especial honor than the brave soldiers and seamen." Now, the ironical man, the traitor in the Chicago camp, has been along here, too; the mark of his slimy trail is visible all over this plank; there is one little word among those just quoted which is unmistakably in the interest of their opponents. "There were none," the sentence reads, "entitled to more especial honor than the brave soldiers and seamen." We are justifiable in inferring from this that although there were none there are some entitled to more honor than the soldiers and sailors; but they are not content that we shall merely infer this; for a few days since, in an election held under the very shadow of this Capitol, they gave us a substantial illustration of it by excluding from the count all the soldiers' tickets on which, as they slid them into the ballot-box, they had slyly scratched, with their hyena claws, an "ear-mark" of infamy by which they were identified as soldiers' votes when the counting commenced. These soldiers had been duly registered, and the recognition of this "ear-mark" afterward was sufficient to cause the rejection of every ticket so branded.

The truth is they were thought to be Radicals when registered, and it was cheerfully done; when they came to vote, however, their politics were suspected and their tickets were marked; and as soon as they were known to have been cast in the opposing interest, and that their exclusion from the count was absolutely necessary to secure the election of the Radical candidates, they were unhesitatingly excluded. The veteran soldiers are thus denied, without the slightest investigation, all share in the government of the nation's capital, which they saved from destruction; while the bloated vagabonds of Africa are allowed to hold the city's destinies in the hollow of their hand, and the burning infamy indorsed by Congress! How appropriate, then, how consistent for once, were these Jacobins in substituting the past tense for the present; for soldiers are verily with them among the things that were. Is it not well known that the President has been foiled times without number by the Senate in his efforts to appoint to office such men as the gallant Slocum, the dashing Blair, and renowned McClellan, who had bravely fought to put down the rebellion; men whose only offense was that after conquering ten States they were not willing to make of them pandemoniums, where dark-skinned fiends and white-faced, white-livered vampires might rule and riot on the little blood they could still suck out by fastening on helpless throats, but were anxious to restore them to their pristine status in the Union, that they might prove a source of happiness to themselves and of glory as well as profit to the nation so nearly crushed by financial burdens, not the least formidable of which have arisen out of the very acts wherewith this party affect to be seeking the restoration of the Union; but which instead is still further embittering and estranging the two discordant sections.

God forbid that the party now in power here, represent fairly a majority of their constituents; for if that constituency indorse (which, however, recent elections forbid our believing) one half the diabolism displayed in their treatment of the South malignant, indeed, must they be. It were enough to harrow up the glistly heart of a fiend. Not content with inflicting on a brave but now prostrate people the retributive tortures of a few months, while the hot blood engendered by the strife was still careering through their veins, they keep up a studied infliction in cold blood for years, although the pecuniary maintenance of this black inquisition threatens to bankrupt the nation. And what manner of people are they torturing on this gigantic rack which they have erected, covering half the land? Vainly will you search the earth for their superiors; may I not say their equals? Brave, generous, kind—the noblest of a noble race. What soldiers in war, what captains to lead them when they deemed their rights imperiled! What a galaxy of statesmen and orators in peace! What happy hours were theirs—happy now no more! How favored their clime, how soft their breezes, fragrant their bowers! How lovely their women, at all times warmhearted and true, gentle in their luxurious hours; yet, amid perils and wrongs, how spirited! But now, no more can

"The light foot rove, Safe through the orange grove."

These Jacobins, instead of welcoming back into the temple of the Union such a country and a people endowed with these noble characteristics, the very highest elements of a nation's greatness, which can adorn in times of quiet and prove a mighty bulwark against a foreign foe, they prefer to be guilty of national mayhem. One portion of a great people are deliberately maiming the other into absolute impotence. After desolating the southern States, they have converted them into one vast prison-pen, where bayonets gleam at every turn. They have set over them an abject, half-savage race, which the northern people themselves erewhile thought it no sin to hold as slaves, or sell like brutes, according as the holding or selling thereof was prospectively the more profitable to their greedy pockets. What more effectual means than these could be concocted by the evil brain of the great adversary himself to crush out all manliness from the rising generation in the South? The best men are daily bullied, and the loveliest women insulted with impunity by this inferior race, who prowl around their homes, pillage their property, shrink from honest labor, and reek with filth as a luxury. Reared amid such revolting scenes, their high-spirited fathers and mothers compelled to submit tamely, what short of a miracle can prevent every particle of manliness from being finally extinguished in the children?

Their education, too, is of dire necessity, sadly subjected. Excelsors are becoming fainter in their souls, and must soon die into an echo. Many who might have been stars of the first magnitude, far up in the national zenith, are fated now to grope along the dim horizon of ignorance. Thousands, before in affluent circumstances, are so constantly engaged in struggling to supply their mere physical necessities, that their is neither time nor money, even if there were opportunity, to advance the mental condition. Still, despite all these efforts, many are suffering for the plainest food. But their physical wants and sufferings, urgent as they are, are as nothing compared with the mental torture, the burning consciousness of degradation. Not long since Rev. Henry Ward Beecher said in a speech that just before the war commenced "the crust between the South and hell was only an inch thick." I am rather inclined to think the reverend gentleman's assertion was, in the main, correct, so far as it went. But he, characteristically, stopped short of the whole truth. The legislation of the Opposition has broken through that crust, and is fast making for the Anglo-Saxon race a hell of that part of our once fair domain.

Trusting, however, in the virtue and intelligence of the people, I believe a few months more will sound the death knell for those who have so misruled us, and that in the coming success of the great Democratic party the true intelligence and virtue of the country will be in the ascendancy, and so save our temple of constitutional liberty. And that pure patriot, Horatio Seymour, will stand at our helm of state and guide us to the haven of rest. He, like Cincinnatus of old, has been sought out and brought forth from his quiet home, and the acclamations which greeted his nomination in New York will be repeated in November next.

NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. RAUM. Mr. Chairman, the people of this country have but recently emerged from a long and bloody war in which patriotism triumphed over treason; and the perpetuation of free government became an assured fact in the United States. In the midst of that tremendous struggle, when millions of men rushed to the grim edge of battle ready to die for their country, and where hundreds of thousands fell to rise no more, save in response to the final trump of God, the cry upon every patriot lip, and which was responded to by every patriot heart, was that all the blood and treasure necessary to save this great nation must be freely poured out by the people. This sacred impulse became an enthusiasm, moving the heart of the nation, and lasted to the end, giving us victory at an enormous sacrifice of life, and an unheard-of expenditure of money. But our troops were paid and fed and clothed and cared for in health and in sickness as no other troops were cared for before; the people individually and as a nation accepted as a holy trust the duty of providing for the wants of that mighty host of patriot heroes who marched and fought for liberty and Union, for the support of their widows and orphans, and for the interment in national cemeteries of the sacred remains of those, who, consecrating their lives to their country, died that their country might live, and made death beautiful and glorious by the freedom of the sacrifice, the grandeur of the cause.

The war through which we have passed, in addition to having filled the land with mourning, has fastened upon the people an enormous debt, a debt incurred to preserve the unity and life of the nation, and which must be paid.

Mr. Chairman, although the sacrifice of human life was great, and the expenditure of the people's money was enormous, I believe that the hand of Providence, for a good purpose, guided us through the thick smoke and hurricane of battle. I believe that the heroic deeds and patient suffering and death of our soldiers, and the lofty self-denial and patriotic grief of our wives and mothers was not in vain. I believe that the defeat of our enemies was designed for their ultimate good! And, above all, I believe that we are to have broader, grander views of the destiny which awaits us as a nation. And that we are now making a new departure in the race of progress for the protection of life and liberty, and for the development of processes and means by which labor is to reap its richest reward. To the American people is confided the greatest and grandest subdivision of the earth upon which to work out the problem of perfect human government. Let us endeavor to be equal to the epoch in which we live, and by wise legislation accelerate the wheels of progress and secure to our whole people prosperity, union, liberty, and justice.

Mr. Chairman, I have stated that the war debt of this country, incurred for the preservation of the Union, must be paid. But how it shall be paid and when it shall be paid are profound questions for American statesmanship, whose successful solution will require the exercise of the most comprehensive wisdom. This debt, Mr. Chairman, is a first mortgage upon the present and prospective wealth and labor of the country, and must be paid and will be paid with the fruits of labor. And, sir, in the development of the productive industry and commerce of our country will be found the true means for the solution of this great problem.

The great triumph of this age is the invention of machines and processes by which labor is not only economized in the production of articles of commerce, but in their distribution throughout the world. And, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the great strife among the nations during the next half century will be to secure to freight and passengers cheap and rapid means of transportation; for, sir, we have arrived at that point when the value of a day's labor is not to be estimated so much by what it will produce as by the facility with which the article produced can be transported to market. I lay it down as an axiom, that the value of articles of industry is regulated by the facilities with which such articles can be placed upon the market.

And further, that the production of articles of commerce depends upon the same law; such production being stimulated and increased in exact ratio to the increased means of cheap and rapid transportation. Thus, sir, we find that since the application of steam to vessels and railroads a complete revolution has been brought about in the production and commerce of the world. I must confess, sir, that I was greatly startled when I came to examine statistics showing the tremendous increase in the trade of the world during the past thirty-six years. And, sir, it is a curious and interesting fact, that in all the commercial nations whose trade has materially increased, railroads have been extensively constructed; and what is more interesting, the increase of trade has been in exact ratio to the increase of railroads, so that the commerce of a country can now be safely approximated from year to year from figures already known if the increase of railroad construction is given. And, sir, the increase of production and trade in a country is limited only when such country has no fertile region through which to build railroads, or no new market to reach by the same means.

I ask the indulgence of the House for a short time while I present a few figures showing the progress of railroad construction and the increase of commerce in some of the great producing and trading nations of the world; and I will begin with

GREAT BRITAIN.

The United Kingdom has about four thousand miles of navigable waters. For a number of years prior to 1833 the exports and imports of that country had averaged about four hundred million dollars; but during the seven succeeding years lines of railroads were constructed, which have been added to from year to year; and the construction of railroads and increase of commerce is shown to be as follows:

Years.	Miles of railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1840.....	1,200	$581,000,000
1845.....	2,441	659,000,000
1850.....	6,733	840,000,000
1855.....	8,534	1,227,000,000
1860.....	10,433	1,832,000,000
1865.....	13,239	2,393,000,000
1867.....	-	2,500,000,000

Thus it will be seen that the commerce of Great Britain, which had increased but little for many years, received a new impulse from railroad development, and from $400,000,000 in 1833 reached the enormous sum of $2,500,000,000 in 1867.

FRANCE.

Let us now see what effect the construction of railroads has had upon the commerce of France, whose people are blessed with about seventy-seven hundred miles of navigable waters.

The following figures will show the progress of commercial development in connection with railroad construction in that country:

Years.	No. miles railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1840.....	564	$403,000,000
1845.....	847	475,000,000
1850.....	1,807	500,000,000
1855.....	3,315	845,000,000
1860.....	5,586	1,134,000,000
1865.....	8,130	1,432,000,000
1867.....	-	1,440,000,000

Here it will be seen that commercial prosperity kept pace with railroad construction; so that from $403,000,000 in 1840 the exports and imports of France increased to $1,440,000,000 in 1867.

BELGIUM AND NETHERLANDS.

I will now bring to the attention of the House the remarkable effect that the construction of railroads has had upon the trade of the two busy little States of Belgium and Netherlands. While under the Government of the United Netherlands their commerce reached a point of considerable importance; but at the time of their separation in 1830 the total exports and imports of the Netherlands were nearly treble those of Belgium, resulting mainly from the fact of superior means of transportation by canals and by sea; but in 1835 Belgium commenced the construction of a wise system of railroads, so as to give her an outlet into Germany, Austria, and France.

Immediately production and trade received a powerful impulse, and with the progress of her railroad system the commerce of Belgium increased in a ratio unparalleled by that of any other nation on earth; the soil was more skillfully tilled; valuable mines were opened; furnaces and work-shops were erected, and the little State, insignificant in point of territorial extent, outstripping her neighbor, the Netherlands, has taken a first-class position as a producing and commercial people. The following figures may prove interesting as showing the progress of commerce in Belgium in relation to railroad construction and the manner in which she outran the Netherlands in the race of progress:

Years.	Miles of railroad constructed.	Total exports and imports.
1835.....	-	$53,000,000
1839.....	185	77,000,000
1845.....	335	130,000,000
1853.....	720	232,000,000
1860.....	1,037	352,000,000
1862.....	1,180	380,000,000
1864.....	1,350	475,000,000

I now wish to compare the figures showing the commerce of those two countries, calling your attention to the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the Netherlands constructed no considerable extent of railroads until as late as 1856. And that she possessed vastly superior advantages over Belgium in the way of water communication, by means of her extensive canals and by the river Rhine, commanding the trade of Germany:

Years.	Total Exports and Imports.
1835 { Belgium.....	$53,000,000
Netherlands.....	105,000,000
1839 { Belgium.....	77,000,000
Netherlands.....	139,000,000
1862 { Belgium.....	380,000,000
Netherlands.....	288,000,000
1867 { Belgium.....	473,000,000
Netherlands.....	322,000,000

This enormous production and interchange of wealth is the result of the labor of a population of a little more than four million five hundred thousand, on a territory of eleven thousand four hundred and two square miles, Belgium being in fact but little larger than the State of Maryland.

INDIA.

Mr. Chairman, I now propose to detain the House for a short time while I examine very briefly the progress of railroad and commercial development in the distant and almost unknown British province of India. That vast, fertile, and populous region has for more than a century been under the domination of Great Britain, and is now controlled by a Governor General, who, in the name of the Queen, under the instructions of a secretary of state for India, makes and administers the laws for one hundred and fifty million people.

The climate and productions of a considerable portion of India are very similar to those of our southern States, and it has long been the earnest wish of British statesmen to stimulate the production of cotton in that distant province so as to compete with our country in the growth of that great staple. As long ago as 1849 the British Parliament incorporated railroad companies for India. For many years, however, very slow progress was made under the lead of private enterprise; in 1856 about two hundred and twenty miles of railroad had been completed, and it is probable that under the same management five hundred miles of railroad would not have been completed at this day. British statesmanship, however, conceived the grand design of securing the construction of five thousand miles of railroad in that vast empire by Government aid. Eight great companies were incorporated, and the Government guaranteed the payment of $366,000,000 five per cent. bonds to aid in the construction of the roads. The rebellion in this country causing a great dearth in the cotton markets of the world greatly stimulated the construction of these India railroads. Early in 1863 the India cotton regions were penetrated, and the crop of that season was brought to the coast by rail, and to-day a net-work of four thousand nine hundred and forty-four miles of railroads is about completed in that country. Let us see what effect the construction of these railroads has had upon the commerce of India. The following are the figures:

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
1858.....	$151,000,000	$133,000,000	$289,000,000
1859.....	172,725,000	132,660,000	335,385,000
1860.....	203,110,000	144,445,000	347,555,000
1862.....	186,360,000	185,000,000	371,360,000
1863.....	215,705,000	244,850,000	460,555,000
1864.....	250,540,000	334,475,000	585,015,000
1865.....	247,570,000	347,430,000	595,000,000

The following figures show the value of the exports of raw cotton for a series of years:

Years.	Exports.
1859.....	$20,000,000
1860.....	27,000,000
1861.....	35,000,000
1862.....	107,000,000
1863.....	168,000,000
1864.....	183,812,000

The enormous expansion of British production and trade at home and in India is really one of the marvels of this great age of progress, and is to be attributed to the wise development of their railroad systems. Let us contemplate for a moment these amazing commercial results. The United Kingdom has a yearly trade of $2,500,000,000, India has a yearly trade of $595,000,000, making a grand total of $3,095,000,000.

UNITED STATES.

Mr. Chairman, I now come to examine this subject with reference to our own country. The people of the whole civilized world recognize the fact that no nation in the "tide of time" has ever made such grand material progress as has the United States of America. The people of this country know that we owe much of our prosperity to the construction of railroads, but many persons, no doubt, have not examined the statistics of commerce and railroad construction, to mark how steadily the trade of this country has kept pace with the increasing facilities for internal communication. Following, I give a table showing the progress of railroad construction and commercial development in the United States:

Years.	Miles of railroad.	Total exports and imports.
1830.....	41	$160,000,000
1840.....	2,197	239,226,000
1845.....	4,522	232,000,000
1850.....	7,475	380,000,000
1855.....	17,398	536,625,000
1860.....	28,771	762,300,000
1866.....	37,027	1,003,000,000

Here we see the commerce of the United States, which in 1830 amounted to $160,000,000, reach the enormous sum of $1,003,000,000 in 1866. And while Great Britain, India, France, Belgium, and the United States had a total commerce in 1840 of $1,471,000,000, in 1866 their commerce reached the startling sum of $6,003,000,000.

An examination of prior statistics, shows that this marvelous growth of commerce is far in excess of the increase of population in those countries, and can only be accounted for upon the self-evident proposition that productive industry is developed and stimulated by an increase of cheap and convenient means of transporting the fruits of labor to market.

And now, Mr. Chairman, let us explore this great maze of figures, and ascertain, if possible, the law which has governed the growth of enterprise, industry, and trade in the countries I have named. I affirm that production and commerce in Great Britain, France, India, Belgium, and the United States—the leading commercial nations of the world—has kept pace with the progress of railroad construction. I give the figures of the pro rata increase of exports and imports of those countries since 1833, for each mile of railroad constructed, as follows:

Countries.	Yearly exports and imports per mile of railroad.
Great Britain.....	$110,000
France.....	69,000
India.....	65,000
Belgium.....	83,000
United States.....	25,000

As I have just shown, the total exports and imports of those countries increased from 1840 to 1866, a period of twenty-six years, $4,532,000,000, while the increase of railroads during the same period was sixty-three thousand and eighteen miles, which gives an average increase of $71,000 of commerce for every mile of railroad built. And, sir, startling though these figures appear, I challenge an investigation as to their correctness. And I affirm that for every mile of railroad constructed in the United States our exports and imports are increased to the extent of $25,000; and assuming that $10,000 of this sum is composed of articles paying a duty of thirty per cent., we find that the annual revenue of the Government is actually increased to the extent of $3,000 in coin for every mile of railroad constructed. And, sir, the experience of the last thirty-six years demonstrates the fact that this increase of commerce produced by railroad construction is not ephemeral, but enduring, and that it enlarges from year to year with the permanent improvement of the country.

And now, sir, I come to the consideration of House bill No. 847, entitled "A bill to aid in the construction of the International Pacific railroad, from Cairo, Illinois, to the Rio Grande river; to authorize the consolidation of certain railroad companies, and to provide homesteads for the laborers on said roads," which I had the honor of introducing on the 3d day of March last, and which was printed, referred to and has been considered by the Committee on Roads and Canals.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, contemplates the construction of continuous lines of railroad and telegraph from the Mississippi river, opposite Cairo, Illinois, through the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas, to the Rio Grande river, in the direction of San Blas, Mexico, on the Pacific coast, and to connect with such railroads as may be built in Mexico from the Rio Grande river, either to San Blas or the City of Mexico.

The bill proposes that the United States shall aid certain companies heretofore chartered by the Legislatures of Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas to build said railroad, loaning the bonds of the United States to said companies upon a second mortgage on said railroad—the bonds to be issued as sections of the road are completed, $10,000 per mile from Cairo to Little Rock, and $16,000 per mile from Little Rock to the Rio Grande. The bonds to run fifty years and to bear currency interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, the interest to be paid by the railroad companies. At the end of ten years the railroad companies are to create in the Treasury of the United States a sinking fund of two and one half per cent. per annum of the total debt, so that the debt will be paid by the railroad companies at maturity.

The bill also provides that the lands heretofore granted by the United States to aid in the construction of that portion of the road that lies in Missouri and Arkansas, and known as the Cairo and Fulton railroad, amounting to about two million acres, and the lands granted by general law in Texas, which will amount to about seven million acres, in all about nine million acres of land, shall be sold by the railroad companies at the maximum price of $2 50 per acre, to such persons who, being laborers on said railroads, may wish to purchase any part of said lands. The bill also provides that in the construction of the road preference shall be given to persons wishing, in whole or in part, to buy land for their labor; and the bill also provides that the Commissioner of Refugees and Freedmen shall supervise the contracts made with freedmen, and aid them in securing homes along the line of said road by the purchase of lands from the railroad companies.

The bill also provides that the railroad companies shall have authority to borrow money upon a first mortgage to an amount equal to the Government loan; also that the United States shall at all times have preference in sending dispatches and transporting troops and munitions of war, and that all the earnings of the railroad companies for transporting the mails, troops, munitions of war, and Government freights and forwarding telegraphic dispatches, shall be retained by and accounted for semi-annually by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be applied exclusively to the payment of interest on the Government bonds issued to the railroad companies, any surplus of semi-annual earnings to be paid to the railroad companies.

The bill also provides that the railroad companies shall have authority to consolidate their corporate powers by virtue of State laws under the corporate name of "The International Pacific Railroad Company." The companies are required to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury annually of their condition and business.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the material provisions of the bill, and to their earnest consideration I desire to call the attention of Congress and the country. There are many reasons, sir, why this railroad should meet the hearty approval and aid of Congress. In the first place, the construction of a railroad southwest from the mouth of the Ohio river was seconded by Congress as long ago as 1856 by a grant of land through Missouri and Arkansas. In 1866, the grant being about to expire by limitation, was renewed and enlarged by act of Congress, upon the recommendation of the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. JULIAN,] the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, and to-day nearly two million acres of land in Missouri and Arkansas are withheld from sale to aid in the construction of the road.

That the construction of this road would permanently secure the reconstruction and development of Arkansas and Texas and place them upon the high road to prosperity, I presume will not be doubted by any gentleman on this floor. Those States are great outlying, undeveloped Territories, with rich soil, admirable climate, and capable of supporting ten million inhabitants. With the exception of her frontage on the Mississippi river, Arkansas has no reliable means of transportation. She had thirty-eight miles of railroad in 1860, and she has the same to-day, with little hope of increasing the amount except through the generous aid of Congress.

The condition of Texas is but little, if any, better. From her coast-line a few short roads point to the interior, but are not being extended for want of funds. There are four hundred and ninety-six miles of railroad in Texas, none of them having connections beyond the State. So utterly insufficient are these railroads for the convenient transportation of freight that a large proportion of the products of the soil are transported in ox wagons from two to five hundred miles to market. The natural result of this condition of affairs is, that in both Arkansas and Texas production is at the very lowest possible stage, and labor is absolutely without hope for remunerative returns.

Another consideration which weighs heavily upon my mind is the great importance of fostering and encouraging the cultivation of sugar and cotton, both necessities which enter largely into the daily consumption of the world.

The production of both of these articles was almost abandoned during the war, and while the growth of cotton has been resumed with partial success the production of sugar is in a very languishing condition. It is a matter of absolute necessity to the whole country to stimulate the production of sugar and cotton in the southern States.

1. That the importation of sugar may be reduced.

2. That the exportation of cotton may be increased. For by these means the balance of trade now largely against this country will be changed in our favor.

3. That the prices of these articles may be reduced to the benefit of our whole population.

4. That the labor of the sugar and cotton growing regions may be prevented from permanently engaging in the production of breadstuffs and provisions, thus securing to the great West and Northwest a home market for all their productions; for be it known, Mr. Chairman, that at no time have we been able to find a foreign market for more than five per cent. of the grain produced in the United States.

And well did the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in discussing the tax bill the other day, raise the note of warning to the West of the danger that the South would soon be able to monopolize the foreign grain trade, to the exclusion of the West; but I call the attention of that gentleman and of the House and the country to the fact that if the South is encouraged to return to the vigorous production of sugar and cotton, the grain growers of the West will find a better market at home than abroad.

And fifthly, Mr. Chairman, I insist that it is necessary to stimulate the production of sugar and cotton in the southern States as a means of securing prosperity, happiness, and peace to the people of those States.

And who among us, I ask, does not desire to see peace and prosperity abound from ocean to ocean and from the lakes to the gulf? It is hardly necessary to state, Mr. Chairman, that Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio are deeply interested in the speedy construction of this great thoroughfare.

Another consideration which should press heavily upon the minds of gentlemen is the fact that the construction of this railroad would greatly cheapen the cost of living through the North and East by causing a reduction in the price of beef. At this time there are five millions of cattle in the State of Texas, the value of which will not average four dollars per head. There is absolutely no market for the millions of fine fat beeves this immense herd contains in consequence of the inadequate means of transportation from that State. There is no reason why the price of beef in our cities and large towns should not be reduced from thirty to fifty per cent. by the introduction of Texas cattle by means of railroad transportation and at the same time increase the value of cattle in Texas from one to two hundred per cent. Texas is now the most extensive and best grazing country in the United States. I am satisfied that she could furnish half a million of beeves annually twenty dollars per head cheaper than similar stock is now sold in our city markets; thus by the construction of the "International Pacific railroad" would the consumers of beef North and East save millions of dollars annually by the reduction of the price of that article, and the value of the stock of Texas would be increased from the nominal sum of $20,000,000 to an actual value of $50,000,000.

Another consideration I desire to bring to the attention of the House is the paramount importance of making the most ample provisions for the hundreds of thousands of landless, homeless poor persons, white and black, in the States of Arkansas, Texas, and contiguous States, whereby they may secure homesteads. As previously stated, about two million acres of land in Missouri and Arkansas were granted to aid in the construction of the proposed railroad. These lands are now withheld from market, and constitute some of the best lands in those States. By the laws of Texas about seven million acres of land will inure to the proposed railroad as constructed.

Upon these nine million acres of land one hundred and fifty thousand homesteads or three quarters of a million of inhabitants can be located where they can till their own lands by day and sleep under their own roofs by night in peace and prosperity. By the passage of the bill under consideration the railroad companies are required to sell their lands at the maximum price of $2 50 per acre to all persons who, in whole or in part, wish to pay for land in labor. Under the provisions of this act thousands of persons would secure valuable homesteads along the line of this great thoroughfare and pay for them in labor, reserving enough from their daily earnings to support themselves and families.

And, sir, by the passage of this act an immense land monopoly will be prevented by requiring the sale of these lands at a fair and fixed valuation; for Mr. Chairman, the legislation of Congress in respect to the public lands of the country should be to prevent as near as may be the aggregation of large bodies of land for speculation in the hands of individuals and corporations, and to secure to actual settlers and cultivators of the soil homesteads free of cost or at a price within the reach of the poor; for sir, there is no curse to any country so great as the ownership of the lands in the hands of the few, and for the husbandman to be a tenant and not the owner of the soil he cultivates. Sir, the landless poor of this country are children of the Republic, and should be encouraged by the most liberal legislation to secure homesteads for themselves and their posterity.

Mr. Chairman, I desire that Congress and the country shall also examine this subject from the stand-point of economy; for I affirm, sir, that as respects the economical administration of public affairs in those States and coniguous Territories that the United States can well afford to aid in the construction of this railroad. We all understand that millions of dollars are annually expended for the transportation of troops, military and Indian supplies to our distant ports by the slow and expensive means of mule and ox teams.

Now, sir, at the military depot of San Antonio alone our disbursing officers pay annually more than a million and a quarter of dollars for the transportation of supplies in wagons from Indianola to San Antonio and other points, these same supplies having first been transported from New York by sea or from Cincinnati, Louisville, Jeffersonville, or St. Louis to New Orleans by river, thence across the Gulf. And, sir, the disbursements at San Antonio do not cover more than one-half of the sum expended annually by the United States for wagon transportation to our military posts in that distant region. I think, sir, that it is safe to assume that $1,000,000 per annum would be saved to the Treasury by the construction of this railroad by cheapening transportation.

Mr. Chairman, this railroad, extending a thousand miles through the fertile lands of Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas, where there are no means of transportation save by wagons on miserable roads, would operate like an enchanter's wand in the development of production and trade along the entire line; a new field would be opened for the energies of our people and a new market for the production of our manufactures. And, sir, this railroad would have the same effect upon our foreign trade that other railroads have had; our exports and imports would be increased $25,000 per mile for the entire length of road, amounting to $25,000,000 per annum; and the duties paid into the national Treasury upon dutiable imports would amount to at least $8,000,000 per annum. These conclusions are inevitable and cannot be escaped; they are deducible from the statistics of the country, running back through the past thirty-five years, and are entitled to the attention of Congress and the country.

MEXICO.

Having demonstrated the importance of this railroad to our own people, and the economy of the United States aiding in its construction from Cairo to the Rio Grande, I now come to the discussion of the subject with reference to the influence it will have upon the future of Mexico, and the trade of this country with that republic. The republic of Mexico has a population of eight million. Her capacities for the development of industry and trade are surpassed by few countries; her mineral wealth is absolutely inexhaustible and fabulous. The revolutionary fires which have unfortunately enveloped that country for the past thirty years have about burned out, and it is hoped that the Liberal Government will be able to maintain itself against all its enemies.

Mr. Chairman, I affirm that the people of the United States are interested in the permanent establishment of the Republic of Mexico and in the prosperity of its people. And, sir, I express it as my deliberate opinion that nothing would more conduce to secure these ends than the construction of a system of railroads connecting the two countries. I propose, sir, that the United States shall aid in building a railroad to the Mexican border; and by friendly offices encourage the construction in Mexico of two railroads, the one to the Pacific and the other to the city of Mexico. To say that the construction of such a system of railroads would advance the interests of both countries is stating the matter tamely; for, sir, the imagination can scarcely conceive the wonderful advantages which would inevitably result to both peoples. Mexico would at once awake from her lethargy and enter the lists in the race of progress; her liberal Government would become a fixed fact; new fields would be tilled, new cities built, and the riches of her mines would be laid bare. Industry, production, and trade would increase, and her people would become contented, prosperous, and happy. We would penetrate the very heart of Mexico by twelve hundred miles of railroad, and thus secure a monopoly of her trade by lines inaccessible to foreign countries.

Her people would want our agricultural and mechanical implements and manufactured goods, and would pay for them mainly in the precious metals. A new and profitable field for commerce would be opened to our people. The products of the mines of Mexico, amounting now to some fifteen million dollars annually, would at once be diverted to this country, and the amount augmented to $50,000,000 within a few years. And, Mr. Chairman, reaching the Pacific coast by this shortest and best of all routes, may we not look down upon the west coast of South America and out upon the islands of the sea and hope for a rapid extension of trade; and may we not look out and beyond those islands to that distant Asiatic clime known as the "East," whose trade for three thousand years has been the prize of commerce, and which in turn enriched Tyre, Jerusalem, Palmyra, Alexandria, and Constantinople, and which by the genius of Vasco de Gama was brought around the Cape of Good Hope to fill the coffers of Lisbon, London, and the whole of Europe; and extending our commerce over shorter lines divert into new channels across this continent a trade which has enriched every country controlling it, and which is now separated by the diameter of the earth from the point of distribution, and which is a rich prize now within our grasp, and may, by enterprise and energy, be secured to this country as an eternal heritage by the building of this proposed railroad and others in process of construction.

Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that the United States is about to make a new departure upon the road to prosperity; and as the Republican party is likely to remain in power for a series of years, and will be responsible for the legislation of the country, I take this occasion to say that it is not enough that we shall be the champions of liberty and union; we must also be the champions of such legislation as will develop industry, production, and trade, so as to bring about that degree of universal prosperity which will make liberty enjoyable and Union a thing to be loved by all. Therefore I say, sir, that we should, without unnecessary delay, devise a just and wise system of improvements, in whole or in part at public expense, to stimulate production, and to cheapen and facilitate the transportation of the products of labor, thus securing to the producer the greatest possible sum for the fruits of his toil, and thereby largely increasing the capability of the country to sustain the heavy burden of taxation pressing upon it. And it is in view of the conclusions just given, and the considerations heretofore mentioned, that I earnestly impress upon Congress and the country the vast importance of the speedy construction of the International Pacific railroad.

For the construction of four thousand nine hundred and forty-four miles of railroad in India the British Parliament guaranteed $366,000,000, and has actually paid $65,000,000 interest thereon. To aid in the construction of the International Pacific railroad, one thousand miles long, about fourteen million dollars in bonds will be required. Thus we can secure a railroad one fifth in length of the India railroads at one thirtieth the cost. During the construction of the road the railroad companies are required to pay the interest on the bonds. When the road is completed the payments by the United States for the transportation of mails, troops, and supplies, will far exceed the interest on the bonds, and thus obviate the necessity of appropriations from the Treasury for that purpose. The sinking fund provided by the bill will be ample for the payment of the principal; and thus, without cost to the national Treasury, a work enduring as time, the importance of which the most sanguine imagination can now scarcely foreshadow, will be secured to this and future generations in perpetuity.

Mr. Chairman, progress is the watchword of this Republic; progress in civil government; progress in the recognition and protection of the rights of men; progress in education, morality, and religion; progress in the arts and sciences; progress in industry, production, and trade; progress in multiplying facilities and overcoming obstructions to commerce; progress in spreading the self-evident truths of free government, not by bloodshed and war, but by the humane process of peace. And, oh! what a field is here spread out for human thought and human action, stretching from ocean to ocean, a distance of three thousand miles, and extending over seventy-five degrees of latitude: with a climate varying from perpetual spring to perpetual winter; with productions to suit all climes; penetrated by immense rivers, worthy the name of inland seas; bordered by navigable lakes, and indented with bays and gulfs unequalled in size and beauty; traversed by giant mountains filled with precious ores; diversified with hill, valley, and plain; timber land and prairie; with soil of unsurpassed fertility; with mountains of iron and measures of coal four times greater in extent than those of all the world beside is the land committed for development to American freedom, American genius, and American statesmanship. Here the fierce battle of liberty was fought and won, and here every man is free. Hence has gone forth the grand political and religious truths which are now revolutionizing and christianizing the world. Here the downtrodden and oppressed, of every nation, tongue, and clime, save one, have found refuge and repose. And even they, sons of Africa, although held in chains and slavery, have here, here in America, learned to forget their instincts and practices of barbarism. And, sir, may it not be the Divine purpose out of the crime of slavery to bring a great good; may it not be, when these children of misfortune shall have learned the principles of liberty and justice, that, turning their eyes to the home of their ancestors, inspiration may lead them to seek it as their inheritance, where christianizing and civilizing their kindred they may grow up to be a great and a free people. And, sir, hither have come children of the celestial empire, with their quaint costumes and quaint religious rites. Bringing their habits of industry, sobriety, and economy, they have found homes, protection, and employment.

And, sir, catching the inspiration of free government and guided by the genius of American statesmanship the rulers of the Empire of the Sun have sent hither an embassy, distinguished mainly by being led by one of the sons of our Republic. They come to announce the readiness of that singular people to open wide their gates and to throw down the "Chinese wall" which for three thousand years has made them a separate people. They offer us their trade, which within eight years has grown under American influences from $80,000,000, to $800,000,000, and which is capable of indefinite extension. Shall we not reach forth and grasp it? Yes; with our iron arms, spanning a continent will we bring it to our embrace.

And, then, sir, Asia, the birth-place of mankind, awakened from her dark slumbers by America, will receive our merchants, artisans, school-men, and missionaries, and through American influence and American civilization will march forth with newness of life to receive the Divine truths of the Gospel for her five hundred million souls.

And now sir, thanking the House for the courtesy of its attention, I close by repeating a sentiment already uttered, that to the American people is confided the greatest and grandest subdivision of the earth, upon which to work out the problem of perfect human Government. Let us endeavor to be equal to the epoch in which we live, and by wise legislation accelerate the wheels of progress and secure to our whole people prosperity, union, liberty, and justice.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. HIGBY, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HIGBY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CULLOM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Union generally, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. GETZ, (at nine o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to resume at this time the consideration of the bill which was cut off yesterday morning by the expiration of the morning hour. It will take but a little time, and it is a bill of public importance, which has already passed the House of Representatives, and been reported with amendments from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is a bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps.

Mr. CATTELL. I am very sorry to interfere with the purpose of the Senator from Missouri, but a bill of, I think, very great public import, Senate bill No. 543, has been up under discussion more than once in the morning hour and been cut off, and I am extremely anxious that it should be disposed of now. I am quite unwell, scarcely able to be in the Senate this morning, and came here hoping that that bill would be disposed of. I think it will not give rise to much discussion.

Mr. DRAKE. I beg the gentleman not to object to taking up the bill I indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution relative to printing extra copies of the Land Office report, to report it back. It has been before the Committee on Printing and was referred again to the Committee on Public Lands, and they recommend the amendment of the Committee on Printing, with a slight amendment. I suppose under the rules, strictly, it should go to the Committee on Printing again, but I conclude that the Committee on Printing will concur in this recommendation.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not necessary to send it to the Committee on Printing again, but I should like to know what the amendment is.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment is to allow one thousand copies in French. We concurred in the recommendation of the Committee on Printing with the exception of allowing one thousand copies in French, which the Committee on Printing did not agree to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Do you propose to print the maps?

Mr. POMEROY. We have not recommended that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go over until to-morrow and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it goes over under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Washington Target-Shooting Company.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 339) authorizing the remission of the duties on a chime of bells imported for presentation to the Episcopal church at Hoosic, Rensselaer county, New York.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 564) concerning the tax commissioners of the State of Arkansas; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

SAMUEL PIERCE.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce, which had been reported on adversely, was postponed indefinitely.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 339) authorizing the remission of the duties on a chime of bells imported for presentation to the Episcopal church at Hoosic, Rensselaer county, New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NORTHERN MICHIGAN RAILROAD.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to appeal to the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 276. I only want to have it taken up and read, and it may be laid aside then if any gentleman has anything more pressing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, to take up the bill (S. No. 276) to grant lands to the Northern Michigan Railroad Company in extension of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it just reported?

Mr. HOWARD. No; it has been reported for months.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before that is taken up

I wish to make a statement to the Senate in regard to a bill that is pending between the two Houses on an amendment. It is the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supply of vacancies in the Executive Departments. It belongs to that class of bills which ought to be passed early that it may go to the Executive. It is pending now on an amendment of the House of Representatives, and in the Judiciary Committee we have agreed to the House amendment with a slight amendment which we have recommended. I do not think it will take three minutes to dispose of it. I was very anxious yesterday to dispose of it, but the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] wanted to look at it.

Mr. HOWARD. Let us take a vote on this bill first.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If you will lay it aside for a moment after it is taken up in order to have this amendment disposed of I will not object.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well.

Mr. CATTELL. I must object to taking up the bill of the Senator from Michigan if it is to supplant the bill which I have moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of. It is a bill that ought to be disposed of. I have been instructed by the Committee on Finance to insist upon the consideration of the bill. I am sorry ever to interfere with a Senator, but I am constrained, as a matter of duty, to do it on the present occasion.

Mr. HOWARD. I have this to say in reply: if I can get this bill up and read that will satisfy me for the present, and I will throw no more embarrassment in the way of other gentlemen; but I want to put this bill in a way so that at the proper time I can have it passed.

Mr. CATTELL. Will the Senator from Michigan give way to this bill afterward?

Mr. HOWARD. After the bill is read I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was not agreed to.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment to the bill which I have indicated, which I am sure will take but a moment or two. I assure the Senator from New Jersey that it will take no time scarcely, and it is important that it should go back to the House.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supply of vacancies in the Executive Departments. The amendment of the House was to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

*That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the head of any executive Department of the Government, the first or sole assistant thereof shall, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, perform the duties of such head until a successor be appointed, or such absence or sickness shall cease.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the chief of any bureau, or of any officer thereof whose appointment is not in the head of any executive Department, the deputy of such chief or such officer, or if there be no deputy then the chief clerk of such bureau, shall, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, as is hereinafter provided, perform the duties of such chief or of such officer until a successor be appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in any of the cases hereinbefore mentioned it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in his discretion, to authorize and direct the head of any other executive Department or other officer in either of those Departments whose appointment is, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, vested in the President, to perform the duties of the office vacant as aforesaid until a successor be appointed, or the sickness or absence of the incumbent shall cease: Provided, That nothing in this act shall authorize the supplying as aforesaid a vacancy for a longer period than ten days when such vacancy shall be occasioned by death or resignation, and the officer so performing the duties of the office temporarily vacant shall not be entitled to extra compensation therefor.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts heretofore passed on the subject of temporarily supplying vacancies in the Executive Departments, or which empower the President to authorize any person or persons to perform the duties of the head of any executive Department, or of any officer in either of the Departments, in case of a vacancy therein or inability of such head of a Department or officer to discharge the duties of his office, and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment to the House amendment, to insert at the end of the third section the following:

And provided also, That in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Commissioner of Patents, the duties of said Commissioner, until a successor shall be appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, shall devolve upon one of the examiners in chief in said office, to be designated by the President.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is another slight amendment before that, to insert the words "except the Commissioner of Patents" after the word "thereof," in line three of section two.

Mr. CONKLING. That is really part of the same amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the amendment of the House as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We ought to know what that is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is printed and on your table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is no special objection, before this bill passes I should like to offer an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think there is any objection to the amendment the Senator from Vermont wishes to offer. I think it means that now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I; but we have had so much discussion about these loose and latitudinarian powers that I wish to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the second section, and which will read as follows:

And no appointment, designation, or assignment otherwise than as herein provided in the cases mentioned in the first and second sections of this act shall be made, except to fill a vacancy happening during the recess of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended, was concurred in.

WASHINGTON TARGET-SHOOTING ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the "Washington Target-Shooting Association" in the District of Columbia, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the said bill, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out of said amendment, after the word "provided," in the first line, the following words: "The amount of real property or estate to be held by the said association shall not exceed in value the sum of $50,000; and provided further that,"

JAMES HARLAN,
GEORGE VICKERS,
ROSCOE CONKLING,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN D. BALDWIN,
M. WELKER,
A. J. GLOSSBRENNER,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

TEMPORARY LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. CATTELL. I now move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates, for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not like to oppose these bills from the Committee on Finance, but they have every day after one o'clock, and they will have during the whole session; but for them to occupy the morning hour, and then every day from one o'clock out, seems to me to be a little too much.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates, for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. TRUMBULL, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the compound-interest notes, saving the unnecessary payment of interest, and reducing the public debt, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make sale of $10,000,000 of the surplus coin in the Treasury of the United States, on the first Monday of the month of August next, and on the first Monday of every month thereafter, till the amount of coin in the Treasury, exclusive of that for which gold certificates of deposit shall have been given, shall be reduced to the sum of $40,000,000, the sale to be made in manner following: The Secretary shall give five days' public notice in one daily newspaper published in each of the cities of Washington and New York, that sealed proposals for $10,000,000 of gold coin will be received at the office of the Assistant Treasurer in the city of New York till three o'clock p. m. of the day appointed for the sale. Such proposals shall be addressed to the Assistant Treasurer at New York, and shall be opened by him in the presence of such persons as may choose to attend at the time designated in the notice. No proposals shall be received unless accompanied by a certificate of deposit in the Treasury of the United States of five per cent. in currency of the amount of coin bid for in such proposal, which shall be received in part pay for the coin bid for, in case the bid is accepted, and if not accepted, shall be returned to the party who made the bid. Payments may be received for coin in currency or compound-interest notes with the interest accrued thereon. When compound-interest notes are received they shall be canceled by the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the currency received he shall purchase and cancel any interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States, paying therefor not exceeding its current market value at the time. None but the highest bid shall be accepted for gold; and in case of different bids at the same rate, said bids shall be accepted only pro rata; and the Assistant Treasurer, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right to reject all or any bids if deemed by him less than the fair value of gold at the time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When the morning hour expired some days ago, I was addressing the Senate upon the subject of that amendment. I shall not repeat this morning what I said on that occasion, and will say nothing more, as I wish to take up no time unnecessarily; but I simply beg to call the attention of the Senate to what it is, as there are some Senators now present who were not here on that occasion, and it may have passed out of the minds of others.

The object of my amendment is to dispose of the gold in the Treasury. I presented tables when up before showing that the average amount of gold per month in the Treasury during the last year exceeded eighty-three million dollars, beside about twenty million dollars for which certificates of deposit had been issued. I also showed that the amount of currency in the Treasury during the same period averaged something over thirty-four million dollars, and that the two together, the gold being turned into currency at its market price, would make a sum of more than one hundred and fifty million dollars which lay in the Treasury idle during the whole of the last year. The tables which I have also show that the amount which lay idle in the Treasury during the previous year was about the same; so that during the last two years there has been in the Treasury of the United States at all times from eighty to one hundred millions of coin lying idle, and from thirty to forty millions of currency, which I undertook to show was very bad economy; and I have proposed an amendment to this bill the object of which is to dispose of this gold. The amendment is in print and on the tables of Senators. It provides for disposing of this gold in the city of New York at the rate of $10,000,000 per month until the amount is reduced to $40,000,000, not to be reduced below that, and the gold to be sold on proposals, and to be awarded to those who give the highest price for it, after giving five days' notice in the papers of New York and Washington city, so as to have the benefit of this gold. If the gold which has been in the Treasury for the last two years had been sold and used by the Government, it would have saved the Government more than $10,000,000. It seems to me there is no object in keeping the money there; at least, I know of none. No financial policy has been adopted which requires this money to be kept in the Treasury.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, I listened with attention to the remarks of the Senator from Illinois when he addressed the Senate last week in opposition to the bill under consideration, and am surprised at his hostility to a measure so obviously advantageous to the Government.

The provisions of the bill are so simple, its purpose so obvious, and the advantage to the Government so apparent, that I am at a loss to account for the opposition of the Senator from Illinois. The entire question, and the only one involved, is whether the Government, owing as it does something over two thousand million dollars, for nearly all of which it is paying six per cent. interest in gold, shall accept a loan of $25,000,000 at three per cent. currency, thus reducing the interest on that amount more than one half.

Now, Mr. President, if there is one subject which more than any other is engaging the attention of the American people, and challenging the consideration of both statesmen and politicians, it is how the Government can, while maintaining its faith with the public creditor, reduce the interest on the public debt, and thereby lighten the burdens of taxation. This has been a fruitful theme for discussion in Congress and out of Congress, and it has been declared to be the duty of Congress to work in this direction by the great political party with which the Senator and myself affiliate.

I commend the fifth article of the Chicago platform to the consideration of the Senator from Illinois. It reads:

5. The national debt, contracted as it has been for the preservation of the Union for all time to come, should be extended over a fair period for redemption, and it is the duty of Congress to reduce the rate of interest thereon whenever it can possibly be done.

And I desire to say in this connection that while I hold it to be the first duty of the Government to maintain at all hazards the faith of the nation and meet all its obligations to the public creditor, not only according to the letter, but the spirit of the laws under which they were contracted, I also hold that it is the bounden duty of Congress to avail itself of all honorable means to reduce the rate of interest by negotiating, if possible, a loan at a lower rate, as is proposed in the funding bill of my friend from Ohio, by exchanging the five-twenty bonds, with the consent of the holder, for a longer bond with more distinct and definite terms as the equivalent for a lower rate of interest, or by any other method consistent with the perfect maintenance of the public faith and honor.

And yet when the Finance Committee brings to the Senate a feasible proposition to convert a debt upon which we are paying six per cent. compound interest into a three per cent. currency loan, the astute Senator from Illinois objects, and expresses his surprise that so important a bill should be called up in the morning hour. Is the Senator from Illinois opposed to the Government taking money at three per cent. if it can get it, and reducing to that extent the loans upon which we are paying six per cent. in gold?

Now, the question of how much or how little balance shall be held in the Treasury, so largely discussed by the Senator, has no bearing upon this bill. That is entirely a different question, one which I am aware is a source of great distress to the honorable Senator, and I sincerely wish he could obtain relief in some form. But the Senator will find that there are differences of opinion on this question which seems so clear to him, even in this Chamber, and it ought not to be mixed up with a proposition such as that now before the Senate.

But suppose, for the sake of the argument, that we are holding more coin in the Treasury than is wise, that the surplus ought to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the public debt, surely it would be the part of wisdom to apply this surplus to the reduction of the debt upon which we are paying six per cent. gold interest. This proposition is so simple it does not admit of argument. Why, sir, we are issuing bonds almost daily in exchange for the seven-thirties, with interest at six per cent. in gold. Why not use the surplus, if we have any, to take up some of these notes at the market rate, and accept a three per cent. currency loan to retire the compound-interest notes. The interest on $25,000,000 at six per cent. gold, estimating the premium at forty per cent., the present rate, would be $2,100,000 in currency, while the interest on $25,000,000 at three per cent. currency would be but $750,000, thus making an annual saving of $1,350,000. We have already, in the form of these temporary loan certificates, placed $50,000,000, and when these $25,000,000 are added the annual saving of interest on the $75,000,000, as compared with our six per cent. gold loans, will be $4,050,000. Has the Senator from Illinois any objection to this saving of over four million dollars annually, or does the arithmetic he uses give a different result?

I submit, therefore, Mr. President, that even if we have a surplus in the Treasury it does not make against the proposition to accept a loan at three per cent., which may be applied to the payment of bonds upon which we are paying more than twice as high a rate of interest.

But have we this large surplus of coin of which the Senator speaks now in the Treasury? If the Senate will give me their attention I think I shall be able to show that the Senator has not been as careful as he should be when he deals with figures as connected with the national finances; and I cannot consent that his statement shall go to the country without correction. The Senator proceeds upon the assumption that we have something over eighty millions of gold in the Treasury belonging to the United States. Now, what are the facts in the case? I read from a statement prepared for me by the Secretary of the Treasury himself on Friday last, which is as follows:

Amount of gold in the Treasury July 1, 1868.	$99,914,105
From which deduct—
Interest payable July 1, 1868.	31,000,000
Bonds of 1848 maturing July 1, 1868.	6,893,441
Gold certificates.	17,678,640

	$55,572,081
Leaving a balance July 1.	$44,342,024

Now, if you deduct also from this amount the $7,000,000 for Alaska it would reduce the amount of coin in the Treasury to about thirty-seven millions, a sum below that to which the Senator from Illinois proposes by his amendment to reduce it. Under this statement will not the Senator from Illinois admit that his amendment would prove a poor dependence for providing $30,000,000 to meet a maturing obligation of the Government.

Beside the currency in the Treasury on the 1st July was but $27,377,751, quite low enough when we consider the magnitude of the Treasury operations, and the fact that we owe $10,000,000 payable on demand and liable to be called for any day.

Moreover, we have at this session of Congress made very important reductions of internal revenue taxes. We have taken off the tax on cotton, and also on all manufactures, making an estimated reduction of some fifty or sixty million dollars; and although we expect some increase from other sources the amount to be received from internal revenue in the next fiscal year is somewhat problematical, and we ought not, therefore, run the Treasury too close.

I do not, however, sympathize with the views entertained by many that we shall have a deficit at the end of the next fiscal year. The development of our great country is so rapid and its resources so immense, the enterprise and energy of our people so wonderful, that our receipts are almost uniformly in excess of our estimates, both for import duties and internal tax. This has been largely the case since the close of the war, so much so that estimates made to about cover current expenses and interest on the public debt have so far exceeded as to furnish a surplus of some three hundred millions to be applied to the reduction of the public debt. But it would be unsafe and unwise in the face of the reductions we have made on the tax list to depend upon our receipts to pay the $30,000,000 of compound-interest notes which fall due between this and 15th October, and of course must be paid.

I submit, then, Mr. President, that the proposed loan is the simplest, easiest, and cheapest form of providing for these maturing obligations, and trust that the Senate will disagree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois as impracticable and pass the bill as it came from the committee. As I stated on a previous occasion, the Committee on Finance are unanimously in favor of the bill, and it is warmly approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I cannot permit the manifest fallacy of the statement of the Senator from New Jersey to go unchallenged. It is a most remarkable way of stating a balance in the Treasury to compute all the payments that will have to be made out of the Treasury and say nothing about the receipts. The Senator from New Jersey tells us that we are liable to pay $7,000,000 for Alaska; that there is a maturing indebtedness of the United States which we may be called upon to pay.

Mr. CATTELL. It is paid.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That we have to pay interest on the debt. Surely we do. We would not want this gold if there were none of these obligations. But did the Senator tell us how much gold we were receiving? He told us he was afraid, in consequence of the reduction of the internal revenue taxes, that our receipts would be less. What has that to do with the receipts from customs? Did the Senator from New Jersey tell us that the duties had been reduced? He did not say a word about that. I stated the other day, and the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury will show the facts which I state, that the receipts from customs for the year ending June 30, 1867, were upward of $176,000,000 in gold. What does the Senator from New Jersey propose to do with that? I stated that during the last year, for which we had full reports, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in his last annual report, there were received in gold from customs for the year ending June 30, 1867; the report for the year ending June 30, 1868, in full I have not seen; but that is the report made to us at the commencement of the present session of Congress—$176,417,810 88. What does the Senator from New Jersey propose to do with that?

Mr. CATTELL. I answer the gentleman just here. The constant practice of the Secretary of the Treasury is to sell the gold down to a point which he thinks is safe and convert it into currency and use it for current expenses. Further, while I am on my feet, let me say to the Senator that the receipts of gold from duties were only about one half for the month of June, 1868, what they were for June, 1867. The receipts have fallen off and have been falling off, and the probabilities are that they will continue to do so. The Secretary of the Treasury told me that you could not compute at the extreme the income now at more than from ten to twelve millions per month.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have a little information on that subject. I stated what the receipts from customs were for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867. The Secretary in his report gave us one quarter's receipts during the last fiscal year. The receipts from customs for the quarter ending September 30, 1867, were $48,081,907 61; so that the receipts were much larger that quarter of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, than they were the year before.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be $192,000,000 a year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes; that would be $192,000,000 for the year if it kept on at that rate. But the Senator from New Jersey says the receipts were very small for last June. Possibly they may have been. I have not those figures before me, but it appears from the last official report to which I had access that we were receiving duties at the rate of $192,000,000 a year in gold during the last fiscal year that ended only a few days since. Certainly during the first quarter of that year we received more than forty-eight millions. The Senator, when I ask him what is to be done with this money, says the Secretary is to sell it. Well, I want him to sell it down to $40,000,000. My amendment would do no harm, let me say to the Senator from New Jersey, if there is no gold more than is required.

Mr. CATTELL. You do not provide for the payment of the $30,000,000 of compound notes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think you will find enough to sell. The Senator from New Jersey did not tell us what the receipts for July were. We had eighty-three millions of gold on the 1st day of July belonging to the Government. If any of it has gone out since, it has been paid since this report, which was made by the Secretary of the Treasury at my instance within a few days.

Mr. CATTELL. That was made up to June 1, I think.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; made up to July 1, and if any money has been paid, if any thirty millions have been paid for interest, it is since the 1st of July.

Mr. CATTELL. It was not due till the 1st of July.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We all know it has been very much the custom to anticipate the interest and to pay it out before the 1st day of July. I do not know whether any of the interest was paid in this particular instance before the 1st day of July; but on the 1st day of July, according to this official report, there were $82,285,465 95 of gold coin in the Treasury belonging to the Government, and $17,000,000 more for which certificates of deposit had been issued. In round numbers, there were $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury on the 1st day of July last.

What do you want to keep $40,000,000 of gold in the Treasury at all for, except to guard against a contingency? As I said the other day, my own judgment was that it was wholly unnecessary to keep such a large sum as that. I think $25,000,000 would be ample, but out of deference to the opinions of others who have insisted upon keeping this amount in the Treasury for the last year, I have put it at $40,000,000. How does the Senator from New Jersey meet it? The official report of the Secretary of the Treasury says that there have been in the Treasury during the last two years more than eighty millions all the time, notwithstanding the interest we have to pay. Now, I propose that we shall sell this gold monthly in the manner proposed, until we reduce it down to $40,000,000. That is my proposition, and I do not think it is fairly met by telling us what we have got to pay, and not saying a word about the receipts. The receipts in coin greatly exceed the payments in coin, and have done so for the last two years, and I have not the least doubt will greatly exceed the payments in coin during the present year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it a substitute or an addition?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a substitute.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, it seems to me proper that we should begin to pay the public debt; and I do not see any project offered that looks better than this. We have, I believe, about one hundred million dollars lying in the Treasury idle. We have certainly had about that amount there lying idle for the last three years. That does not appear to me to be wisdom. It is not the way an individual would manage his own affairs. An individual whose credit was not very good, and who wished to restore it and get it on a proper basis, would begin by paying every surplus dollar that he had to his creditors, thereby convincing them of his honesty and his belief in his own ability to pay his debts. If we sell ten millions of gold per month, as proposed by the Senator from Illinois, we shall pay off with it fourteen millions of our debt, taking gold at an average of about forty per cent. premium. In place of that we suffer this money to remain idle in the Treasury, in the vain hope, as I believe, that men who are now getting six per cent. for the obligations of the Government which they hold, will give up the right to demand six per cent. and take three per cent.

I object to all these expedients. They are like the constitutional drunkard trying to cure himself by taking a little each day. The only cure for him is to leave off immediately. The only cure for our troubles is for us to get back to a regular system and not resort to these expedients. It would have been better, in my opinion, if the Committee on Finance had given us a general system of finance, one which would have recommended itself to the common sense of everybody here, and which would have convinced the country that we were going to do something toward paying our debts. I do not believe that except in a few cases anybody will give up an obligation of the Government drawing six per cent. interest for a certificate bearing but three per cent. There are a few cases where it will be done. Banks that want to hold these certificates as part of their reserve will do it because in that way they get three per cent. upon their surplus capital, and it will be very convenient for some of the banks to use these three per cent. certificates. It will have but little effect beyond here and there a bank that will be glad to use them.

As I have said frequently, I would much rather leave this whole business until we come back next winter. Let us go before the country on no new questions, allowing us to devote our whole time to convince our constituents that the country is in a condition to be reconstructed, if we do our duty, relying also for ourselves upon our acts here, upon the disposition we have shown to meet every public engagement, and our determination to keep the public faith and pay fully the public obligations.

I have not paid much attention to the subject immediately before us; but I am satisfied, as a plain business man, that if I had money lying in my vaults, and I had creditors pushing me daily and doubting my intention to pay, the first thing I would do would be to give them every cent that I had in my possession; and especially would I do so if I had daily and hourly large sums of money coming into my treasury. We are receiving money from imports and from taxes all the time, and yet we leave this money lying in the Treasury in the vain hope that keeping it there will enable us to meet specie payments. To my mind, as the Senator from Vermont said on another occasion, that is ridiculous. When the country is in a condition to resume specie payments, this little sum of $100,000,000, much as it may sound, will be very small. Let us get clear of the greenbacks, as we shall after a while when our credit is restored, and there will be very few demands upon the Treasury; but above all things let us have all the States of the Union here in the Senate acting together with one heart and one mind for the restoration of the credit of the country, and there will be no difficulty about it. I object to this measure entirely because it is one of those temporary expedients; one of those things which are put forward by those who do not look at the whole subject before them, and is unfit, I believe, for the consideration of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, if it is in order, in these words:

That the surplus gold now in the Treasury, and such as shall accrue during the present and next fiscal year, shall be reserved and set apart for the redemption and payment of the legal-tender notes.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to ask a single question, that I may understand this amendment. The Senate having, by the aid of the vote of the honorable Senator from Indiana, prohibited the Secretary of the Treasury from retiring any more legal-tender notes, if the gold is set apart for the purpose of that retirement under this amendment, I should like to know what will become of it in fact?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is in order now as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. MORTON. I offer it as such. I will only say that we now hold in the Treasury a large surplus of gold. The object of holding it is not expressed by law. Let us say by law that this surplus of gold and the gold which shall accrue in the next year or two shall be held for the purpose of redeeming the legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose. Such a declaration in itself, in my opinion, will knock down the premium on gold from ten to twenty per cent. at once.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator mean that it shall be held, and that at the same time we shall retain on the statute-book a prohibition against the cancellation of legal tenders?

Mr. MORTON. I am opposed to the cancellation of legal tenders as that has been done; but, as I said the other day, I am in favor of this Government fixing a time in the future when we shall redeem the legal-tender notes in gold and resume specie payments, and I am in favor of reserving the gold now in the Treasury and that which is to accrue in the ordinary way as a surplus for that purpose, the time to be designated hereafter when the Government will begin the work of redemption and resume specie payments.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am inclined to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. I am not prepared to discuss the question very satisfactorily to myself how much coin we ought to keep in the Treasury; but it has seemed to me that a prudent Administration ought to be able to calculate their wants a good deal closer than $100,000,000; that it ought not to be necessary to keep $100,000,000 in the Treasury to meet unforeseen demands. That, I believe, has been about the way our finances have been administered since the close of the war. I think we could calculate our necessities more closely than that, and I am, therefore, inclined to adopt some expedient which will reduce this surplus in the Treasury.

The Senator from New Jersey, however, says that if we conclude to do that it is better to sell this coin and redeem the five-twenties. Why so? The five-twenties we are not obliged to pay. The compound-interest notes we are obliged to pay. If you have funds in the Treasury which you can dispense with it seems to me the better use to make of them is to supply the most pressing demand, and the most pressing demand seems to me to be that which you cannot postpone.

Mr. CATTELL. You can postpone it by paying three per cent. interest.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator says we can postpone it by paying three per cent. interest. And so we can postpone the same amount of five-twenties.

Mr. CATTELL. By paying six per cent. in gold.

Mr. HOWE. We can raise the same amount of money with your three per cent. certificates. But it was upon this point that I wished to say the few words I have to say; and I speak on this question always with a great deal of diffidence, and not at all certain that I can express the views which I really entertain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. CATTELL. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Finance will allow this bill to be disposed of. The discussion must be nearly exhausted. This bill is from the same committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator really thinks we can soon get a vote on this proposition I shall not object; but I am inclined to think the discussion will go on. I have no objection to letting the unfinished business be laid aside informally for a short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday will be laid aside informally, if there be no objection.

Mr. HOWE. I was about saying that the Senator from New Jersey represents this merely as a provision by which we are to borrow money at a less rate of interest than we are paying now. Of course that would be desirable. If we can substitute a loan at three per cent. for one at seven and three tenths or any higher rate of interest, that would seem to be desirable if that were all there were of it; but I do not understand that that is the extent of this proposition. I do not understand that a man who is borrowing money at six per cent. on time can always afford to change that for a loan at two or three or four per cent. on demand if he has due regard for his credit.

Mr. President, the money we borrow under this bill we are to borrow on demand; and we are to borrow it not of individuals, but to borrow it of banks, as I understand, practically, and we are to assume a very grave obligation. In addition to paying the three per cent. interest which is required to be paid, we assume the obligation under this bill of furnishing a fund amounting to the whole amount of the loan, $25,000,000, and we are to become responsible for the redemption of the bank circulation to the exact amount of this loan. So it seems to me a proposition by which we pay three per cent. for the privilege of becoming responsible for the redemption of the bank circulation to this amount. It is true we are released from the payment of a larger rate of interest on the same amount of money. That advantage we get. Can we afford, can the Government afford, to assume this obligation at that rate? Mr. President, suppose we do assume the obligation. When you provided for these banks you thought it necessary to the security of the bill-holders that they should have a certain reserve of lawful money in their vaults at all times, to be used for the redemption of their bills when returned to them. You thought and you said that was necessary to the security of the bill-holder. Now, this measure proposes to take away that security, or $25,000,000 of that security, from the bill-holder, and to substitute something which is not lawful money, to substitute the obligations of the Government, demand obligations to be sure.

Mr. CATTELL. Is lawful money of the Government anything else but the demand obligation of the Government; and is not this the same thing?

Mr. HOWE. It is very different. Lawful money is not only an obligation which the Government is bound to respect and receive on demand, but which each Senator and every business man in the country is bound to respect and to receive as lawful money on demand. You cannot say that of these three per cent. certificates. The Government is bound to meet them when presented; but when will they be presented? Just when the holders of the bank circulation want lawful money; then they will call on the banks and the banks will not be able to respond, because their money is in the hands of the Government, and the bill-holder must wait until the bank can collect of the Government. How long that will take I am sure I do not know.

Mr. CATTELL. Allow me to say a word. I expressed the opinion the other day that the loan in this form can remain as long as the charters of the national banks continue; and in this opinion the Secretary of the Treasury concurs, the Comptroller of the Currency concurs, and the Finance Committee concurs, all of whom have paid some particular attention to the subject. In the nature of things there will not be a call for the redemption of these certificates.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot express any opinion about that. I am not a banker; I am not a Secretary of the Treasury; I am not a financier; but I do not understand for my life how that opinion can be reconciled with the opinion of all those authorities expressed at the time these banks were organized. Then it was thought essential that this reserve should be in the vaults of the bank; essential to the security of the bill-holder—

Mr. CATTELL. It never has been required to be in the vault.

Mr. HOWE. A certain per cent. has not been in the vault of the individual banks, to be sure, and has been provided for elsewhere, but it has always been in lawful money ready to meet the calls of the bill-holders. I can only say it is not worth while to spend any time in discussing which of those opinions is true and sound; the two opinions do not harmonize with each other. If this reserve is not essential to the security of the bill-holder, then you imposed an unnecessary burden on the banks when you incorporated them. If it is essential to the bill-holder, it seems to me you do a wrong to the bill-holder when you take twenty-five millions of that security away and substitute something very different. But the real question which I wish to put to the Senator from New Jersey and to the Senate is this: can the Government afford to become directly responsible, and to hold itself so, for the redemption of twenty-five millions of bank circulation in order to save the difference between the interest to be paid on these temporary certificates and the interest payable on the compound-interest notes? If it is the opinion of the Senate that the Government can afford to do that, this is a good bargain to make; but I take it there is no man who has regard for his own credit who would assume that obligation upon those terms; and I should not want to impose an obligation on the Government that I would not think it safe for a capitalist to assume himself. It seems to me if the Government assumes this obligation the Government will think it necessary to retain some means in the Treasury to meet this liability, perhaps not the whole twenty-five millions, for that is the extent of the liability; but will not the Government retain something for that purpose? If so, how much? Will it be half? If so, then one half of that interest is sacrificed; instead of saving four and three tenths, you save but one half of that. If you retain seventy-five per cent. in the Treasury to meet this obligation you only make one fourth of the difference. That the Government should assume this obligation, and make no provision whatever for it, seems to me to be rather risky financing.

This is the objection I have to the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey. Of course I should have more confidence in the Senator's opinions than I would in my own ordinarily on a question of this kind, and I do not know but that I should defer to him; but I have not heard him or any one else meet this objection, and therefore I have thought it proper to state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one idea has occurred to me bearing on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois to which no allusion has been made in the discussion; that is as to the effect which the retention of this amount of gold in the Treasury of the United States has upon the public securities. Now, is it quite clear that if the amount of gold in the Treasury is greatly reduced the bonds and other securities of the United States will be worth as much as they are at this time? Public credit is very sensitive, and the people who own our bonds have not that particular information which is possessed by Senators, and they judge from general appearances; and the fact that there is in the Treasury of the United States seventy-five or one hundred million dollars in gold is a fact that imparts confidence to the people of this country and to the people elsewhere who hold the securities of the United States. People generally are not supposed to be acquainted with the necessities or the contingencies that may arise in the transactions of the Government, and if the amount of gold was wholly withdrawn from the Treasury is it not probable that such a fact would, to some extent, affect public confidence in the securities of the United States? I know, as to persons who have access to the records of the Treasury, who understand the condition of the finances of the country, and know exactly what its receipts are, and what its obligations are, this fact may not be of any considerable consequence; but in the estimation of the people, who judge generally without particular information on the subject, the fact that there is in the Treasury of the United States a large amount of surplus gold to meet any of the necessities of the Government that may arise, or any contingencies that may occur, is a circumstance which imparts confidence to the people in the credit of the Government; and it may be that if this gold was withdrawn from the public Treasury the securities would fall in price more than enough to counterbalance the supposed injury the public may receive from the retention of this money in the Treasury. That may not be a very important consideration in a financial point of view among those who study correctly and carefully the condition of the Government; but it has appeared to me that that was a consideration which was entitled to some weight in determining as to the value of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL.]

Mr. MORTON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. Compelled as I am to vote against this amendment of the Senator from Indiana, I dislike to do it without assigning briefly my reasons. As a proposition by itself, looking, as it seems to me, to replacing greenbacks with coin, I should approve it; but we have legislated, and that recently, that greenbacks are not to be canceled or retired gradually or otherwise, but that the volume of greenbacks now out is to be left outstanding. In the presence of that legislation, and proposing no change, the proposition is to lay away idle and dead all the gold which shall accumulate in the Treasury beyond the current gold expenses; and with what view? Why, to leave it for some possible by-and-by; for some time, we know not when, that the hands of the Secretary may be untied, and he be permitted to take up greenbacks with gold, or redeem greenbacks with gold. If it looks to a restoration of specie payments it is a mere exceptional spasmodic effort in that direction; it will have no tendency to accelerate or approach to specie payments without other things being done as cognate measures; certainly not without removing repugnant and inconsistent provisions of law. Therefore it seems to me that the sole effect of the proposition is to bury in the ground this amount of gold, with the premium for which it might be sold, lose premium, lose interest, and lose the right to dispose of the gold in the mean time until some unfixed and indefinite future period which, in point of fact, may never come. Therefore, Mr. President, although I entirely agree with the motive, if I understand it, of this amendment, because it seems to me entirely inadequate to the end and not wisely adapted to it, I am compelled to vote against it.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, one word in explanation of this amendment. I suggested some days ago that the way to return to specie payments was to fix a day when the Government would begin the redemption of its notes. The Government cannot redeem the notes without gold any more than a man can pay his debts without money, and the gold cannot be obtained all at once upon a given day, but it must be collected and reserved. What day that shall be, what time shall be fixed to begin this work, I am not now prepared to say; but we are prepared to say that we will begin the work of reserving the gold for that purpose.

We have now in the Treasury a large amount of surplus gold. We have sold within one year back perhaps $40,000,000 that might also have been reserved for this very purpose. We shall collect in the next year at least $40,000,000 of gold that may be reserved for this purpose; and in the course of a year from this time we shall have a very large sum. If we now declare that this gold is to be held as a reserve for the purpose of redeeming these notes, it would at once give the notes a credit they have never had, as I believe. I heard one of the ablest financiers in the country—it was his suggestion—say that the very existence of a large surplus of gold in the Treasury, although there was no declared purpose for which it was held, gave a strength and support and credit to the legal-tender notes from expectation of the people that at some time that gold would be applied to their redemption.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York says that we resolved that contraction should cease. What kind of contraction? Not contraction by redeeming our notes in gold and then building up the credit of the Government; but contraction by taking in these notes and putting out gold-bearing bonds. That did not restore the credit of the country; it simply gave one form of paper for another. That kind of contraction ceased, and ought to have ceased some time before it did. But, sir, let us hold the gold and collect more, and then say that at a certain time, a year hence or two years hence, whatever time Congress in its wisdom next winter may say, the Government shall begin to redeem these notes; and my prediction is that before you get to the time fixed the premium on gold will be down to almost nothing, and a greenback will be as good as gold, and when a greenback is as good as gold it settles the question as to how the bonds are to be paid and it settles a hundred other difficult and troublesome questions.

Sir, we have a debased and depreciated currency to-day not worth more than seventy cents on the dollar. This lies at the foundation of all our financial troubles, and I believe the way to begin is to begin at the foundation, to take some step directly in the direction of returning to specie payment. Let us say to-day that we pledge the surplus gold in the Treasury and that which shall accumulate this financial year and the next to the redemption of the legal-tender notes, and the very moment that declaration becomes a law, in my opinion the premium on gold will go down one half.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand the argument of the Senator from Indiana to be that the best mode to improve our financial condition is to increase the public confidence in our ability and intention to pay. I agree that this is the grand idea to our financial recovery. We want to give confidence to the people; and the suggestion made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the gold in the Treasury has some value in that regard is well taken. But, Mr. President, nothing can do so much to check the confidence of the American people in the purpose of the Government to deal fairly with its creditors as suggestions every now and then thrown out that we are not legally bound to pay as the people of the United States understand that we undertook to pay that debt. Nothing is so injurious to this country as the suggestion that our securities are to be paid in promises instead of in dollars, as made in the Senate yesterday. The Republican party at Chicago took the true ground on this subject when it declared in these impressive words:

"We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime, and the national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter, but according to the spirit of the law under which they were contracted."

"Not only according to the letter, but according to the spirit," "the utmost good faith," are the expressions of our party. Can any one deny that, when that convention met, there were some in the country who insisted that our securities might lawfully be paid in promises to pay in greenbacks; and can any one deny that that declaration of the convention was made for the express purpose of negating the idea that they were to be paid in anything else than coin? That was the purpose of that provision of the platform, and it was received by this country with acclamation; and I think that wherever a leader undertakes to commit this party to any other doctrine than that we are to pay all our securities as those who took them understood they were to be paid, he goes contrary to the avowed principles of his party and does it great injury. And while my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] would be selected by me, perhaps, sooner than any other Senator to be my leader, he cannot represent me or my constituents in holding the doctrine that the bonds of this country are payable in any other mode than those who received the bonds understood and had a right to understand they were to be paid; and I am satisfied that any party which holds a contrary doctrine underrates the integrity of the American people; the honor of this country is sacred to them. They have invested their money for the purpose of saving this country, and it has been wrung from the sweat of honest toil at the loom and anvil and plow; and the people are ready to pay the last farthing of it.

My learned friend in his argument said that the law does not require that these securities should be paid in coin. I do not agree with him. I understand that by the custom of this and of every other Government, its promises were always payable in coin; and unless some declaration is made in the law contravening that custom, when this country makes a promise it is by strict legal construction payable in coin. I have examined these statutes. The statutes say that the interest shall be payable in coin, without saying the principal. Why? Because it was at a time when specie payments were suspended; and it was only to give the assurance that notwithstanding specie payments were suspended elsewhere, and as to other contracts, this interest as it accrued should be paid in coin. It does not say the principal, because that would be a work of supererogation; and no one doubted that if the country was saved before the principal fell due, being twenty years after date, we would have resumed specie payment, and I do not doubt it now. We find, too, by looking at the act of February 25, 1862, that the Government has by law provided that both the principal and interest shall be paid in coin, for that act expressly declares that there shall be a sinking fund set aside, not to pay the interest of these bonds alone, but also to pay the principal.

But it is argued that because the act of March 3, 1863, authorizing the issue of what are known as ten-forties, provides that the principal as well as the interest shall be paid in coin, that the omission of such a provision as to the principal in the prior acts is very significant. The fact that the law creating the ten-forties states that the principal is to be paid in coin has no significance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask my friend to allow the funding bill to be taken up. It is manifest that the other bill is lost sight of and we cannot get a vote on it to-day, and then his speech would be nearer the question before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall detain the Senate but a minute or two longer.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is manifest that a vote cannot be obtained on this bill to-day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will finish my remarks, Mr. President.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The act of March 3, 1863, does say that the principal is to be paid in coin. But if any one will look at that act of March 3, 1863, he will find that the second act provides for the issue of Treasury notes which are not to be payable in coin, but to be payable by express provision in lawful money, and therefore it was requisite in the same act to specify how the principal of these ten-forties should be paid. As the act necessarily provided that the Treasury notes should be paid in lawful money, when speaking of the principal of these bonds it became necessary to say that they should be paid in coin; and that is clearly the manner in which the expression "in coin" grew into that act.

Besides, those who invested in these bonds had the declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Fessenden, and Mr. McCullough, that these securities were to be paid in coin. We had the declaration and the public advertisements of the agents of this Government; and we all sat here and saw those advertisements made without ever controverting or contradicting them; and the people of this country, men who had fifty and one hundred dollars which they had earned by hard toil came forward with the capitalist and poured their money into the Treasury and took our securities. I rejoice that the great liberty party of the country, the strength of which consists in its advocacy of what is right and just, have in their platform declared that those securities shall be paid in the utmost good faith and according to the letter and the spirit of the contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, unless we can have a vote I ask that the funding bill be taken up.

Mr. CATTELL. I hope that the vote will be taken now.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Corbett, Edmunds, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, and Wade—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McGreevy, McDonald, Morgan, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, Vickers, Welch, Whyte, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Baekalew, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Grimes, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Van Winkle, and Yates—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. At the suggestion of several Senators I will change my amendment so as to offer it as an additional section and not as a substitute, leaving the bill to stand, and moving as an additional section the amendment which I offer, striking out the words relating to the compound-interest notes; in the third line striking out the words "redeeming and retiring the remainder of the compound-interest notes;" and in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth lines striking out the words "or compound-interest notes with the interest accrued thereon."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am embarrassed to know how to vote upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois. The evil of accumulating gold in the Treasury ought to be overcome if possible; but I do not like this mode of overcoming it. My opinion is that the tariff ought to be so adjusted as to bring into the Treasury only the amount of gold that the demands in gold upon the Treasury require. This system of collecting by duties $50,000,000 each year more than are required in gold under existing laws, and selling the excess, $10,000,000 at a time, in the market seems to me to be very vicious. On the other hand, it is an evil and a burden to commerce that $100,000,000 should be kept idle in the Treasury; and I am very much embarrassed in knowing how to vote. Perhaps to the extent that accumulations have already taken place, it will be safe to vote for the proposition, hoping that the proposition which ought to be adopted will be provided for before long.

Mr. CONKLING. It seems to me that the amendment as now modified by the mover obviates both the objections which we heard from the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. CATTELL.] I was impressed with his statement that the proposition at first was one to employ coin to extinguish the least costly obligation of the Government, and I should have been embarrassed in voting for the proposition had it stood as a substitute for the whole bill. Now, the two propositions taken together provide for the issue of three per cents. to be held as a reserve; and to that I am unable to appreciate the objections assigned by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin.

I understand in a word the history of that matter to be this: originally a reserve was to be held by the banks of lawful money, thereby meaning legal-tender notes, the promises to pay on demand of the United States. Under that authority the banks assumed to hold compound-interest notes, notes bearing interest at the rate of six per cent., payable semi-annually, the accruing interest itself bearing interest. Whether that was within or without the permission of the law was questionable; but that question has been condoned, and the banks were permitted thus to hold, and they still hold, a large sum of compound-interest notes. Upon and for these notes the United States is liable. They are matured and therefore the liability is immediate, as much so as it can be upon these call three per cent. certificates. It seems to me that that answers in large part the argument of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin.

But he said further, that we became at once responsible to this amount for the circulation of these banks. Why, sir, the Government is responsible now for every shilling of national bank circulation. We hold bonds to indemnify the Government against that responsibility; but failing those bonds or not, still the Government stands as the guarantor of every farthing of national bank circulation. Therefore I do not see that we increase our liability at all by the issuance of these certificates. It so happens, however, that the peculiar function, the characteristic quality of these certificates is such that they have an extrinsic value; and therefore the banks, perforce, if you please, will accept them when the public at large would not; so that I can see and appreciate the truth and the force of the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from New Jersey that here is an exceptional instance in which, for peculiar reasons, we are able to extend a certain portion of the debt at an interest so cheap as three per cent. Very well, sir; that is an argument upon which I am willing to vote for that portion of the bill.

Now, the Senator from Illinois proposes, this matter being disposed, that gold accumulated in the Treasury shall be sold at monthly periods, down to $40,000,000. What is the answer to that? It is, first, speaking of the present, that the current payments of the Treasury will themselves reduce to $40,000,000 the accumulated gold. Very well; then this is a harmless provision, and it will have nothing to act upon. To be sure, we shall take nothing in the present by our motion, but no detriment can come. That, I think, is enough to answer it, because the argument of the Senator from New Jersey presupposes that there is no danger and no harm in exhausting gold down to $40,000,000 or thereabouts. That, he says, is the operation of the present administration of the Government. If, then, there is no overplus upon which this provision is to take hold, I repeat no harm can come. If there is an overplus, has anybody of late made an argument and satisfied the people of this country, or the two Houses of Congress, that beyond this large working residuum, working balance or deposit, whatever you please to call it, of $40,000,000, it is worth while to hoard gold in the Treasury for some unexplained reason? I know that heretofore arguments have been made on this subject, and I think I may say truly that those arguments have expired by their own terms. Those arguments have exhausted themselves in the actual experience of the occasion. Nobody is more competent than the honorable Senator who sits on my right, [Mr. CATTELL,] to enlighten us on that subject, and he has stated, I have no doubt, with candor, exhaustively, all that can be said in favor of this proposition; and I think he will agree with me when I say, that giving the utmost force to all his suggestions, it leaves him and leaves me at liberty to conclude that, beyond $40,000,000, or some such sum conceded to be sufficient as the residuum remaining on hand, the surplus gold in the Treasury ought to be disposed of.

But, Mr. President, I have heard the suggestion made since this debate has proceeded that we are withdrawing from the Secretary a discretion on this subject and assuming it ourselves. Yes, sir, we are; and in that respect I submit this proposition stands in marked advantage and has marked recommendations when compared with another proposition for which this will presently be put aside. Here is one single point of administration, a simple proposition which has been viewed round and round by the business community of the country and by Congress. As far as its isolation, its simplicity, and our long experience with it go to enable any person, Secretary of the Treasury or others, to determine what is right, we ourselves are enabled to form an opinion; and therefore, when we legislate with regard to it, it seems to me that we do not invade that wholesome discretion which ought to be left to the Secretary of the Treasury.

But, Mr. President, if we do invade that discretion, if we arrogate to ourselves what ought to be left to administrative action, what shall be said of the funding bill, as it is called, which waits upon this measure? There is a subject into which various and complex considerations and elements enter. There is a question which if in private business it were to be determined by an individual, a firm, or a corporation, it might well be said that we should cut according to the cloth; that our way should be felt; that that mode of disposing of it should be resorted to which belongs peculiarly and alone to administration, to experiment, and to discretion; and yet the Senate is not stopping as to that.

Now, sir, without dwelling upon this, I insist that if this proposition of the Senator from Illinois be obnoxious to the criticism that it is taking hold of a discretion which ought to be lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury, the other measure which we are considering is so obviously and so hopelessly obnoxious that we can hardly expect properly to deal with the subjects which it embraces. I think this discretion has been left long enough with the Secretary, and I think the people of this country, and not only the people, but the experts in finance, bankers, business men, and political economists who have written about it, have been left long enough to grope in the dark for a reason, as the Senator from Indiana said, for, in the first place, raising a large surplus gold revenue, and then, beyond the working capital or balance in favor of which an argument can be made, holding it for some unrevealed purpose and in deference to some argument which, I repeat, has not yet been made, and in circumstances which are wholly unsatisfactory to the people of the country by whom this amount is raised and for whose interest it ought to be used.

Therefore, I shall vote for this amendment, relying upon the fact that if there is no surplus upon which it can take hold, it will do no harm; and if, beyond the surplus for what it provides, there is a quantity of gold in the Treasury, that gold should not be there, but should be sold to extinguish the most expensive interest-bearing obligations which go to enhance the burden of taxation under which the people of this country are compelled to groan.

Mr. SHERMAN. If this amendment is to pass I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to an amendment that must be made, unless he wishes entirely to stop the payment of interest upon the public debt in coin. The amendment as it now stands provides that when the amount of gold shall be reduced to $40,000,000, exclusive of the gold certificates, then the excess shall be sold. I submit to him this consideration: that the amount of payments maturing at a single time are from thirty to thirty-six million dollars. On the 1st of July and on the 1st of January interest matures, and is payable on each of those days to the amount of between thirty and thirty-six millions, and that amount is increasing daily as the seven-thirties are being converted into the gold notes. The result is that on the 1st of December, for instance, if the balance in the Treasury was $45,000,000, the Secretary would be bound to sell all above $40,000,000, and then on the 1st of January he would be unable without exhausting the entire surplus, to meet the interest of the public debt.

I know that there is a strong feeling against the hoarding of this gold, and at one time I introduced a proposition here limiting the amount to $50,000,000. I did not press it, because the argument was urged with a great deal of force that the very presence of this gold in the Treasury, although it was a loss of interest to the Government, operated as a great safety-valve to prevent speculations in gold and to prevent the rise and fall of gold. However, I do not wish to discuss it.

If the Senate choose to add this as an additional section to this bill the amendment ought to be made that I now suggest: to insert in line eleven, after the word "given," the words "and exclusive of interest accruing within sixty days thereafter;" so that it will read:

Till the amount of coin in the Treasury, exclusive of that for which gold certificates of deposit shall have been given, and exclusive of interest accruing within sixty days thereafter, shall be reduced to the sum of $40,000,000.

For instance, suppose this bill had been in force on the 1st day of July last. There are $99,914,000 in the Treasury in coin. Taking out the certificates leaves about eighty-two million dollars. The amount maturing on the 1st of July is $31,000,000. Alaska will consume $7,000,000 more, and the expenses of our foreign intercourse and the expenses of our Navy abroad, all of which are paid in gold, might sweep every dollar of gold in the Treasury, a contingency that I think the Senator ought to provide against. I think the amount of the limit he has put, $40,000,000, is entirely too low. Then, any sudden fluctuation or falling off of customs might leave us without money to pay the interest of the public debt.

With this statement I am perfectly willing to leave the question. I do not think this section ought to be added to a small bill providing for $25,000,000 of three per cent. certificates—a mere temporary measure—nor do I think the Senate ought to adopt it without full consideration.

Mr. MORTON. I simply wish to say that the adoption of this amendment now will have the effect to provide that the surplus gold in the Treasury shall at no time hereafter exceed $40,000,000, and is equivalent to the declaration on the part of the Government that the legal-tender notes never will be redeemed. That is simply what it amounts to. We provide that the gold shall never accumulate to exceed $40,000,000, and we are saying to the nation that the legal-tender notes which we have promised to pay in gold never will be paid, because we have determined that we will not accumulate the gold with which we can do it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think it is saying any such thing, as the Senator from Indiana supposes, to the people; and I do not suppose that the credit of this Government depends on the amount of gold that it has in its Treasury. Does the Senator from Indiana, or the Senator from Oregon, who urged this suggestion, suppose that the credit of this Government, which owes to-day $2,500,000,000, depends upon the amount of gold it hoards up in its Treasury rather than upon the wealth of the nation, the production of the nation, and the enterprise of its people? It is the wealth of the country, the enterprising population we have, the vast productions and resources of the country that give the nation credit. It does not depend upon $40,000,000 or $80,000,000 that is hoarded up in the Treasury. The Senator from Indiana is not more in favor of specie payments than I am. I am in favor of returning to specie payments, and I wish some measure could be adopted to-day looking to an early resumption of specie payments.

There is great force in what the other Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] said, that we ought not to collect more gold than we need. I do not believe in burdening the people with taxation and collecting money for the purpose of selling it. I agree with him that our tariff ought to be so adjusted as not to collect more gold than the necessities of the country require. But no proposition is suggested in regard to the tariff. This surplus has been coming into your Treasury; it has been lying there for years; and shall we keep it there? This measure will not prevent a reduction of the tariff. I shall be ready to unite with the Senator from Indiana whenever a fitting occasion offers to reduce the tariff, so as not to allow more gold than we need to be collected. That is no reason, however, for keeping gold in the Treasury. I hope that the amendment I have suggested will be adopted.

One word, however, in reply to the Senator from Ohio, who says that $40,000,000 is not a sufficient surplus, and then he illustrates by what would have been the condition of the Treasury on the 1st day of July last if this proposition had been in operation. Why, sir, the $40,000,000 would have met every obligation, and more, too, and we are constantly in the receipt of gold. I presume the receipts of gold during the month of July will amount to fifteen or twenty millions; I do not know the precise sum.

Mr. SHERMAN. They amount to about ten million dollars a month now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The receipts for the first quarter of last year, as I have already shown, were more than $48,000,000—more than $16,000,000 a month.

Mr. SHERMAN. The actual receipts are about one hundred and forty-five million dollars a year now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Have the receipts for any year within the last three years been as low as $145,000,000? The receipts were $156,000,000 in 1866-67, and for the first quarter of 1867-68 $48,000,000. I should be glad to know if the Senator can inform me what the actual receipts were for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last?

Mr. SHERMAN. The accounts have not been made up yet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose not; but we have two quarters I think; certainly we have the first quarter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it will be about one hundred and sixty million dollars for the whole of last year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is $40,000,000 more than the interest upon our entire debt that is payable in gold; so that we are receiving all the time more than we have to pay out. There can be no danger in reducing the surplus down to $40,000,000. Suppose it does take nearly all of it; so much the better. We do not want a dollar of surplus in the Treasury for any other purpose than to meet the calls upon it. Certainly the Senator from Ohio would not be in favor of keeping a single dollar in the Treasury if he knew he would always have the means coming in to meet every obligation. It is only for that particular purpose that you propose a surplus.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are the greenbacks obligations?

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are, in one sense, obligations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In what sense?

Mr. TRUMBULL. They are such a kind of obligation on the part of the Government that I suppose they ought to be redeemed at some time or other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What in?

Mr. TRUMBULL. We ought to redeem them in coin, unquestionably. As to these other obligations I am not disposed to say how we ought to redeem them. That question is not necessarily involved in the present discussion. The suggestions I was giving were in reply to those thrown out by the Senator from Ohio; and, according to his own statement, these $40,000,000 would be ample to meet any call that might come upon the Treasury at any time.

Mr. CATTELL. I beg the Senate to come to a vote on this question. The Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has very kindly allowed the funding bill to run along now for more than an hour. I only wish to say, in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, that it is a very big question, and opens a wide field for discussion, and it ought not to be attached to a bill to which it has no positive relation, at any rate in its present shape. It is a question, as has been seen already, on which there is a wide diversity of opinion on this floor, and there will be a wide diversity of opinion in the other House. I think the bill which I have had the honor of advocating here is so plain and so simple that it will pass this Chamber, freed from this amendment, and pass the other House without difficulty. I shall be very glad to listen to the Senator from Illinois on this question when it comes up in a distinct form, not trammeling a little bill of this kind at the close of the session with so big a measure, one on which so wide differences of opinion are held. Therefore I rose now, without entering into the discussion of that question on its merits, to say that I hope for that reason the amendment of the Senator from Illinois will not prevail.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am not disposed to take up time about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the funding bill. I think that this bill is going to lead to a long discussion, and therefore I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. CATTELL. I think we can get a vote now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to yield, if we can get a vote; but I am satisfied that we cannot. I know other Senators want to discuss it. I call for the special order.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President—

Mr. CATTELL. May I make an appeal to my friend from Oregon to allow a vote to be taken, unless he feels compelled to say something upon it?

Mr. CORBETT. I have been trying to obtain the floor for an hour to make some remarks on this bill. I think it is a very important bill, one that should not be considered in haste, and on which all the Senators should be heard who desire to speak upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate, it having been passed over by common consent.

Mr. STEWART. I wish the chairman of the Committee on Finance would let me pass a bill, that will take but a minute or two, removing political disabilities from certain persons. It is very important that it should go through in order to remove the disabilities from a large number of persons, who are necessary to the organization of the southern Legislatures.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would lead to debate.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think anybody will want to discuss it. If they do I will withdraw it. I only ask for five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist upon the regular order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Believing that a vote can be taken very soon, and that much of the time which has been expended this morning will be wasted unless we do get a vote, I was going to move that that be postponed until the bill introduced by my colleague is voted upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think when the bill is taken up the next time the Senate will be in a better temper for voting. I do not believe a vote can be had to-day upon it. That is my opinion. I hope we shall proceed with the funding bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of Samuel N. Miller; and

A bill (S. No. 486) to facilitate the settlement of certain prize cases in the southern district of Florida.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 387) to fix the compensation of the United States depository at Chicago;

A bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia, of March 30, 1867;

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it was my desire at this time to submit some rather extended remarks to the Senate upon the political questions now occupying public attention; but the condition of my health to-day will only allow a brief reference to them.

I have observed for some days past a purpose on the part of Senators who represent the majority to avoid the position of the defensive, and to assume, if possible, that of the offensive in this political contest. In my judgment, that is neither practicable nor possible on their part; it is not in the nature of the case. For eight years the Federal Government and most of the State governments of the North have been controlled by the party now in the majority in Congress, and it is not possible that that party can avoid a response to the people upon the questions that attract public attention.

Waiving an inquiry into the conduct of that party during the war, which they claim it is not just to make, and confining the inquiry to the three years since the close of the war and the return of peace, there are certain important questions that must be answered. And, first, the people will desire to know very distinctly and emphatically what has been done with the $1,200,000,000 that have been collected from them under the internal revenue law and the tariff system since the 1st day of July, 1865. I know that $400,000,000 may be accounted for at least in part in the payment of interest upon the public debt. Then the people will want to know how it is, independently of the interest upon the public debt, that it has taken $800,000,000 to carry this Government through a period of three years, when in a time of peace it used to require but from sixty to seventy or eighty million dollars annually. The people will wish to know during this contest whether this enormous sum of money, which has put the citizen everywhere over the land upon the observance of the strictest economy to respond to the demands of the Government, has been expended in the promotion of the public welfare, or whether it has been expended in the promotion of the interests of a party; whether it has been expended to extend the enterprises of the country, or to maintain in the southern States that system of government which has gradually proceeded from step to step in arraying one race against another; whether it has been expended in genuine acts of benevolence and kindness, or in maintaining a political system by which the colored people have been organized throughout the South into a political party; in other words, whether this enormous sum that has been wrung from the people has been expended for their benefit, for the promotion of their interests and for their good, or for other purposes; and no arts of the orator or ingenuity of the sophist can avoid an answer to that grave, direct, and important inquiry.

Why is it, sir, that in a time of profound peace it has cost $100,000,000 a year to support an Army of fifty-six thousand? The people especially will want an answer to that question when you propose to elect to the Presidency the head of that Army, who for a portion of that period was not only the General of the Army, but the Secretary of War. They want to know how it was that during the administration of the Department by him it cost at the rate of $120,000,000 to support the War Department and Army, when it used to cost but $1,000,000 to the regiment. The people will want to know why it is that in a time of profound peace, when we have no war, except inconsiderable strifes on our borders with the Indians, $95,000,000 were expended, in the fiscal year before the last, to maintain the Army, independent of bounties, and that for the quarter when the candidate for the Presidency was the Secretary of War, it cost about thirty million dollars, or at the rate of $120,000,000 per annum; $2,000,000 to the regiment; $2,000 to the man. The people will want the majority in Congress, when they demand the continuance of power beyond this period of eight years, to answer why it is that so much money is drawn from them by the extraordinary power of taxation, that it may thus go to support the most expensive military system that has ever been known in the world.

I might speak of some of these expenditures. I might speak of that favoritism in a small way which has shown itself in the publication in the newspapers that are favored by special legislation in the District of Columbia of notices for inconsiderable Army supplies upon the Rio Grande, and at the distant forts, when it was impossible from the date of the publication that any man could receive information by such publication which would enable him to compete in the bidding. I might speak of other expenditures of like sort, indicating a favoritism not worthy of any political party that claims the confidence of the country, but I will not occupy so much of the time of the Senate.

The people will wish to know during this contest why it is that the Supreme Court has been denied the right to inquire into the constitutionality of the legislation of this Congress. The people know that the Supreme Court was established as one of the securities to their liberty, as one of the props and pillars underneath their institutions. They want to know why this prop and pillar has been stricken down, and for what political and party purpose it has been done. If your legislation be constitutional, valid, and right, then the people will wish to know why Congress should shield itself in its enactments from that inquiry that the Constitution intended should be had in regard to all legislation.

The people during this contest will wish to know why it is that the executive department has been stripped of that power which has been conferred upon it by the Constitution; why it is that Congress has assumed to itself all those powers which, for nearly eighty years, were exercised under the Constitution by the executive department; and for what purpose of good to the people this was intended. Why is it that from the Executive has been taken the responsibility for the execution of the laws? Why is it that to the Senate has been assumed that responsibility? Why is it that Congress has said that the power to remove from office shall be taken from the Executive, when that power has been exercised, and as I believe according to the spirit of the Constitution, and as I know, according to the construction of the fathers, by the Executive all the time; and that in the Senate, a many-headed body, where responsibility is divided so that it lights upon no particular individual, a responsibility should be assumed which is worth nothing to the people and guarantees nothing to the fidelity and security of the public service.

The people will want to know why for three years a party with a majority of two thirds in Congress have not restored the southern States to their practical relations to the Federal Government; why it is that such a period has elapsed and no genuine, peaceful, and permanent results have been attained? They know what is the condition of affairs. They know what temporary enterprises have been set on foot in the southern States. They understand all that quite well; but they want to know, and they demand to know, in my judgment, with a very earnest demand, why it is that these States have not been restored in the spirit of the Constitution and with that harmony which will promote the permanency of the Union, the stability of our institutions, and the prosperity of every section of the country. The people will want to know in this contest why it is that Congress stepped in between the Executive and an immediate, peaceful, practical, and permanent restoration of the States to their practical relations to the Federal Government; why it was that when we were so far advanced in that work under the policy inaugurated by the Executive, when States were accepting the propositions, adopting constitutions that were acceptable everywhere, agreeing to everything demanded by the North, acquiescing in the results of the war in every respect whatever, Congress came in and, exciting a strife with the Executive, stopped, and to some extent defeated, that restoration policy which was bringing again permanent union and permanent prosperity. That question will be asked by a sensible, thinking people, and it is for the majority in Congress, and for their partisans over the country, to give a direct, plain, and unequivocal answer.

The people will want to know in this connection why it is that by this political controversy that Congress has gotten up with the Executive, striking down the policy that was then almost a success, the return of trade, production, and of prosperity have been indefinitely delayed. They know, as Senators know, that from the time when this controversy was gotten up by Congress to break down the policy of restoration, then almost completed, the productions of a large portion of the country have from year to year fallen off, and that the exports which those productions furnished, enabling us to keep up the balance of trade somewhat in our favor, have fallen off so much that in a large degree that balance has been made up in gold and in the Government securities. The people want to know why it is that trade cannot be allowed to return to its ancient channels; that the industries of the country are not encouraged, but that, on the contrary, they are kept in that disturbed condition that investments dare not be made by capital, and that labor is afraid to make an effort even if capital should be invested.

The people will ask one further question, what has been gained by this controversy, like the question that in former times was asked by the grandchild of the grandfather in relation to the great battle, "What has all this been about?" Senators know very well that when the Thirty-Ninth Congress met the work of restoration, according to the policy of Mr. Johnson, was almost completed. Constitutions had been adopted in the southern States abolishing slavery, or declaring it abolished forever, repudiating the southern debt, and making every pledge to the Federal Union which northern sentiment demanded; but Congress intervened against that policy and interposed its own, and now the people, after two or three years of delay, of distraction, of the disturbance of trade and commerce, want to know what has been gained by it. When you come to answer that question to the people you cannot show them a single southern constitution which any republican mind can say is a better constitution than had been adopted under the Johnson policy, unless you say it is a better constitution because the negroes are enfranchised and a part of the whites disfranchised, and the power in a great section of the country taken from the white men and given to the colored men.

The people will want to know why it is that after the close of the war, after there was no longer a rebel soldier with a gun in his hand, after the South had amended its constitutions and changed its laws according to the demands of the North in every particular, after they had declared slavery abolished, secession a fallacy, and the rebel debt not to be collected, why, then, in one third of this country did the party in power break down State governments and establish in their stead military governments; why was it in that work you made the civil law subordinate to the military law; the judge upon the bench subordinate to the commanding officer; and gave to a military officer the power to drive the legislators from the halls of legislation, and to substitute men of his own selection in their place, and subverted all the principles of free government, recognized, honored, and revered in this country, and established in their stead a system of government that finds no parallel in any of the countries of the world since the days of the proconsuls. To that question, it seems to me, it will be difficult to find a suitable answer. It is not enough to say that in neighborhoods there were broils and murders. Why, sir, some time ago I read to the Senate, from one of the papers published in this city, a telegram coming from the central portion of Alabama that the fifth white man had been murdered in the same neighborhood, and no notice whatever had been taken of it; and that, too, under the government, military, powerful, and despotic, which you had established there.

Mr. President, when the people of the country demand to know of their legislators why civil law is subordinated to military law, why the judge upon the bench is stripped of his robes of office, and in his stead there is substituted a military commander to decide upon the rights of the people; when they demand to know why in secret commission and military court the citizen is tried for a criminal offense, or touching a civil right, why these things are done in this country in a time of profound peace, some grave and weighty answer must be given them.

They will want to know why it is that you pretend for the time to repudiate on the part of Congress the right to establish negro suffrage in the northern States and yet establish it in the southern States; why it is that you rally upon a platform attempting to avoid the responsibility of this issue at home, and yet would seek to establish such a system of suffrage in ten of the States of the South; and what answer will you give? Do you tell the people of the North that they are not interested in the question of suffrage in the southern States? You cannot make that answer, for this fall it may occur that the negro votes of the South will decide the presidential election. It may occur that a majority of the electoral votes in the North will be overcome by the negro votes of the South. It may not so occur; but yet if it does occur, and if the colored people of the southern States, holding the balance of political power in this country, shall decide who is to be the President and the Vice President of the United States, is not that coming home, as a practical and direct question, to every northern man; his vote being overcome by the vote of the colored man of the South, and that, too, by an act of Congress? So that the people of the North will want to understand how it is that you pretend not to force upon them negro suffrage at home, and yet establish it in ten of the States of the South.

The people will want to know why, in a time of peace, the rights of the citizen have been trampled under foot, and the ancient writs of the law which protect and secure them in their property and in their personal liberty have been abrogated; why it is that instead of the courts of law where men are heard face to face, the witnesses called face to face, the jury from the neighborhood hearing all the evidence, deciding the case, why that mode of trial in court has been abolished, and in its stead has been established the military court, where there are none of the guards and securities for justice that a thousand years of experience have shown to be essential?

Mr. President, the two parties into which the people of this country are now divided have declared their platforms of principles; they have put their tickets in nomination; and it is for the people now to decide which set of principles they will adopt, and which set of candidates they will elect. Upon this subject I have but very few remarks to submit.

In my opposition to the ticket that was nominated at Chicago I never expect to place it upon personal grounds. I recognize the gentleman at the head of that ticket as an eminent military man, and his associate as a distinguished civilian. Against them, personally, I expect never to express a sentiment. I oppose their election because they have become, by acquiescing in their nomination, the representatives of the sentiments that have controlled Congress for the last three years; because they stand upon a platform which is objectionable in part and equivocal in part.

The convention at New York has expressed its views in a platform which in no section can be misunderstood. The man that runs may read and understand. The plainest as well as the most learned will interpret it alike. It declares our views and our purposes so distinctly and emphatically that the people are not and cannot be misled.

The contrast between the two platforms struck me with great force as I listened to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] some minutes since, as he read one of the sections of the Chicago platform declaring that the public debt must be paid in accordance with the letter and the spirit of the law. What does that mean? My colleague would say, I have no doubt, that it means one thing, and the Senator from New Jersey would claim that it means another, a very different thing. Many Senators claim that the spirit of the law is that the bonds shall all be paid in gold; while other Senators, eminent and clear-headed, say that it means they shall be paid in greenbacks, if Congress chooses so to pay them.

The resolution of the Democratic convention is as follows:

"Payment of the public debt of the United States as rapidly as practicable; all moneys drawn from the people by taxation, except so much as is requisite for the necessities of the Government, economically administered, being honestly applied to such payment; and where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide that they shall be paid in coin, they ought in right, and in justice, be paid in the lawful money of the United States."

The resolution declares that, unless the obligation issued by the Government, or the law authorizing its issue, expressly provides that it is to be paid in gold it may be paid in lawful money.

The law authorizing the issue of the five-twenties provided for a lawful money, and declares Treasury notes, with the legal-tender clause, to be lawful money; and neither the law nor the obligation provides that these bonds shall be paid in gold.

Governor Seymour stands upon this platform, and I claim that the platform explains itself, and standing upon the platform his position is not and cannot be misunderstood.

I had thought of reading one or two other of the resolutions adopted at New York, in contrast with the resolutions adopted at Chicago, to show that at New York positions were assumed plainly, distinctly, directly, so that the people could not be misled by anything that was there said. But, sir, as it would likely take more time than I am able to occupy this morning, I will not go further in that direction.

With a platform explicit and direct upon all the great questions that now attract public attention, it only remains to inquire who are the men that stand upon it. I need not, in addressing either the Senate or the country, occupy much time in speaking of Governor Seymour. He has been long known to the country as one of the first of her statesmen. A ripe scholar and profound thinker, in times and in positions of great difficulty he has done the State much service. He has filled positions the highest in this country except that to which he has been nominated, and to which, in my judgment, he will be elected. A statesman cool in thought and efficient in action he will command the confidence of the country.

I know that criticisms have been made upon his conduct during the war. I am glad that it requires but a sentence to answer all criticisms. So efficient was he as the Executive of the great State of New York, in the raising of troops, and especially in the aid he gave to the Government about the time of the battle of Gettysburg, that Mr. Lincoln returned him, in the most earnest and emphatic manner, his thanks.

He is an eastern man, but he is acceptable to the Northwest. We know from the sentiments that he has always expressed that he is not a sectional man. He is a man who, at the head of this Government, will recognize all sections, and respect and labor to promote the interests of each. While the chief Executive of the State of New York he favored, publicly and privately, that policy which would encourage the producers of the great Northwest. He favored on the part of the State of New York the adoption of a policy that would allow our heavy freight to pass over the State canal almost without charge; and if his policy had been carried out to the extent that he desired the Northwest would have been benefited to the extent of millions of dollars. A national man, fair to all sections, he may well receive the support not only of his own but of that section from which I come; and I believe that he will receive a support, whether sufficient to control the votes in the South or not I will not say, but a cordial support in that section of the Union. Whether he can obtain the electoral votes in the southern States will depend, in my judgment, upon the question whether the military are kept organized in those States, and the Freedman's Bureau, with its party machinery, to control the elections.

Of General Blair, the candidate for the Vice Presidency, I need say but little to the Senate. He was at one time a member of the other branch of Congress, and recognized by all as possessing high attainments and abilities. Talented, generous, and brave, he will receive an enthusiastic support. Connected with the Army, and participating in some of its grand movements that have made its heroes immortal, his name and fame will be cherished and guarded by his late associates in arms. The criticisms, sharp and ingenious, that have been made upon the views which he may have expressed upon the condition and rights of the people of the subjugated States will not be heeded by the people when they reflect that you have shut the door of the Supreme Court against all inquiry in regard to the legislation which he has denounced. You have declared that your legislation shall not undergo that review and examination which the Constitution itself contemplated. You have declared that the judiciary shall not decide whether your acts of reconstruction are constitutional and valid. You have therefore left it to the executive to decide for itself.

Mr. President, I believe that the highest interests of this country demand the election of this ticket, and that it will be elected, and that the country will again be restored to permanent peace—peace that rests not upon subjection to despotic power, but upon the restored supremacy of the Constitution and the rightful authority of all the departments of the Government, and to a prosperity as enduring as that peace.

Mr. STEWART obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will yield the floor I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

J. HARLAN,
C. COLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURN,
B. F. BUTLER,
J. B. BECK,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I perhaps ought to make a statement in regard to two or three points of this report, which provide matters of legislation outside of an appropriation, which I should like the Senate to understand so that hereafter it may not be said that they were taken by surprise. As a general thing I am opposed to legislating on these appropriation bills, and I should be very glad for the relief of the committee if the rule of the Senate was the same as that of the House of Representatives that no matter of legislation should be put upon these bills; but it is otherwise, and the practice is otherwise. What I want to call the attention of the Senate to, and particularly of the Committee on Finance, is the first amendment, which is in the appropriation for the necessary expenses of carrying into effect several acts of Congress authorizing loans. The Senate agreed to appropriate $1,500,000. The conference committee agreed to a reduction of $250,000 upon the ground that there has been so much reduction in the expenditures under the tax bill that possibly that may be sufficient; but we have agreed to that with an amendment relative to the printing in that department which is now very large. We have no means of estimating it; it is not so large of course as the printing establishment proper, but it has grown to very large dimensions; in that establishment a great deal of printing for all the Departments and all the bureaus, of a character over which Congress has not the slightest control, is done; and the cost of it of course we have no information about, and the expense of which it is impossible for us to tell. This is a proposition that all the letter-press printing and binding for the Departments and bureaus hereafter shall be done at the general printing establishment of the Government, except in relation to the binding of the registered bonds and blank books that are peculiar to this department and bureau, and which may more appropriately be done there.

That is one point. Another is in regard to the mints. It may have been noticed that there is a provision in one of the amendments that the refining of gold shall continue to be done in the Mint and branch mints in the country, and that no contract shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the contrary; that is, he shall be authorized to make no contract by which the refining shall cease to be done in the mints. I may be permitted to remark, perhaps, that yesterday a bill passed the House of Representatives repealing the laws on the subject of refining in the Mint and branch mints of this country. The law stands in this wise: in 1853 an act was passed authorizing the director of the Mint at Philadelphia, whenever a private establishment was capable of doing the refining then being done at the Mint, to cease refining at the Mint.

In 1861 this provision was extended to all branch mints, so that it came to be regarded as the settled policy of the Government that it was not worth while for the Government to do the refining in the Mint and branch mints, provided it could be done by private establishments. The Committee on Appropriations were not very well informed on this subject, but it seems to have been the policy since 1853 to discountenance the refining of bullion in the public establishments of the Government, for what reason I do not know; probably it was thought that it would be done to better advantage in private establishments. Now, upon an apprehension that there was some contract about to be made on the Pacific coast, which was prejudicial to the general policy of the Government and the general interests of the miners particularly, a bill passed the House of Representatives such as I have referred to; and this proposition in this bill is made in some sense to meet what are supposed to be the reasonable expectations or demands on the part of the House who passed that bill. As it now stands, it will be seen that the laws on this subject remain as heretofore; but the Secretary of the Treasury is prohibited from making any contract for refining. Whether he ever had that power I do not know; or whether he ever undertook to exercise that power I do not know. I suppose that the policy that has existed since 1853 will continue to exist under these statutes, so that where at any mint or branch mint it is found that a private establishment is refining under circumstances more favorable to the Government than it could be done by the Government, still that policy would be pursued. That is all there is of that.

Then we make a change in regard to the Patent Office fund, which is a radical change and which the Senate ought to understand. This provision provides that the Patent Office fund so called, a fund arising from established fees in that department, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States. That is the amount of that. I understand the fund to be about a quarter of a million dollars; and all the funds which shall arise from fees in that establishment hereafter are to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and $250,000 is appropriated out of the Treasury for the payment of the current expenses of the establishment. This branch of the service is entirely, I may say, conducted at the discretion of the Commissioner of Patents. I do not know that there are any complaints against the Commissioner of Patents now, or that there have been heretofore of any abuses. But it is a very extraordinary exercise of discretion to be deposited in any Department or bureau of the Government. This establishment, from very small beginnings, beginning, I think, with a Commissioner and two or three clerks, has now grown up so that the expenditure the last year was between six and seven hundred thousand dollars, all collected and disbursed entirely in the discretion of the Commissioner. He receives it all and disburses and expends it all, with no oversight or supervision from any quarter, not even under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. But then I say, in justice to the present incumbent and his predecessors, that I know of no complaint. Still this fund has grown to such dimensions and the discretion is so very great that, in justice to the officer himself and the department itself, it would seem that the money as it arises should go into the Treasury of the United States and be paid out under such limitations and conditions as apply to other funds. As this is so radical a change and upon an appropriation bill, I thought it my duty to state thus much to the Senate that hereafter it shall not be said that they were taken by surprise.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question as to the construction to be placed on one of these amendments. I am not familiar with the technical language in which these provisions have been made; but the first proviso added is "that all necessary letter-press printing and book binding in all the Departments and bureaus shall be done and executed at the Government Printing Office and not elsewhere, except registered bonds and written records may be bound, as heretofore, at the Department." That applies to all printing except that connected with money. The tax law now under consideration contemplates the possibility of new stamps which are really in the nature of Government bills, being printed at the Treasury Department for safety. I ask whether this would prevent that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; it is not understood to apply to that. That is engraving.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say in regard to the exception that we have the language of it from the Department itself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask my colleague whether the matter of paying the patent fund into the Treasury was a matter discussed in either House, or whether it is put on by the committee of conference?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is put on by the committee of conference. The subject was introduced into the bill and was before us, growing out of an appropriation to rent a building to accommodate a portion of the clerks of the Patent Office; and the committee on the part of the House insisted upon some provision of this kind.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How is it in regard to the printing?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This printing was not the subject of any action in either House that I know of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It originated with the committee of conference.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; but it was involved in the appropriation bill in this way: we appropriated $1,500,000 to execute the loan laws; heretofore the appropriation has been more; and the Senate and House disagreed on that appropriation; the House insisting that it was very much larger than was necessary; they agreeing to appropriate, I think, $450,000 only. The House seemed to think that a good deal of the expenditures of that office might be transferred economically to the Government Printing Office, and they insisted upon cutting down the appropriation $250,000, and believed that by transferring the work to the Government Printing Office it could be done at lower rates, and all that portion of the expenses involved in the printing and binding for the several Departments and bureaus saved.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no printing done there except blanks used in the Treasury Department, and no binding at all, I think.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Our information on that subject was derived from the head of the Printing Bureau, Mr. Clark. We understood that there was a pretty extensive business of printing and binding for the several bureaus and Departments, not always of a private and confidential character, but of various descriptions, which might as well be done at the proper place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know what may have grown up there within the last three or four years. I merely made these inquiries to get information. I disapprove entirely of general legislation or legislation of any kind by committees of conference which has not been presented to the two Houses for consideration and discussion. It is very apt to lead to difficulties, and I think is wrong in principle.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to take this occasion to say that no man can be more averse to it than I am myself. I have attempted on all occasions to resist it as far as practicable; I think the principle is pernicious; but the Senate will bear me witness that while I have attempted to resist it on these bills the Senate has invariably held that it was the right of the Senate to attach such measures to the bills.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am speaking of legislation by a committee of conference outside of the Senate. The Senate can put on anything it pleases after discussion, and it goes to the House, and is there discussed; but if it is a matter of legislation which is adopted by a conference committee it is settling a question that has not been considered in either branch as it ought to be, and it results in this; that a committee of conference may legislate on matters which have not been before the two Houses.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was for that reason that I felt it my duty to explain distinctly to the Senate what there was in this report which was matter of legislation, and to bring it to the attention of the Senate, that they might see how far it was legislation and how far it was germane to the bill.

The report was concurred in.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WILSON to the amendment proposed by Mr. SHERMAN from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I am glad to see the Democratic party again on the aggressive. I am glad that their leader in the Senate has recovered so that he can assume the aggressive. It is gratifying to all his friends that he is able to come forth and put on his armor, and has got again into the war-path. He says that the American people are going to ask some questions; that they are going to ask why we have been compelled to expend so much money, why we have done this and that; but he intimates that they will confine their inquiries to what has been done since the surrender of Lee, and he says that he does not propose to go back further than that time. Let me tell the Senator from Indiana that there are some other questions the American people will ask. They will ask why the Democratic convention indorsed Andrew Johnson's administration, and why they now denounce it as corrupt. We have never denied it. They will ask why it is that the Democratic party plunged this country in civil war, and involved it in a debt of $2,500,000,000. They will ask why that party sought to overthrow the Government. They will ask why it was that not only the present debt, but a vast amount of taxation, running into the thousands of millions, almost beyond computation, has been expended to put down the Democratic rebellion. Especially will they ask why it is that the Democratic party has put forward as its leading standard-bearer Horatio Seymour, the leading copperhead of the North, who aided the rebellion more than any other. What does that signify? Why did they abandon HENDRICKS of Indiana? Why did they abandon the Chief Justice of the United States, the head of the great court which is so much respected? Why did they abandon Hancock? Why did they throw all these men overboard? It was to get a representative man who would be acceptable to the rebel wing of their party. They have a representative man. I cannot let this occasion pass without alluding to the significance of this nomination, and the reason why Mr. Seymour was selected.

Mr. President, Mr. Seymour was a peace Democrat, was an associate and friend of Pendleton, Vallandigham, and of those who opposed the war. Why is it that the Democrats have nominated for President the man of bad eminence, who was Governor of New York in the most critical hour of the rebellion, when everything was trembling in the balance? Why have they taken the man who, when the South was red with loyal blood, when the hearts of all men beat with anxiety, went to the Academy of Music in New York, on the 4th of July, 1863, in company with Pendleton and others, there and then to advocate resistance to the draft, there and then to proclaim to the excited people of New York city, that a mob had an equal right to proclaim the law of necessity with a Government? Why did they take the men who, on the 4th of July, 1863, told the American people that the war was a failure, and that the only way to preserve their liberty was to resist law? Why did they take the man who, on that occasion sneered at every effort of this Government to maintain its own existence? Why, above all things, did they pass over every patriotic name and take up the representative of the cold-blooded, treasonable peace Democracy? I will tell you the reason. If anybody doubts his record I have before me a small portion of it, and I can produce more. One or two extracts are enough. He commenced his speech on the 4th of July, 1863, thus:

"When I accepted the invitation to speak, with others at this meeting, we were promised the downfall of Vicksburg, the opening of the Mississippi, the probable capture of the confederate capital, and the exhaustion of the rebellion. By common consent, all parties had fixed upon this day when the results of the campaign should be known, to mark out that line of policy which they felt that our country should pursue. But in the moment of expected victory, there came the midnight cry for help from Pennsylvania to save its despoiled fields from the invading foe; and, almost within sight of this great commercial metropolis the ships of your merchants were burned to the water's edge."

That was the way he talked. Why is it that they put him at the head of their ticket, a man who used such language on the day when the invincible Grant took Vicksburg? Why is he selected? I call the special attention of the loyal Senator from Indiana, whose virtues that convention could not appreciate, to the following beautiful sentences of his successful rival:

"Are you not exposing yourselves, your own interests, to as great a peril as that with which you threaten us. Remember this?"

He was discussing the draft and advising them in this very speech to defend their hearths, declaring the draft unconstitutional, declaring that the Government of the United States had no right to enforce it. He said:

"Remember this, that the bloody, and treasonable, and revolutionary doctrine of public necessity can be proclaimed by a mob as well as by a Government."

That is the language of your presidential nominee.

Mr. HOWARD. Read it again.

Mr. STEWART. "Remember this, that the bloody, and treasonable, and revolutionary doctrine of public necessity can be proclaimed by a mob as well as by a Government."

And within eight days from that time the most disgraceful mob that mars the good name of our nation was raging in the very metropolis of the State of which he was Governor, vindicating his words, taking the ground that they had as good a right to proclaim the law of necessity by which they might take life and destroy property as the Government of the United States. He was the representative of the idea of mob violence. Every line of that speech contains a suggestion to disobey the law. The mob came and you say he helped to put it down. I say he ought not to have advised his friends to enter into it.

But I will proceed a little further. I have another one of Governor Seymour's speeches which he made to the mob. It was after this mob had raged some days, after he had got a little news from Vicksburg, and a little news from Gettysburg, and he was not quite so brave as he was on the 4th of July. Then he makes a speech, and he calls them "my friends." This mob had burned down orphan asylums, had gibbeted men in the streets, and had destroyed $2,000,000 of property, which the city of New York has since refunded. He calls this mob of blood and violence "my friends," and he says to them:

"I have come down here from the quiet of the country to see what was the difficulty; to learn what all this trouble was concerning the draft."

He had been there on the 4th; he had told them about the draft; he had made a speech, and so had Pendleton and Seymour of Connecticut and O'Gorman, and they had agreed, one and all, that the mob had the right to take this matter into their hands. Then he returned to the country, and comes down after they had been killing and murdering for several days, and he says:

"My friends: I have come down here from the quiet of the country to see what was the difficulty; to learn what all this trouble was concerning the draft. Let me assure you that I am your friend. [Uproarious cheering.] You have been my friends, [cries of 'Yes,' 'Yes,' 'That's so;'] 'We are and will be again;'] and now I assure you, my fellow-citizens, that I am here to show you a test of my friendship. [Cheers.] I wish to inform you that I have sent my adjutant general to Washington to confer with the authorities there, and to have this draft suspended and stopped. [Vociferous cheers.] I now ask you, as good citizens, to wait for his return; and I assure you that I will do all that I can to see that there is no inequality, and no wrong done any one. I wish you to take good care of all property as good citizens, and see that every person is safe. The safe-keeping of property and persons rests with you; and I charge you to disturb neither. It is your duty to maintain the good order of the city; and I know you will do it. I wish you now to separate as good citizens, and you can assemble again whenever you wish to do so. I ask you to leave all to me now, and I will see to your rights. Wait until my adjutant returns from Washington, and you shall be satisfied. Listen to me, and see that no harm is done to either persons or property, but retire peaceably."

The meeting at the Academy of Music was brought together for the purpose of inflaming the people against the draft, and the Governor of the State, who held the reins of power to enforce the law, was there, telling them that they had as much right to do that as the Government had to enforce the draft, and after they had done their bloody work he tells them, "Wait a little while; if we have not scared the Government enough yet so that they will yield and surrender to us, you may reassemble."

Why is it that this man was nominated? Is there not some purpose to be carried out? There is a little piece of evidence that explains that. There is a war to be prosecuted. I hold in my hand the letter of his colleague on the ticket, Mr. Frank Blair. Mr. Frank Blair, it is true, was once a Republican; but in order to secure a nomination at New York he sent to that convention a manifesto which the Senator cannot approve, from which he recoils with horror; which, excuse it as he must, he cannot but condemn; and he says that upon that letter he wants the nomination. In that letter he declares that seven States shall be expelled from this Union by force of arms if his friends are successful. He declares for war, and declares that they have a right to expel States.

Mr. McCREERY. Will the Senator read any portion of Mr. Blair's letter that declares for war.

Mr. STEWART. The whole of it.

Mr. McCREERY. Just read that part.

Mr. STEWART. The whole of it is for war.

Mr. McCREERY. Just read one sentence.

Mr. STEWART. The letter says this: that it is idle to talk of legislation to accomplish the purpose; it cannot be passed through the Senate, and therefore the President must upset these governments, treat them as nullities, and call upon the military commanders to undo the work that has been done there, overturn them all. Why was he selected? What do they propose? They propose war. The American people want to know why it is, after four years of bloody war, after such vast expenditures of blood and treasure, after years of effort to restore the country, when we are returning to our habits of industry and economy and peace, Horatio Seymour, an advocate of mob violence, Horatio Seymour, who proclaimed the war a failure, Horatio Seymour, who denied the right of this nation to maintain its own existence, is placed as a candidate by the Democracy at the head of the ticket. They will want to know why Vallandigham placed him there. They will want to know why Vallandigham took him by the neck and said, "No, you shall not resign." They will want to know why Forrest, of Fort Pillow notoriety, eulogized him. They will want to know why he is the special friend of Wade Hampton. They will want to know why these gallant chieftains of the rebellion brushed the loyal Democrats, like so many flies, behind them, and took this chieftain of the peace Democracy, odious in the nostrils of the people, held him up, and shook him over that convention amid the cries of the bewildered and befooled western delegates.

These are some of the questions the people will desire to have answered. They will want to know why the delegates from the West and from the East congregated in that modern city of iniquity allowed themselves to be hoodwinked and allowed him to be placed in that position. I tell you, Mr. President, the object of putting him there, the embodiment of the peace Democracy, the embodiment of opposition to the war, the embodiment of the slave-ruling idea, the embodiment of everything that is anti-American, anti-progressive, and anti-Democratic, is to endeavor to reverse by the verdict of the people the verdict of the war. They put him there to do honor to the lost cause. They put him there to condemn the efforts of the loyal people of this nation to maintain this Government. They put him there knowing that his election above that of any other man would be a condemnation of the war, would be a repudiation of everything loyal, just, and noble. They put him there to insult the memory of those of our noble heroes sacrificed by his neglect. They put him there because they believed that with him they could most effectually humiliate Grant. They put him there because they had grown brave and rash. They put him there because they were on the aggressive and had determined to make loyalty odious. They put him there because they intended to make every Union, liberty-loving man in the country bow down in the dust. They put him there in a fit of over-confidence, to please their southern friends, to revive the rebellion, to reverse the order of things.

But now the amazement and the chagrin that are felt show that they mistook the temper of the people. They forgot that the evil he had done was still remembered. They might have taken Hendricks or Hancock or somebody who was not identified with riot and bloodshed and treason to the Government. They see that they have made a great mistake. It was the over-confidence of the rebels in the beginning that they could overthrow the Government which made them light the torch of civil war. It was their over-confidence that led to their destruction. It is the over-confidence of these schemers for a new rebellion that has opened the eyes of the people; and I tell you when the contest is ended the record of those who stood by the country during the war will be vindicated. The people will maintain those who stood for the Government through the sorrows, losses, dangers, and privations of the war. They are not willing to reverse its verdict. They are not willing to humiliate loyalty. They are not willing to renew the war for the sake of reestablishing peonage or slavery in the South. Why should not people desire peace and security and Union? Why should they wish to put Vallandigham, Hampton, Vance, and Forrest in power? What have these worthies done to merit office? They will not stop to talk about little quibbles in regard to the consistency of the Republican party or little irregularities in carrying on the war. They know that our financial troubles since the war grew out of the corruption of Johnson's Democratic administration. They are not willing to reverse the verdict of arms, to re-erect the chains of the slave, and to make this a white man's Government for the benefit of a few arch-traitors. Those who raise this cry do not propose to make it a white man's Government for the sake of the white man, but for the sake of treason. Why should this be made a white man's Government for the sake of treason? It will not be a white man's Government when you have done; it will be a rebel Government, in which the poor, white and black, will be trampled into the dust, as they ever have been. Why tear down governments based upon equal rights where all are protected? Why tear down governments which are an honor to the American name? The American people will pause long before they enter upon this work.

The verdict is already recorded. My friend from Indiana sees the handwriting upon the wall. Let him go home to his State. Let him go home and fight for his individual self there. Nobody has any personal hostility to him. Let him make his own fight as he can; but after the convention has repudiated everything that looks like loyalty or love of country, when they put up nothing but the black idols of rebellion for him to worship I beseech him not to load himself too heavily with the record of Blair and Seymour; it may endanger his own little fight in that great State which he seeks to govern. But this attempt to elect such men with such a record means that every loyal man is to be humiliated and trampled in the dust. It means that the debt is to be repudiated, the honor of the nation to be destroyed. It means a dissolution of the Union by the expulsion of States, because Blair distinctly stated it and desired to be nominated on that issue. It comes to us in that shape; and if the deserters, the traitors, the cowards, and the rebels were right; if the American people think they were right and we were wrong all the time; if all the Union armies were wrong, then let the verdict be recorded that Grant is the greatest murderer that ever was or ever can be in history; then let Sherman and Sheridan and Thomas be disgraced; let their names be stricken from the rolls of the Army; let none but traitors be placed there; let Lee take the place of Grant and Forrest of the gallant Sheridan; stop paying your pensions to the widows of the soldiers who have fallen; let anarchy reign supreme; ratify the glorious doctrine of your leader, that mob violence is as legitimate as governmental power; adopt the motto, "Let ruin come again."

But, sir, the American people are not so inclined, and however aggressive my friend from Indiana may be in defending the forlorn hope of his successful competitor in the New York convention, he will make very little impression on the country except that he intends to be true to his party, that he means to prove to the world that his head is not sore although his heart aches a little, and he is very much disgusted with the proceedings of the convention. He has said enough on that subject; let him leave it to a generous people. They will not condemn him too severely, they will sympathize with him; but he must not attempt to get them to worship at the altar of Seymour or Blair, because they will not be persuaded. He must not try to transfer the love and admiration felt for him to two such men representing such ideas as they do, because he will fail in that and they will cease to confide in him.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, the provision now proposed inaugurates a new system which, it seems to me, would be very detrimental to the interests of the United States. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts provides for imposing upon our bonds a tax of one half of one per cent., which has certainly never been attempted by the Government before. These bonds have been popular, and will continue to be more popular if we maintain our public faith, provided we do not tax them. We have always contended, and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, that United States Government bonds cannot be taxed; that it is necessary for the Government to have power to issue bonds free from taxation so as to maintain the national credit, to be able to protect ourselves from incursions from abroad and to subdue rebellions within. If we now inaugurate a system of taxing the bonds one half of one per cent. there is nothing hereafter to hinder Congress from taxing them one per cent. or two per cent., and when we commence that we do not know where it will stop. Once begin that system, and those abroad who have invested their money in United States Government stocks will send them home very soon. Confidence will be destroyed. Persons who hold stocks from the income of which a tax is deducted will not wish to hold them longer. Thus, the stocks held abroad will be returned upon us, and the result will be that we shall have to send gold or something else out of the country to pay for them. We are not in a condition now to send anything abroad. We are not sending anything abroad in place of gold. In three months, since the 11th of March last, we have sent abroad over thirty-eight million dollars in gold in consequence of the decline of United States securities in foreign markets. One reason of that decline is the agitation of the question whether the bonds of the United States Government shall be taxed, and whether we are going to repudiate this debt or not. All these considerations have had their effect on the price of the bonds, and the result is that gold is going out of the country instead of United States bonds, and we have got to send something out of the country by and by, as we are sending out gold at the rate of $120,000,000 a year, and only producing sixty or sixty-five million dollars. We certainly must stop sending gold very soon or we shall be bankrupt.

It seems to me that the principle proposed by this amendment in place of the present bill is one that will be very injurious. I would rather have a bond specifying upon its face only four and a half per cent. interest than a bond for a higher rate conceding the right of the Government to tax it. Reduce the rate of interest as you may think best in your wisdom, but do not tax the United States bonds. It will destroy the market for them abroad, and destroy the confidence of your own people in them.

I see no objection to the present bill as the Committee on Finance propose to amend it, with the exception of section three, which I think should be stricken out. I have had some little conversation, and attempted to inform myself as to the effect of that section, and my opinion is that it will only tend to create embarrassment and to court speculation in the money markets of the United States at the great commercial centers.

Now, in New York city if stock brokers and speculators desire to create a panic in the money market they go to the banks, and, borrowing all the money they have to lend, seal it up and deposit it for security for thirty days or more, saying to them, "We will pay you interest on this money; but we want it sealed up and placed in your vaults." That takes it from the circulation of the country. An association of men in this way who desire to control the stock market may with $250,000 withdraw $50,000,000 of currency from circulation if they choose. In thirty days they can produce such a stringency in the money market as to reduce the price of stocks to the extent of five, ten, or fifteen per cent. Having done this, they let the money loose again, and in a very short time up go the securities ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent., and they thereby make large fortunes.

I think the provisions of the third section will tend to favor those who seek to bring about such results. If this additional $44,000,000 is placed in circulation it certainly adds $44,000,000 to the circulating medium of the country. The result of the section will be that those holding bonds can at any time go to the Treasury and deposit those bonds and withdraw the money in the Treasury from circulation, provided there is not at the time a total of $400,000,000 in circulation. Men can go to the Treasury, deposit $50,000,000 of bonds, and at once withdraw $50,000,000 of legal tenders from the Treasury, and we must wait for that money until it comes in from taxation. If the men put the money away, the result of the operation is to reduce the circulating medium of the country for the time being $50,000,000, and these men give up four and a half for five per cent. upon the $50,000,000, whereas now in order to control the market they have to pay seven per cent. to the banks. Here is a saving of two or three per cent. by this way of controlling the stock market and making a crisis every now and again under the third section.

Mr. President, what the people of this country desire is stability, something that they can depend on, something that they know will not create distrust and will not be a disturbing element in the money market. They desire to know how much circulation there is in the country and to make their calculations accordingly. If we have a stated amount of circulation, and the only increase is the gold that comes into the country, they can make some calculations in regard to their business transactions; but if you have a circulation that is exchangeable from currency into United States bonds and from United States bonds into currency there will be doubt and uncertainty. When money is easy people will be investing their money in United States securities, and when there is a panic in the market they may convert their bonds into greenbacks, so as to lend them at a high rate of interest. Thus there will be a constant change from one to the other, and men can make no safe business calculations. Such a provision in the bill will have a tendency to disturb the money market and cause more distress than even the present state of things. Now, money is plenty in New York; it can be had for short loans on good security at three and a half, four, or five per cent. At another period of the year money will be scarce there, because it will be wanted in the West to move the crops. If you issue this increased amount under the third section how are they going to get this money in the West? They will not get it. Persons who hold bonds will deposit their bonds with the Assistant Treasurer at New York, draw the greenbacks, increase the currency, and probably reduce the rate of interest there; and there will be speculations to advance the prices of stocks, and when money is wanted West to move the crops there will be a tight money market and financial distress. The bonds may be presented to the Government for currency at a time when the Government has not the money to spare, when it may not have over forty or fifty millions in the Treasury, and under this provision every cent of it may be drawn out and the Government left without the means of defraying its current expenses. There is no guard at all around this provision.

If the third section were stricken out I should think the bill unexceptionable. The other sections provide that the new bonds provided for shall be issued and sold or exchanged for the existing loans now outstanding. It is at the option of the holders of the present bonds whether they will exchange them or not. If they desire to get a permanent loan, something that they are sure of, something which is clear and undoubted on its face, this provides for it, and they can so exchange. In that respect I think the bill is well drawn; but at the proper time I propose to move to strike out the third section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to offer an amendment to that section which relates to gold contracts, to come in at the close of the clause. I do not propose to make a speech upon it; I think it will address itself to the good sense of every Senator. My amendment is to add to the section:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to the renewal or extension of an indebtedness under a contract already entered into.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not see that that would affect particularly the States on the Atlantic side, but it might those upon the Pacific.

They have gold contracts there now under existing laws called specific contract laws. I do not know whether this amendment would interfere with the extension of their contracts. If this should supersede their laws, the law of Congress overriding the law of the State, it might work injury to those interests.

Mr. HOWARD. I can modify it so as to except all those cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a modification of that amendment which, if the Senator from Michigan will allow me to state, I am willing to adopt. To avoid the argument that has been made I am willing to adopt this proviso instead of the one he proposes:

Provided, That where the stipulation to pay coin is a device to secure illegal or usurious interest, it shall not be enforced.

This is what the Senator wants: where the stipulation to pay coin is a device of the party to impose illegal or usurious interest it shall not be enforced. That is as far, I think, as we can go to limit contracts.

Mr. HOWARD. That is not so far as my amendment contemplates going. My amendment contemplates exactly this: that where contracts have been made not payable in gold, and now exist, any contract for the renewal or extension shall not be made in gold, but shall rest upon the same basis as it rested originally. That is my idea.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never been impressed as much as some others with the necessity or advantage of this section; and the criticisms made upon it yesterday by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Wisconsin seemed to me to have some plausibility, at any rate, if not foundation in fact.

I believe that this section ought to be so amended as to except loans of currency, and I would suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he amend his amendment so as to provide that persons who desire to borrow currency shall not be required to give contracts payable specifically in gold, for I can very readily understand that great hardships may be imposed in that way upon persons whose necessities compel them to borrow money; and the object of this provision is to enable those persons who are required to make use of gold for the payment of customs duties or otherwise, to make contracts by which they can buy gold. Here are money-lenders scattered all over the country. There are men whose necessities require them to go to these persons for accommodation. A man, perhaps, expecting that at some time not very far distant specie payments will be resumed, or, induced by some other consideration, may enter into a contract by which he borrows a certain amount of money in currency and agrees to repay it in gold. Thousands of men may be induced to enter into contracts of this kind, and the consequence will be that they will put themselves entirely in the power of the money-lenders, who are notorious for having no conscience, or no scruples, as a class, in pursuing their debtors.

Mr. HOWARD. I have modified my amendment to read thus:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to the renewal or extension of an indebtedness under a contract already entered into, unless such contract originally required payment in coin.

Mr. CONKLING. That amendment enables me better to put a question to the Senator from Oregon. Suppose the amendment is adopted first for my illustration, who is it going to protect? One man has borrowed money from another; the debt has fallen due; he goes to him to rearrange it. This provision would not extend to that contract. The creditor therefore says, "I will not extend this debt; you must pay me now;" and in order to raise the money with which to make the payment he must go to the next man and make a fresh contract with him answerable in coin; so that it would be the old case which has been caricatured in the play and a thousand times in real life of a man saying, "I cannot lend you this money, but I have a friend or a brother who can do it." So in the case supposed by the Senator from Oregon, I ask him whether if his amendment be, as I understood him to suggest, that contracts heretofore made payable in currency should not, in any event, be answerable in coin—

Mr. WILLIAMS. My amendment, if I was to draw one, would be to change the section so as to make it read "that any contract hereafter made—excepting for loans of currency—specifically payable in coin, shall be legal and valid." I claim that where a man borrows currency, if his necessities, or the power which the lender has over him, induce him to give a contract payable specifically in gold for the currency, it ought not under existing circumstances to be enforced.

Mr. CONKLING. Take that very case; the debtor comes to the creditor to get an extension. The creditor says, "No; I will not extend this a moment; you must pay me now or I shall sue you on your note." Is he not then at once driven to go to the next man, who is either in concert with the creditor or not, as you please, to borrow from him in a coin answerable to contract in order to get the money to come back and pay his creditor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not.

Mr. CONKLING. Why not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the first place, I suppose the question assumes that the existing contract is payable in currency. If that be so, and the debtor is unable to pay, the creditor will sue and recover a judgment for currency, and the debtor's property will be sold for currency, his debts will be paid in currency. But if he enters into a contract specifically payable in gold, under this bill the judgment will be for so much gold.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish my honorable friend to enlighten me upon this point. Of course if the contract is returnable in currency, and proceedings are taken to enforce it, the case will be as the Senator states; but suppose, to avoid a suit and seizure of his property on execution, the debtor goes to some other person to borrow this money with which to pay, then he is brought immediately within the scope of the law as it would be after the amendment is adopted. So I ask the Senator how it is in reality that it amounts to a protection even in the case he puts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think the Senator understands the amendment I propose. Suppose that A goes to B to borrow money, and B insists that if he loans him currency A shall make a contract specifically payable in coin. A declines to do it, and he is compelled to go to C to borrow the money. He can no more make a contract specifically payable in gold with C to bind him than he could make a contract with B payable in gold to bind him. He cannot make a contract payable in gold with anybody for the purpose of borrowing currency. That is the extent of my amendment. It is to hold that a man shall not be compelled upon a contract which he makes for the purpose of borrowing currency under any circumstances to refund the amount in gold.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose I go to the Senator under the law as it would stand with this amendment to borrow $100 in currency, and suppose I make a contract to repay him coin less forty per cent., gold being at 140, would not such a contract as that be within the law as he intends to make it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not understand that any contract made for the purpose of borrowing currency, where the payment is specifically to be made in coin, would be a contract which could be enforced under this law, no matter what the amount specified in the contract might be.

Mr. CONKLING. That is, it would not be valid unless coin had been paid out and coin was to be received back?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly, that is what I mean.

Mr. CONKLING. Surely the Senator must see that the moment such a law as that is passed contracts are restricted to the sale of property, because if I cannot go to the Senator and borrow $100 in gold, and in place of gold repay him $140 in greenbacks, the currency of the country, equivalent to gold at the market value, gold being now demonetized, it is entirely impossible that any transaction should take place under the law except it may be to sell my chattels or real estate and take an agreement payable in gold, so that this would not be a commercial law at all.

Mr. COLE obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from California give way for a motion to go into executive session? That will afford an opportunity for these other Senators to confer and come to understand each other, so that we shall get along more speedily hereafter.

Mr. COLE. I have but a few remarks to offer at this time. If the Senate, however, desire to go into executive session I shall not insist on addressing them at this moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the Senator from Illinois wants an executive session, but I trust he will not interpose at this time, and will allow us to go on with this bill. I have seen a great majority of the Senators, and they have told me they are disposed to close this bill to-night. If so, I hope we shall sit on until the hour comes for the recess, and then take the recess, and sit it out to-night, and to-morrow the Senator can have his executive session in time to accomplish something, but if we go into executive session now we shall accomplish nothing before the recess.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, yes; we shall be able to do something by going in now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to give notice to the Senate that on to-morrow the Committee on Appropriations are extremely anxious to present to the consideration of the Senate the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope, then, the Senator from California will give way and let me move an executive session. We certainly ought to do some executive business.

Mr. COLE. As the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who has this bill in charge, is extremely anxious that it should be disposed of to-night, I prefer to go on. This is a part of the bill in which I have from the commencement taken very considerable interest, and though I am in favor of every section of the bill this is the only one upon which I propose to offer any remarks.

Gold and silver have always been the currency in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. The late war, which drove hard money from circulation in the Atlantic States, produced no such result on the Pacific side. Greenbacks have all the while been bought and sold there precisely as gold and silver have been bought and sold in the markets of New York. They have been used to pay Federal taxes and the salaries of Federal officials, but further than that they have not entered into business on that coast. This unusual condition of things is attributable mainly to the fact that banks of issue never had an existence in that State. By her constitution they are prohibited, and before the advent of United States notes her people had no paper money whatever. The facility, therefore, which existed in other States for gliding from the use of one description of paper money into the use of another was wholly wanting in California.

The prime obstacle in the way of bank paper, and afterward greenback circulation, there was the large production of gold, which first led to this constitutional prohibition upon banks of issue.

This condition of things impelled the Legislature of that State to pass a law which is known there as the "specific contract law." It provides that any agreement in writing to pay in coin may be enforced according to its terms. I need not now discuss the validity of such a statute, the local courts having sustained it, and its principles having entered into thousands of business transactions. It is sufficient to say that the necessity for such a law and such a decision was far more pressing in California than in any other State of the Union.

That law effected for California precisely what is sought to be effected for the whole country by the section under consideration. It is intended simply to modify the legal-tender act so as to allow the making and enforcing of contracts to pay in coin, if people shall choose to make such contracts.

United States notes will remain a legal tender, as at present, for all debts public and private unless the specific agreement calls for something else. If there is a single sound objection to this measure it has not yet appeared.

The proposition has been before the country since early in December last, and has elicited much comment from the public press and from private citizens; but I have not heard a single solid reason urged why it should not become a law. It is said that sharpers will take advantage of it to oppress their debtors, by exacting payment in coin where only paper money is due. But this is not likely to occur. No man would exact and no one submit to pay forty per cent. in addition to his debt. This objection to the measure is imaginative, not real. No such advantage could be taken of it. The arguments in its favor, though not numerous, are, in my opinion, forcible. They address themselves directly to the practical sense of the people. There is no compulsion about this measure. The adoption or rejection of its principles is left entirely to the volition of each individual. Unlike every other financial scheme, it is totally devoid of pressure to secure its adoption, and yet there is no doubt it will go into operation. Its own merits will ensure its success. Coin contracts will most certainly be made. Whenever credit is given both parties will prefer it shall be upon the basis of hard money, because that will ensure to both greater safety and certainty. Instead of continuing the undivided use of a standard of value, which is scarcely any two days the same, and which, within the life-time of many a contract, has ranged from par down to forty cents on the dollar of gold, all good business men will substitute the world-wide, time-honored and more steady standard of the precious metals. This standard is not affected by the misfortunes of any nation, but, like the waters of the ocean, keeps on the same grand level throughout the whole world, and is only subject to inconsiderable tides.

Uncertainty in the value of the circulating medium enhances the prices of all commodities, and as well those of prime necessity as those that can easily be dispensed with. The tradesman cannot safely assume the risk of a sudden decline in the value of greenbacks, and he must therefore preserve a larger margin of profits on his sales. The importer and manufacturer must do the same, and the unfortunate consumer at last has to bear the burden.

Mr. President, this bill is calculated to encourage and promote business of every sort. It will restore confidence where now is only distrust. Let us illustrate its workings by presuming a case. Suppose you have for sale a piece of property valued at $10,000 in the ordinary currency, you would just as readily take its equivalent in gold, $7,000. And if the payment were to be postponed one, two, or three years, both the purchaser and yourself would still prefer to specify the $7,000 in coin as the price rather than the $10,000 in a fluctuating and uncertain medium.

All prices are now exorbitant and unnatural. This provision will reduce them to what they were before the war, because they will again be measured by the same standard of value. They will be brought down to the same general level that they have continued to occupy in California. There the only changes in prices have been such as ordinarily flow from supply and demand.

The rise and fall of greenbacks from time to time have produced as little effect upon values there as in England.

There being but little use for coin in this country at present, it goes abroad, too often in exchange for products we do not need. But the passage of this bill, by creating a necessity for it, will keep the coin at home. The amount of coin in the Atlantic States at this time must be very small. There is, on the average, about ninety millions in the Treasury, and outside of it probably not a very much larger sum. The only demand for it is to pay duties on imports; and the brokers and bankers retain a little for speculation, but most of it has gone out of the country because not needed here. All Californians, on landing in New York, rush to Wall street to sell their gold, and I suppose everybody who happens to have a little or much is equally anxious to convert it into some more useful form. Those who had coin hoarded up before the war have been forced by necessities, or tempted by large premiums to sell it, and there is but little of this sort of dead capital remaining in the country. The speculative character of our people precludes the idea that any considerable quantities of the precious metals are hid away in chests and corners. The fact that there is but little coin in the banks is shown by the proposition to-day discussed, asking for the issue of more three per cent. certificates to be used as their reserve. Of those certificates, $50,000,000 are already out. And as gold and silver, being lawful money, may constitute a part of the reserve, it certainly leads to the conclusion that there cannot be much coin in the national banks.

Every contract to pay in specie is in effect an agreement that so much gold shall be retained in the country to meet it; and when such contracts become common, as they will, gold and silver will be found sufficient for the demands of business, and we shall reach a specie basis almost without knowing it, and without the slightest injury to anybody.

Every other method yet proposed for returning to specie must lead to injustice, by enforcing the payment of debts in coin, which were contracted upon the basis of a depreciated paper currency. There is no plan so fair as this for reaching a specie basis, and no other which will not produce convulsions in business and lead to untold distress throughout the country.

But if it be true, as often alleged, that a large amount of gold and silver is hoarded up in this country, why should it not be unlocked? What reason is there why it may not be allowed to go into circulation, so that the people may become accustomed to its use again? If we are ever to go back to specie it must be by some such gradual process, and not by a single stride. If we should blindly adopt one of the many suggestions upon this head, and declare that on a certain day the Government would resume payments in specie, the gold in the Treasury would last so long, and only so long, as would be required to transfer it to the broker shops, and after that single day or so of specie payments we should be further than ever from the end aimed at. The country would find itself absolutely at the mercy of the "gold ring," and its credit would only be saved, if at all, from utter ruin in order that it might further subserve their selfish purposes.

I will mention one other reason for the passage of this law. If the gold and silver coin of the country is put in circulation it will be adding somewhat to the circulating medium now afloat. This at present is too restricted in certain portions of the Union, the South and the West, where the quantity is quite inadequate to the demands of business. The amount of circulating medium in a country ought never to be fixed by law. It should be left to be regulated by the requirements of trade. Money is the element upon which business floats, and without a sufficiency of which it is liable to perish. Good, hard money, or paper money, well secured, is never likely to become too abundant. The former being the accepted medium of exchange among all nations is as certain as the waters of the sea to find its level, and the quantity of the latter will always be governed by the character of the security. If secured by hard money, and equal to it in actual value, it is not more likely to become too abundant. Let loose this gold from its hiding places, and you will hear less complaint about contraction. This coin will by degrees take the place of paper money, and before long you can spare from circulation the $4,000,000 of paper a month without trouble. But should that amount, or even a much less sum per month, be withdrawn, with no provision for supplying its place, the business of the country would soon be hard aground, and general disaster would follow.

Since the Government has taken upon itself the task of furnishing the people a circulating medium it cannot decline the responsibility of providing so much and such sort of circulation as is demanded by the business wants of the people. These wants vary greatly from time to time, and depend upon many circumstances. They increase with population and wealth; they vary with the productiveness of the seasons; they are affected more or less by every summer's shower and chilling wind. It is not possible at any time to determine in advance what amount of circulation will be needed, and the legislator errs when he undertakes to prescribe a rule fixing one definite quantity for different times and different circumstances.

The bill before the Senate will relieve the country from the great embarrassment arising from time to time out of the present law fixing a definite limit upon the amount of circulation. It will unlock just so much gold and silver as may be needed in the current business of the country, and no more. I am sure it will improve the public credit and bring all Government secured paper up to near the common standard of value among all the nations. I believe the passage of the measure will work good, and only good, to the people and the country in every way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is half past four o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt whether there is a quorum here, and many Senators have gone away supposing the discussion would be continued till the recess.

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cole, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Tipton, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, and Wiley—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Craig, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, McCree, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Thayer, Whyte, and Yates—18.

So the motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at half past seven o'clock p. m.

VALLEJO AND HUMBOLDT BAY RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 349) granting aid in the construction of a railroad from the town of Vallejo to Humboldt bay, in the State of California, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. HARLAN. I think there ought to be a provision added confining the grant to lands within fifteen miles.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection.

Mr. HARLAN. I move this amendment, to come in at the end of the second section:

Provided, That no land shall be granted under the provisions of this act situated more than fifteen miles from the track of said road.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: A bill granting lands to the State of California to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the town of Vallejo to Humboldt bay, in the State of California.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up the bureau bill, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with amendments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 567) relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance.

The amendments were in line twenty-two, after the word "operations," to insert "shall be," and after "discontinued" to strike out the words "as soon as the same may be done without injury to the Government."

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate concur in those amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. G. S. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, Mr. JAMES H. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. S. S. MARSHALL of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 616) to remit the duties on a certain statue intended to surmount the soldiers' monument at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MRS. L. T. POTTER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Potter.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 596) for the relief of Mrs. L. T. Potter was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $20,000 to Mrs. L. T. Potter, of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

Mr. HARLAN. I would inquire of the Senator who has called up this bill what is the nature of the claim?

Mr. HOWE. If the Clerk will read the report of the committee the Senator will see.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the following report, made by Mr. Howe:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Eliza K. Potter, submit the following as their report of the case:

The petitioner is the wife of L. T. Potter, of Charleston, South Carolina. She represents that at the opening of the war her husband was very wealthy, and that she possessed considerable means of her own. She further represents that throughout the war her husband and herself were devotedly attached to the cause of the Union, and that she herself and her son, a lad of some sixteen years, devoted nearly their whole time to the care and nursing of Federal prisoners in Charleston, and she represents that in the course of the war she expended of her own and her husband's money more than forty thousand dollars in ministering to the support and comfort of Union soldiers in rebel prisons. She represents that during the war her husband met with heavy losses; that some valuable mills situate near Charleston, and some docks and storehouses in Charleston, were burned; that her husband, from time to time during the war, sold portions of his property in Charleston and invested the proceeds in cotton, in the hope that when the war would close the cotton would be available; that some three hundred bales of cotton were stored at Florence, in the State of South Carolina, and over two hundred bales, part of it sea-land, were stored at Sumter: that the confederate army retreating before General Sherman burned the cotton at Florence, and that after the surrender of Charleston some national troops, under the command of General Potter, made a raid on Sumter and burned the cotton there.

The petitioner concedes that the Government is not legally liable, either for her services, her charities, or her losses; she never expected any compensation for either. And although she found her family at the close of the war reduced from affluence to poverty it was no part of her purpose to ask any recognition from the Government of the sacrifices which she had made, or of the sacrifices to which she had been subjected. Her trust was that business would return to Charleston with peace, and that with returning business the fortunes of her husband would revive. That hope has been disappointed, and she now feels compelled by necessity to ask of the Government some return for what she and her family have done and suffered.

The loyalty of the petitioner and her husband, and the excellence of their personal characters, are approved by Senators who have known them for years, and by many prominent citizens who have enjoyed the same advantage, and some of whom reside in this city, and some elsewhere.

The tireless diligence displayed by Mrs. Potter in her care of our sick and imprisoned soldiers is attested by a voluminous correspondence submitted to your committee, to which correspondence such soldiers and their friends in different portions of the country are parties.

The nature and extent of the services rendered by Mrs. Potter are graphically stated by Mr. Fredrick R. Jackson, formerly a sergeant in the seventh regiment of Connecticut infantry, and now a clerk in the Treasury Department.

Mr. Jackson was himself one of the subjects of Mrs. Potter's care. His own good character and truthfulness are vouched for by one of the Senators from that State. His statement is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 18, 1863.

HONORABLE SIRS: Your chairman, Senator HOWE, having requested me to put in writing a short statement that I made to him in the committee-room this morning, I now comply, adding such facts as during my short audience with the honorable gentleman I was unable to state, and which I think will be further proof of the loyalty and devotion to the Union cause of the noble woman in whose behalf the statement was made:

I, Fred. R. Jackson, formerly a sergeant in company F, seventh Connecticut volunteer infantry, lost my left arm in an attack made by the United States troops upon Fort Lamar, at Secessionville, James Island, South Carolina, June 16, 1862. I lost my arm at five a. m.; lay upon the field until half past ten p. m., when I was taken prisoner and carried through the earthwork which we had attacked to a house in the rear, where my arm was amputated. The amputation took place after I had been stripped of all my clothing. I lay upon the bare floor of the house until late in the afternoon of June 19, 1862, when I, with others who were severely wounded, was placed upon a tug-boat and taken to Charleston, South Carolina; arriving there after dusk of the same day, I was transferred with the rest to a building known as the Mart, and which then was styled the Mart hospital, upon Queen street, near Church street. I was placed in a cell upon the third floor. When I was carried into it there were six already in it; one more was brought in after me, making eight in all in the cell. I was wrapped up in a horse blanket, which smelled as though fresh from the stable, when put on board of the boat to be taken to Charleston. This blanket was removed from me when put into the cell, and I was laid naked upon the floor and hearth, with my head resting in a pile of wood ashes in the fire-place. A small piece of dirty cloth was laid over me to hide my body from waist to feet. I laid there in that condition until about ten a. m. next day, when one of the nurses (an Irishman by the name of Flynn, who was a confederate soldier) came and brought me a small piece of meat and a small piece of corn bread or cake. Soon after he appeared and washed the stump of my arm with cold water, although not effectually enough to cleanse it of the maggots which literally covered it. In washing it he allowed the water to run under my shoulder and head, and that, together with the perspiration which the weakness of my body naturally caused, coming in contact with the wood ashes under my head and neck, made a lye which ran down the entire length of my back, and in the space of a few hours my back was one large, raw sore.

I think it was the second morning (June 21, 1862) after my arrival in Charleston that Mrs. L. T. Potter, in company with a gentleman, came into the Mart hospital, and went through the various cells and saw our condition. She immediately sent out and had food of sufficient quantity and most excellent quality cooked for us. She also obtained clothing, such as shirts, drawers, and socks, &c., for we were all in an almost nude condition, towels, soap, tooth-brushes, cups, sponges, and cologne, and had almost all of the men (forty-nine) on mattresses, before seven p. m. A large, broad, and very soft lounge was obtained for me. She supplied us all with sheets and pillows, and within three days each man had a mosquito-bar resting over his bed on a frame-work. After this she came every day, bringing sufficient and excellent food for all, and often custard, arrow-root, lemons, &c., for such as could not eat heavy food. Occasionally she brought us delicacies that one or two of her friends had given her for us. Every second or third day she furnished clean under-clothing for us all, and, as fast as occasion required, all articles which necessarily pertain to a hospital where wounded men are lying. Almost daily she brought her son Fred., a young man about fourteen years of age, who performed such services for us as it was not proper that she should. He actually performed all of the menial services of a hired man-nurse.

After she first came to us she came daily (Sundays not excepted) at about nine a. m., and distributed to those who had soiled clothes the clean clothing she had brought. While the men were donning their clean garments in one cell, she would be in another dressing the wounds of all there, taking always the worst wounded first.

The wounds of all literally swarmed with maggots, and, as the surgeon who had us in charge took no steps to keep them from our wounds, she herself took the matter in hand, and procured, as often as was necessary, all of the "labaruge" that was needed. (This was the name by which we knew the solution; so named, I understand, from its discoverer or original maker. I believe it is otherwise known as solution of chloride of soda.) The wounds of some discharged so much that it was actually necessary to change their clothing two and three times a day. I have in mind now the case of a man named Cole, of the eighth Michigan infantry, whom Mrs. Potter always gave daily three changes of clean linen, and another by the name of McVeigh, of the same regiment. I remember was always given the same.

This man Cole complained that his mattress was not high enough above the waist; he wanted to be propped up; so Mrs. Potter had an inclined plane made for him, and he used it until he was sent to Columbia, South Carolina. All of this clothing she procured, bought and distributed herself. She daily had two or three large baskets of soiled clothes taken away by the washerwoman, whom to my knowledge she paid out of her own pocket. I know this from having heard the washerwoman talking with her about it in the entry by our cell.

In addition to all this she never entered our cell door in the morning without being followed by a negro carrying a basket of peaches and ripe figs, and frequently watermelons and cantelopes. She always carried upon her own arm a basket in which she brought us brandy and wine and sometimes cordials. The day never passed during the two months I was in Charleston that Mrs. Potter did not bring for the eight in our cell either brandy, wine or cordial, which she distributed around after dressing our wounds, which she always did in the most tender and motherly manner, talking to us, when not watched by the guard or nurses, kindly, and in a lively vein, apparently striving to keep up the spirits of all. Those in the other cells were treated in precisely the same way. She furnished all with pipes and smoking tobacco, and those that chewed with chewing tobacco. (A paper of "Solace" cost then two dollars; a paper of "Mrs. Miller's" put up in blue paper, seventy-five cents.) We were never, while in Charleston, out of this article; in fact, all of us carried tobacco away with us when we went from Charleston to Columbia. When we were sent to Columbia she furnished every man with coat, pants, boots (or shoes), caps, shirts, drawers, socks and towels, besides many with handkerchiefs. She generally remained with us until four or five o'clock p. m., always busy either waiting upon us or mending our clothes when they were worn, and I have known her upon two or three occasions to stay until eleven o'clock p. m. The guards at the lower door always used to stop her and examine her servant's baskets, but she hired them by giving them money, and in some cases clothes for their children, not to examine hers. Once she came into our cell quite agitated, and upon Captain Pratt's asking, "Why, Mrs. Potter, you seem quite agitated—what is the matter?" she replied, "Not much, only the guards charged bayonets on me at the lower door when I attempted to come in, and I had to coax and finally to push my way in; it seems they had orders to stop me" or words to that effect. I think, however, I have given the conversation verbatim. Finally she was stopped, and through the doctor and by means of money, she got permission from headquarters of General Pemberton to visit us.

After a long talk he, the doctor, was told—so I understood at the time—that "if she was such a fool as to spend her money on those Yankees why then let her, as she claims British protection." His position as us regularly, day by day, against all opposition and the entreaties of former friends, many of whom had not only said that they "would no longer recognize her as a friend," but actually went so far as to insult her upon the public street. These facts we learned from others, who knew Mrs. Potter, and who knew of the insults above stated. She herself never complained of any trouble that she encountered on account of visiting us, and never would let us know any of the trials which she sustained on our account. The nurses which the rebels placed over us were two Irishmen in the confederate service and one Irish woman. Although I believe the confederate government furnished us with something approaching to full rations, we never got one-tenth part of a ration. In fact when able to walk, (about five weeks after I was put into the cell,) I went one day into the cell opposite ours, (the doors being left open as all were too weak to make any attempt to escape,) and looked out of the window fronting on Queen street. While there I saw the man Flynn go out of the lower door with an uncovered basket full of meat and corn bread. The nurses have said in my presence that "we did not need any government ration, as Mrs. Potter fed us all more than anybody could get at any of the hotels." I suppose that was the reason they stole our government rations. Certain it is that during the latter part of our imprisonment none of us got any of the confederate rations. The man Flynn was continually drunk. We used to think that he stole our rations for liquor. His duty was to wash our wounds, so the doctor told him, twice a day, in the morning and in the evening; but he never washed the wounds of any in our cell in the morning, and but seldom in the evening. In the morning either Mrs. Potter or her son Fred would wash my wound and the wounds of the others in the cell. It was always the first attention we had in the morning. She and her son did the same for all in the other cells. The man Flynn would sometimes come up and sit in the entry in the evening, opposite our cell door, and smoke; when called to come and dress our wounds, he would curse us and call all of the evil names he could make his vile tongue utter. I've used to hire him to come in and wash and dress our wounds. I have often paid him five dollars to come in with his pan of water and dress my own wound. The money that I did this with was given by Mrs. Potter. She gave me all of us all the money we wanted. There was not a man in that prison but that had all he wanted, and none of them asked for it. She came around daily and offered it to all in sums of ten, fifteen, and twenty dollars. Captain Pratt once, to my knowledge, took fifty dollars. If any of us were nearly out, she always pressed more upon us. We used it to hire the nurses to do what we wanted done when she was not there; also to send out for anything we wanted in her absence.

We seldom got any change back, no matter what the price of the article sent for. One of our officers once sent out, shortly after our arrival, a gold piece, which he had managed to keep, in payment for something he wanted, and only got back a few Confederate shillings; they charged the regular price, but would give no premium for gold, as they said "it was a prison offense to deal in United States money;" no citizen could use it for fear of being imprisoned. The money Mrs. Potter gave us was Confederate money, but it was worth just as much there, it seems, as our own money. She dared not circulate our money," she said. From hearsay, we all knew, or thought, that Mr. Potter was one of the richest men in Charleston, and that Mrs. Potter was rich in her own right. She sent us money while in Columbia. I received money from her while there four or five times; once she sent it through an officer who had been a friend of hers from early life; he happened to be "officer of the day" soon after, and then came in and gave it to us. For this he was arrested and kept under arrest for a year. When in Columbia we corresponded with her, addressing her by an assumed name at times, but we never told her of our troubles and sufferings there, feeling that she had done so much for us, and knowing that she still had so many to do for there. She earnestly desired to know our wants, saying that she would supply them, but we could not bear to write her of them, as we knew it would sorely grieve her. We did not realize that we were prisoners while under her care, but after a few hours' stay in Columbia we knew only too well what it meant to be in a rebel prison. Holmes and Gilbert of my regiment, and others of other regiments, who died at the Mart hospital, all died in Mrs. Potter's arms, expressing to her, in the hearing of all, their deep and heartfelt thanks for her great kindness and solicitous care for them and us, and praying, with their dying breath, that she might have her reward both on this earth and in heaven.

In stating all that Mrs. Potter and her son did for us I should require two or three days, and the statement would be so lengthy, I fear, as to cause your honorable committee to cast it aside without a reading. She has suffered, in one way or another, as no other woman, North or South, ever has suffered in the cause of the Union. I could tell your committee things that would make your hearts bleed concerning the death of that same son, Fred, caused by injuries received for coming to our hospital and tending to our wants; but I forbear, as an allusion to the subject might be very painful to Mrs. Potter's feelings.

If you require further evidence of me I should be most happy at any time to testify in this dear and noble-souled woman's behalf.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRED. R. JACKSON,

Room 59, Third Auditor's office, (late sergeant company F, seventh Conn. vol. inf.)

Hon. Senators of the United States Senate Committee on Claims.

The committee are of opinion that the Government cannot undertake to make return for all the individual charities by which the history of the late war is distinguished, nor to make compensation for all the property destroyed in the prosecution of that war. But, considering the munificence with which the petitioner voluntarily ministered to the necessities of the nation's soldiers when they were in distress, the committee think it would befit the generosity of the nation to relieve her necessities now that she and her family are in distress, more especially since that distress has been in part occasioned by the national forces.

Your committee therefore ask leave to report the accompanying bill, and to recommend its passage.

Before the reading had been concluded,

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me a bill of that kind ought to be considered in a full Senate. It is a matter about which there is a diversity of opinion. When we commence to pay these claims in the South, it seems to me we ought to have a quorum.

Mr. CONNESS. There will be a quorum here soon.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed.

Mr. HOWE. No, no. The reading has now come to the statement of Mr. Jackson.

I wish the Senate would hear that statement, and then see who will object to the passage of the bill.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the report, and having proceeded for some time further,

Mr. STEWART. I think enough has been read to satisfy the Senate in regard to the character of the evidence. I presume the committee have examined the items. It appears to me that the claim ought to pass. I do not think there is any necessity for reading the report further.

Mr. HARLAN. I will not insist on reading any more of the report, as I perceive my honorable friend from Nevada has become impatient; but I wish to call attention to the character of this class of claims, not this one in particular, for this is the second one that I remember of this kind where an attempt has been made by Congress to pay for the charities that our noble women have bestowed on our brave men on and near the battle-fields of the country. There is no nation on earth that can pay for these charities. I had supposed that the reward they would receive was laid up in a surer place; that it was a higher reward. This may be an anomalous case; but if you will notice the report, there is no evidence that this is a case different from a thousand cases that I think I could name, except the testimony of the woman herself and one sergeant who says he was nursed. There are hundreds of ladies in this city, some of them the wives of members of this and the other branch of Congress, and their sisters and daughters, some of whom are not now living, who bestowed the same kind of charities with as lavish a hand as this report says that this excellent lady bestowed on this patient and others. I do not know where such appropriations would end.

Of course it is a very ungracious thing for any Senator or member of Congress to vote against an appropriation of money for such an object. This is only $20,000; but can the nation pay $20,000 to every noble American woman who has bestowed charities and kindness on our suffering soldiers? I suppose they never dreamed of any such thing themselves originally; and if we undertook to do this, to reward them from the Treasury of the United States, every Senator will bear me evidence that the less meritorious as a general rule will receive the reward.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1353.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1353) for the removal of certain disabilities from the persons therein named was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

An amendment had been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out all after the word "namely," in line ten, being the names in the House bill, and in lieu thereof to insert a long list of names.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Nevada whether there is anything in the bill except to remove from certain individuals who are named the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth constitutional amendment.

Mr. STEWART. There is not; and I will say that as we propose to amend it it includes additional names which have been sent on by prominent men and by the North Carolina delegation recently admitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. And concurred in by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. STEWART. The amendment is reported by them and I have added some names. I have consulted them from time to time. There is no name that is not vouched for by good authority.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to dispense with the reading, because that gives us no information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendment can be dispensed with by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and it is dispensed with.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. After the name of "Peter Saunders," in line one hundred and forty, I move to insert the word "senior."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish, as a matter of course, to move an amendment that I know the Senator from Nevada is disposed to oppose; but I appeal to the Senator from Nevada to adopt some general provision in the bill that shall operate generally in a State on persons in the same condition. I have received several letters from persons stating that they have been elected to little offices in counties in some of the States, some as justices of the peace, and some as county commissioners, and so on; and if they have been properly elected, and the authorities there certify that they are properly elected, the bill had better apply to them generally, and not put us to the trouble of stating by name all these persons of whom we can know nothing. Because their names are put in the bill we cannot know them to be any more entitled to this relief than anybody else. I wish the honorable Senator from Nevada would just put some general clause in the bill by which all persons who are elected to county officers, or members of the Legislature, if they are properly elected under the laws in force there, shall have their disabilities removed. I suggest to the honorable Senator to add that, and save a great deal of trouble. Men have been elected together at the same time, and you pass a bill by which some can be sworn in and some cannot. It is a very improper mode of dealing with persons who have been properly elected to have one class of men send up their names and have their disabilities removed while the others are to remain under those disabilities, whatever they are. I do not think it just to deal with this question in this way. It is utterly impossible for the Senate to take up each case and judge of the merits of the particular case. I suppose there are five hundred names in the bill. We can know nothing of them. I will not divide the Senate, but I will ask the honorable Senator to allow the bill to lie over until to-morrow morning, and then without any discussion I shall simply propose to amend the bill and let it come to a vote.

Mr. STEWART. It will be impossible to get such a measure as that through. There are difficulties about that.

Mr. WILSON. Put it on the next bill.

Mr. STEWART. Let this go through.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will draw an amendment in a moment. I should like to take the sense of the Senate upon this subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin insists upon it, I call for the regular order.

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin to let his proposition be tested on some other bill. Let this go through.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE FUNDING BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to suggest a modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, which I believe he is willing to accept. That is to insert after the word "apply" the words "to contracts for the borrowing of currency."

Mr. HOWARD. I accept that modification of the amendment, and I ask the Clerk to report the amendment as now modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as now modified, reads:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to contracts for the borrowing of currency or the renewal or extension of an indebtedness under a contract already entered into, unless such contract originally required payment in coin.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will not the Senator add "or payment of interest," to guard against possibility of adding gold interest?

Mr. HOWARD. This guards every species of contract.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to amend the third section by striking out "hereafter," in the second line, and inserting after the word "made" the words "from and after the 1st of July, 1870;" so as to read:

And be it further enacted, That any contract made from and after the 1st of July, 1870, specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms, anything in the several acts relating to United States notes to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather at once strike out the section than have it put off a year and a half. People are compelled to get gold to pay duties, and they cannot make contracts for it now.

Mr. RAMSEY. Does the Senator expect to resume specie payments in a year or a year and a half?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is idle to ask that question now. Congress will meet twice before January 1, 1870. I trust the Senator will not press the matter any further. Every objection to the section has been fairly met by the amendment already adopted, and it is not worth while to postpone its operation so long.

Mr. RAMSEY. I propose the amendment; it simply postpones its going into operation for eighteen months.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERRY. I have been seeking an opportunity to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the first section, which I will now offer with a remark or two as to the object of it:

No payment compulsory upon the creditor of any portion of the interest-bearing debt whose payment is authorized in this section shall be made under its provisions, otherwise than in coin.

I will state the reason why I offer this amendment. The chairman of the Committee on Finance informs us that by his construction of the existing law, under this section authority is given to pay the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks to the extent of the $400,000,000 of currency now authorized by law. In other words, the chairman of the Committee on Finance informs us that it is his construction of the law now that those bonds may be redeemed to the extent of $400,000,000 in greenbacks. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORRIS] yesterday in the argument which he made demonstrated that under that legal theory which he himself held and argued for, the new bonds authorized by this first section might be sold, as he stated, to the amount of $50,000,000, and so much of currency received into the Treasury by that sale, and then that currency employed to pay $50,000,000 of the five-twenty bonds which have run more than five years. I do not see but that if the theory of the chairman of the Committee on Finance and of the Senator from Indiana with regard to the lawfulness of paying any portion of the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks is correct, or shall hereafter be held to be correct by the Administration that now is or that is to be, I do not see but that the reasoning of the Senator from Indiana is correct; and that in this first section the Secretary might, if we are to have a Secretary holding the views either of the chairman of the Committee on Finance or of the Senator from Indiana, thus apply the avails received from the sale of the new bonds in greenbacks in compulsory payment of so much of the interest-bearing debt of the Government.

And, sir, as was remarked by the Senator from Maine, this bill is not a mere temporary affair; it is a law which is likely to be permanent. None of us know with certainty what is to be the political character of the next Administration; and if it should so happen by possibility that the next Administration should have one holding the doctrine announced by the New York convention, then most certainly under the first section of this bill the fifty-two bonds could and would be paid in greenbacks derived from the sale of the bonds provided for in the first section of this bill; and if we are to judge by the somewhat strange developments which are surprising us every day, even if the next Administration is a Republican Administration we have no security that the principle adopted by the Republican party at Chicago will be held to be binding upon those who shall conduct that Administration, for it was but yesterday that the Senator from Indiana, not now in his seat, declared that we should not impose upon the Republican party the doctrine that the five-twenty bonds were not payable to some extent at any rate in greenbacks, therefore for himself thus far directly repudiating the Chicago platform. So that, sir, whatever may be the political character of the incoming Administration, I see certainly under the first section of this bill, as it now stands, a danger of a direct authority given by law to apply the currency avails of the sale of these bonds in compulsory payment of the fifty-two bonds. If there be no such danger, then certainly the amendment which I have offered is harmless. If there be such a danger, I, for one, holding the Republican principle of the inviolability of the faith of this Government pledged for the payment of the now outstanding fifty-two bonds in coin to be as cardinal a principle of the Republican party as any for which it has been fighting for the last fourteen years, cannot consent to the enactment of a law under which the possibility of a violation of that faith may be incurred. I hope, therefore, this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust it is not necessary for me at this period of the session to say that it is unwise in every sense of the term to bring that question into this bill. As I said in the opening, there is nothing in the first section to compel the payment of any existing bond or to authorize its payment except by the consent of the holder. If you introduce this very troublesome question, in regard to which there is a difference of opinion in both political parties, you not only defeat the bill, but destroy any hope whatever of passing any bill by which we can reduce the burden of the public debt. This provision would not at all settle the question in favor of the views of the Senator from Connecticut. If under the present law, as it stands, the holders of these bonds are entitled to coin this bill does not change it, nor can any change of their security be had except by their free and voluntary consent. To put this construction of preceding laws on this bill would be simply to raise a question that is not involved in the bill, that has no relation to the bill, and it would at once defeat any effort or any purpose on the part of the people of this country to relieve themselves from the burden of the debt by a voluntary conversion of a bond bearing a higher rate of interest into a bond bearing a lower rate. I trust the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw the amendment, and that we may come to a vote and pass the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not believe the Senate or Congress at the present time is prepared to take any action on the subject of this bill, and I therefore move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. DRAKE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Davis, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, McCreery, McDonald, Patterson of Tennessee, and Wade—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Potomero, Ramsey, Rice, Sherman, Stewart, Tipton, Welch, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Chandler, Corbett, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, and Yates—25.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I wish to modify my amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to suggest to the Senator whether an amendment that I propose to offer, if adopted, will not meet the difficulty he has.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Connecticut, I understand, has prepared a modification of his amendment which I am perfectly willing to adopt.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment I was about to suggest is in the eighteenth and nineteenth lines of the first section to strike out the words "for the redemption, payment, or purchase of or," and to insert the word "in," so as to provide "the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt," &c. As the purpose of this bill, and the sole purpose, as I understand from the committee, is simply to substitute one kind of obligation for another, that is, an obligation bearing five per cent. interest for one bearing six per cent. interest, at a longer time, there is no need whatever of giving the Secretary the power—and it is not necessary to give him a power which he ought not to wish to use—to sell any portion of the present bonds and appropriate the proceeds to the purchase of others. Why not simply confine him to exchanging the new bonds for other bonds? That will answer the purpose.

Mr. CORBETT. Will the Senator not add the words "at the option of the holder?"

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not necessary. The holder, of course, will not give up his present bonds unless he sees fit.

Mr. CORBETT. Should it not be expressed to be "at his option?"

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the chairman of the committee what objection there is to confining it to an exchange.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that the Senator from Maine is astute enough to know that the effect of this amendment would simply be to defeat the bill. It would be to confine all negotiations, all efforts to reduce the burden of the debt to a simple arrangement between the Secretary of the Treasury and the present holders of the bonds. As a matter of course, that would be perfectly idle. Instead of passing such a bill, you had better lay it on the table and be done with it. The way this will operate, the way the Senator himself as Secretary of the Treasury would act, would be to take advantage of the money market wherever he could to sell the new bonds at a rate which would enable him to buy up in the open market an equal amount of the fifty-two bonds. I have no doubt it can be done; and I say this authoritatively, for propositions have already been made by persons who are perfectly able to comply with their stipulation, both at home and abroad, to surrender to the Government of the United States fifty-two bonds and take in payment these new bonds par for par. How is this to be done? The persons who make this contract to take these new bonds sell them at a price which will enable them to buy up in open market the fifty-twenties.

The proposition of the Senator from Connecticut, as he has modified it, there is not in my mind the slightest objection to. He proposes, if I understand him, to make the clause read:

To be used exclusively for the redemption or payment at the option of the holder, or purchase of, or exchange for, any of the present interest-bearing debt.

I have no objection to that. Indeed, the payment could not be made under this bill except with the consent of the holder. Undoubtedly the new bonds will be used in the purchase of the old. With that modification I am perfectly willing to accept it; but to confine this simply to a narrow exchange between the holder of the bond who has it in his possession and the Secretary of the Treasury would be to simply cripple the power of the Secretary, so that it would be perfectly nugatory for him to have the power.

Mr. FERRY. I prefer that the vote should be had upon my amendment as I have modified it, and then if the Senator from Maine wishes to move a further amendment the vote can be taken upon that. My sole object in proposing the amendment was to prevent a construction of this first section whereby the public creditor might, against his consent, be compelled to have his pay for his bond in greenbacks. The modification is to insert between the word "redemption," at the end of the eighteenth line, and the word "payment," in the nineteenth line, the word "or," and after the word "payment," to insert "at the option of the holder," so as to make the clause read:

And the said bonds and the proceeds thereof shall be exclusively used for the redemption or payment at the option of the holder, or purchase of, or exchange for, an equal amount of any of the interest-bearing debt.

So that the bond cannot be paid to the holder, without his consent, in greenbacks.

Mr. SHERMAN. That leaves the Secretary perfectly at liberty to purchase them at the market price, provided he can purchase as many of the old bonds as he issues of the new.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. FERRY. The only effect it has is to prevent the compulsory payment in greenbacks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New York principally framed this section, and I would ask him if he sees any objection to the amendment?

Mr. MORGAN. I think the exchange should be made wholly at the option of the holder.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the point that this amendment is not sufficiently explicit. The phrase is, "at the option of the holder." Does that begin before the first five years have expired, or is it the option of the holder after the first five years have expired? The point in my mind is that after the first five years have expired it might be construed that the bonds were then due, and the holder would not have the option of refusing payment. I think it ought to be expressed that this option is to be after the first five years.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I offer this amendment as an additional section, to come in after the last section of the amendment of the committee:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind, shall be allowed to any person for the sale or negotiation of any bonds or securities of the United States disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent, other than some proper officer of his Department, to make such sale or negotiation of bonds and securities, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I have to say is that to-day, in an act which has been passed, that very provision is inserted as part of the law, and it has now passed both Houses, that no money shall be paid from the Treasury for any commissions directly or indirectly for the negotiation of any loans.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not know there was any such law.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Clerk has the miscellaneous appropriation bill, the report of the committee of conference which was acted on to-day, it can be read, and it will be seen that there is such a provision there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill has gone to the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that he will find that both Houses in that bill have agreed to an express provision that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury for commissions on the negotiation or sale or transfer or exchange of any loan of the United States.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe that bill has not become a law.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has passed both Houses.

Mr. CONNESS. It is an appropriation bill; it must necessarily become a law.

Mr. CAMERON. Well, let us hear what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill has gone to the other House to be enrolled.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the amendment?

Mr. CAMERON. No, sir. I still think this had better be passed. The clause in the appropriation bill can only apply to such bonds as were then authorized. This bill authorizes the issue of a new edition of bonds; and it can do no harm to have this clause in. It is only repeating the good word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to incur this bill with this provision; and I say to the Senator that it has now passed both Houses in another bill. If the Senator has any doubt about it, any member of the committee of conference on that bill who is present can inform him that it is so. The Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] was here and consulted me about the terms of it. The only authority under which commissions were paid was the law of April 11, 1860, which authorized the exchange in accordance with previous laws. That is expressly, in as few words as possible, repealed in the appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. How does it incur this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill does not contain any provision by which any commissions can be paid to mortal man.

Mr. HOWARD. It will be a mere superfluity, then, and will do no harm.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not know there was such a provision in the bill that was passed to-day on the report of a conference committee. I do know, however, that this was, until a recent period, a customary provision in loan bills. I have before me now the act of July 2, 1846. One portion of it is this:

"And provided further, That no commission shall be allowed or paid for the negotiation of the loan authorized by this act."

I think it is a very wholesome provision; and if it be true, as the Senator supposes, that it has already as to the action of Congress become a law, as the Senator from Michigan says, it will be merely surplusage to add it here, it will not incur or embarrass the bill, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I wish to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee a question in relation to the third section. When our tea-forties were thrown on the stock exchange in London they immediately went up, and they now stand at a premium of seven and one fourth per cent. Suppose these new bonds shall be at a premium of seven and one fourth per cent., are they still to be sold at par for greenbacks? A thousand-dollar bond in that case would be worth $1,072 50, and every time the Government sold a bond of $1,000 it would be giving the individual $72 50.

Mr. SHERMAN. That question will enable me to say the few words that I desire to say in regard to the third section of the bill. I was expecting some Senator to move to strike out the third section, so as to enable me briefly to state the reasons why that section was inserted. I will first, however, answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Under this bill the new bonds of the United States cannot rise above par in legal tenders. In other words, legal tenders will always be equivalent to these bonds. That is not the case now; and it presents one of the most vicious and scandalous features of our financial system. Here is the holder of a note which upon its face declares that the United States owes the sum of five dollars and that note is less valuable than any security of the Government in market except a three per cent. certificate. That is the scandal and reproach of the system. It is seized upon by our political adversaries as a just ground of complaint. A poor man may have $100 of United States notes in his hands which are an over-due debt of the Government of the United States. He cannot get a bond for them; he can do nothing with them except pay his debts; but every bondholder may exchange his bonds for notes. The result is that the least valuable Government security in the market is the over-due note on demand of the Government of the United States of America, while all the bonds are above that in value.

The object of the third section is to give to the holder of the United States notes the right at his pleasure at any time to demand bonds for them; so that it will not be possible hereafter that these notes which a man is compelled to take willing or unwilling in payment of his labor and in payment of his debts, shall be less valuable than any other security of the United States.

I say, then, in response to the Senator from New Hampshire that if this bill passes such a state of affairs cannot occur, because this bill will raise the value of the notes up at least to the value of the new five per cent. bonds, and I have no doubt that this provision will be the most rapid, the most easy, the most natural road to specie payments that can possibly be devised by mortal man.

What is now the difficulty in the market? Money is too abundant. Money is not valuable. The note of the Government which is over due is now worth only seventy cents on the dollar, while the five per cent. bond of the United States is worth seventy-two; the six per cents are worth seventy-eight, and a bond of 1881 is worth eighty-two. Why should that be so? Why should not the note of the Government, which every man is compelled to take in payment for his labor, have equal value with the lowest security of the Government? There is no reason for it in the world. You never can resume specie payments until you elevate the value of the greenbacks up nearer to the standard of both bonds and gold. This is the crying scandal of our system now, and I heard it last fall upon the stump and I never could answer that point, that this note which a man is required to take is less valuable than any other form of Government securities. I say the third section of the bill, which I regard as the best feature in it, the only feature that relates to currency and advances the value of the currency, is important, for it will raise the value of the greenback up to the standard of gold.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I wish to know if the provision in the first section which has just been amended will not counteract the influence of which the Senator speaks. All the money that comes from the sale of these new bonds is to go into the Treasury of the United States; and it is to be used, how? Exclusively for the redemption, payment, purchase, or exchange of the old bonds. If you are to buy the old bonds in greenbacks, that process is constantly throwing down the value of your greenbacks quite as rapidly as they will be elevated by the third section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I may represent the idea better by the illustration of a yard-stick or gold. A yard-stick represents the par; or gold represents the par of all the money on the earth. That is worth one hundred cents on the dollar. Our bonds of 1881 are worth eighty-two cents on the dollar. The five-twenties are worth seventy-eight cents in the markets of the world in gold. The five per cent. bonds are worth seventy-two. The greenback is worth seventy cents. What is the first duty of the people of the United States? Here is the greenback which is the promise of the United States to pay so many dollars in money. It is worth but seventy cents. Is it not the duty of the United States to lift the value of that greenback up nearer to the standard, first of bonds, and finally of gold? The operation of this section will be undoubtedly to raise the value of the greenback nearer to that of the bond, and then both the bonds and the greenback will gradually, as the credit of the country is restored, advance to the par of gold.

There are two ways of restoring specie payments. One is by contracting the currency until it becomes so valuable as to be equal to gold. That can only be done through distress and ruin, through a disturbance of the prices of all commodities and of all contracts in this country. The other way is by the gradual process pointed out by this bill, by raising the value of your greenback nearer to the value of bonds, and then of gold.

The principal objection that has been made to the third section is that it provides for what is called the oscillating process. It is said that if, by the rapid contraction of currency under the operation of this law, from other causes or from any panic or unforeseen events, money will become more valuable than bonds, it provides that the money may be supplied by a voluntary exchange of the new bonds for currency. Thus those bonds and the greenbacks will be convertible one into the other, and both will advance to the standard of gold. I have no doubt that that process, simply in itself, will do more to restore our credit than any other feature of this bill or of any bill that has been proposed.

I do not wish, under the terrible heat that is prevailing in the Senate Chamber, to discuss this matter further. I simply throw out these ideas as most palpable, and leave the matter to the Senate to judge.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I cannot possibly take the view which the honorable Senator from Ohio does of this third section, and especially in the existing condition of the law on the subject. The Senator says he wants to bring the greenback up to the par of the bond. Now, I wish to bring the bond, and the greenback too, up to the par of gold. He stops short of that. He wishes to place the bond and the greenback on a level, but he does not design to place them all on a level with gold, which is the object we wish to accomplish by the resumption of specie payments.

I do not agree with him, either, that the process of reduction is to bring about distress. That depends entirely upon how rapid or how gradual it is. I have stated here before that I am not in favor of doing the thing suddenly, but I am in favor of moving toward that object gradually and surely so as not to produce distress, but so as by degrees to get this currency out of the market. There is one way in which you can relieve the poor man that my friend talks about, and that is to take out of the market this depreciated currency not redeemed, and I wish that our legislation should point in that direction, so that we may have only one currency, and that a sound one, and that all our paper, whether it is in the shape of bonds or in the shape of greenbacks, may be brought to a par with gold.

The Senator has not answered the question of my friend from New Hampshire. My friend asked this question: the six per cent. bond now in the market is above par some four or five per cent.; this bill is predicated upon the idea that the new five per cent. bonds running for a longer time will be exchanged for them dollar for dollar; then they will be above par necessarily.

Mr. SHERMAN. Above par in what?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Above the nominal par.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is paper.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly. I am speaking now of the comparison merely. I am not on the other point. They are nominally above par in paper. My friend says they will be exchanged for these new bonds. Very well; if a six per cent. bond is to-day worth 105, and the five per cent. bond will be exchanged for it, then that five per cent. bond will be worth 105 in the estimate of those who make the exchange.

Mr. CATTELL. And so will $100 in greenbacks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; because they are not up to that. But what do we do in that case? We take $100 in greenbacks for a bond which is worth $105, and which is only worth $105 because we agree to take it for that. Therefore, whatever our five per cent. bond may be worth in the market, under the operation of the bill, we have got to take $100 in greenbacks for it; that is to say, we have got to take that which is nominally $100 for that which is really $105.

Mr. CATTELL. The Senator from Maine objects, then, to increasing the value of greenbacks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I do not object to that, but this provision simply increases their value so far as they are used in exchange for the bonds. Non constat, to use a legal phrase, that they will buy more in the market, that they will buy more beef or more pork or more flour or anything else in the way of commodities than they buy to-day; but they will buy our bonds which are nominally 105, because by the law we say we will take them for them. You do not raise the value of the greenback for any purpose in the world except to buy the bond with it; and you will buy the bond with it because the law says it shall be taken for that purpose. That may be right enough; but the answer of my friend's question is in fact precisely what I say it is; you oblige yourself to take $100 in greenbacks in exchange for a bond which you can sell to anybody else in the market for $105 in greenbacks. You raise the greenback in that way, to be sure nominally. I do not know but that it is right; I am not objecting specially to it. The ground of my objection to the whole system is that as long as the law stands as it does now you are providing in this third section for an indefinite emission of bonds. Why? Because you must keep out the greenbacks; you say by your law that the quantity of greenbacks shall not be reduced below $356,000,000, where it stands now.

Mr. SHERMAN. That they shall not be canceled.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; that they shall not be canceled beyond that amount. So long as you do not cancel them they are subject to the uses of the Treasury. What is the consequence? A bond is brought in, is sold for greenbacks, one of these bonds if you please; that money goes into the Treasury, and it is paid out by the Treasury; it is there, and will be used. It goes out into the community. You must take it in exchange for your bonds, and thus you are constantly increasing your funded debt, running it over and over, and for no purpose whatever that I can see, and you are indefinitely extending the greenback system.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose $100,000,000 of greenbacks should come in and be funded into bonds, does the Senator suppose they would come in indefinitely until we got out several hundred thousand millions of bonds?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how far you would get it to. The only limit is as to the $400,000,000 of greenbacks; but as to the bonds you may go to any extent.

Mr. SHERMAN. The greenbacks cannot be paid out unless the people bring these very bonds to exchange for them. According to the Senator's argument they would never do it because the bonds are worth 105.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say, if they do bring them back that will be the consequence.

Mr. CATTELL. Then we get the greenbacks out of the way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But you do not get them out of the way; you are using them all the time.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not cancel them?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because a law passed at this session prohibits their cancellation.

Mr. HOWARD. Down to a certain minimum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Three hundred and fifty-six or three hundred and sixty millions. They are canceled down to that already. That is to say, that is about all there are out. You do not go beyond that; and I cannot see—unless my friend can explain to me, and if he will I shall be very much obliged to him—as long as you cannot cancel these notes, and are not permitted to cancel them, what is to prevent the purchase of bonds over and over by an exchange of greenbacks just as long as they are in the market. The Senator says the bonds will be brought back again and the greenbacks paid out for them; but the greenbacks are paid out for something else; they are paid out for the ordinary expenses of the Treasury. My friend from New Jersey shakes his head. What is to prevent this operation? Will he tell me now?

Mr. CATTELL. I will answer the question. The greenbacks exchanged for these bonds are not part of the current money of the Treasury to be paid out again, but they are to be held in reserve to pay these bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where does my friend find any such thing?

Mr. CATTELL. In the very nature of the bill itself. This money must be held, because the holder of the bond has the right to bring it and exchange it.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the law forbids the cancellation of the greenbacks, so that there must be $356,000,000 either in circulation among the people or in the Treasury to answer every call.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But my friend from New Jersey says it all will be in the Treasury, and must be kept there.

Mr. CATTELL. All that will be funded. That is the very point I make. Surely by the provisions of this bill the Treasury cannot use this money in meeting the current expenses when they come under obligation to return it again when these bonds are presented for payment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend is mistaken. They can use and they will use it, and must use it; and when the bonds are presented they must find enough greenbacks to take them up. There is nothing in this bill which provides for that contingency. My friend says that will be the necessary operation. I differ with him entirely. It may not be the necessary operation, because there is no provision in the bill which compels the Secretary of the Treasury to keep these greenbacks there. If you change the law and let them be canceled, very well; but suppose you do not change the law and it is as my friend says, what is the effect? Then you are contravening the provisions of that very law, because you are reducing the greenbacks—I want to accomplish that—far below the amount which you yourselves have fixed, because if you must keep them in the Treasury, it is all the same as if they were canceled; in fact, for the purposes of circulation in the country, they are so.

Mr. CATTELL. They will come out again if currency is wanting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But suppose the currency is not wanting?

Mr. CATTELL. Then they ought to be there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If my friend concedes that, that is so much; but I apprehend that would not be the operation. It strikes me that it is a contrivance with reference to that matter, and it amounts to nothing more than that. It is making the Government a banker to a certain extent. When a man has money that he does not know what to do with he buys a bond with it, and the Government says, "We will keep your money for you, and let you have a bond bearing five per cent. interest, and when you want it again come and take it;" that is to say, the Government is paying everybody who has a surplus of greenbacks five per cent. interest for the privilege of taking care of his money until he wants it; and five per cent. gold interest, too; seven per cent. in paper. That is all there is of it that I can perceive. I do not believe in the section nor in the contrivance. I do not believe it will have the effect gentlemen think, and I am opposed to the whole of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to reply very briefly to the honorable Senator from Maine. The Senator would seem to infer that this process of funding the debt was something very novel. I desire to state that this very provision is in the law of February 25, 1862, which was reported by the honorable Senator from Maine, and without this provision the legal-tender clause, in my judgment, would never have passed Congress. The reason was this: the Government of the United States was unable to pay its notes in gold. What was the next best thing? It said, "We will issue $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes; we are not able to pay them in gold, but we will do the next best thing."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if there is any provision in that law that a man holding a bond may at any time bring it back and receive pay in greenbacks?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One part of the provision was in that bill I know, but the other part of it was not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me. I will answer him before I get through. The very principle, almost in hæc verba the words of this bill, was contained in the act reported by himself, of February 25, 1862; and without the provision the legal-tender clause never could have passed. If the Senator will look back at the argument that he and I both used at that time he will find that this clause was commented upon as one of great importance. Why? "We are not able to pay off in gold our notes; we must coin our credit; we must issue $150,000,000 of legal-tender notes; we must compel everybody to take them; but as we cannot pay in gold we will give them something as good as gold; we will do the next best thing; we will give them our bond;" and, according to the language of this law, it was provided:

And any holders of said United States notes depositing any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple of fifty dollars, with the Treasurer of the United States, or either of the Assistant Treasurers, shall receive in exchange thereof duplicate certificates of deposit, one of which may be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of bonds of the United States.

That is, the five-twenty bonds. It so happened as the war progressed that it was necessary for us to depreciate the value of the United States notes in order to induce them to flow more rapidly into the Treasury. What did we do? It was then our policy during the war to depreciate the value of these notes, so that they would come into the Treasury more freely for our bonds. Why, sir, we did a very natural thing for us to do, we increased the amount to $300,000,000, then to $450,000,000, and we took away this important privilege of converting them into bonds on the ground that while this privilege remained the people would not subscribe for bonds, and the notes would not be converted; that the right a man might exercise at any moment he would not exercise at all; and on this ground that this clause prevented the conversion of the United States notes, we repealed it by the act of March, 1863.

Now, what was the duty of the United States; as soon as the war was over, when we no longer had occasion to borrow money? It was to restore to these notes their former value. Every privilege that was given to them under former laws ought to have been promptly restored, unless we made them up to par of gold by retiring them from currency. That we could have done if we chose to embarrass our people then engaged in business. If we could not do that, we ought at least to give the holders of these notes our bond bearing interest. Why not? I ask any Senator—and my friend from Maine will find it very difficult to answer this question—why should not a man who holds these notes in his hands, which he is compelled by your laws to take, have the right to convert them into a bond? Why should they be less valuable than the bond? Why should he be compelled to sell at a discount in order to get a bond? Sir, it is wrong in principle, and from the very beginning of peace we ought to have restored this right to convert the legal-tender note into a bond, and the failure to do it, it seems to me, has postponed specie payments.

But we repealed this provision during the war in order to take away this privilege, on the very ground that the man who had this privilege all the time would not exercise it. There was no substantial difficulty in regard to the right to convert these notes into bonds. That was so plain and palpable a provision that the Committee on Finance had not much trouble about it; but here was the difficulty: it was feared that if this right to convert alone was given the result would be that in times of great expansion, when everything was free and money was plenty, this money would flow into bonds rapidly, and then by a sudden contraction in the money market, there would not be sufficient currency to carry on the operations of the Government. There would be no flexibility in the movement. During specie payments, when bank notes are thrown out freely at one time, and come back freely at others, that furnishes a flexible currency; a convertible currency.

It was feared by many Senators, members of the Committee on Finance and others, that if you made this rule only work one way; that is, if you authorized the floating currency to go into bonds, the time might come of contraction, when it would become necessary, until specie payments were resumed, when the banks could perform their functions, to furnish something in the nature of an oscillating movement; that is, when your bonds, by a sudden contraction of the currency, fall below par, currency was needed to carry on the operations of the Government, it was felt to be right that, until we were able to redeem these notes at par in gold, we should give to the holders of the bonds, which were another form of our credit, the right to present them at the Treasury of the United States for the notes, and thus furnish the means by which a flexibility would be given to the operations of the currency.

In the first place there was a good deal of doubt as to the limit. Some preferred, like my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] that there should be no limit in this oscillating movement; that is, that the $400,000,000 of greenbacks should not be the fixed limit; but when we looked at the law we found that the United States had agreed never to issue more than $400,000,000. Therefore we thought the $400,000,000 should be the necessary limit. On the other hand, my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] thought that it ought in no event to go beyond the present amount, because we had gradually got down to the present amount, and we ought not to provide that by any possibility there should be an increase of this amount.

I do not suppose myself that the operations of this law would ever call out of the Treasury a greater amount than the present circulation in the country; but I believe the effect of this provision, simple in itself, would be, first, to reduce all that margin between bonds and paper, and gradually to bring them to the standard of gold, and that this right to present a bond to the Treasury of the United States for greenbacks is a right that will probably never be exercised to any considerable extent.

My own conviction is, and that is the conviction of a great many men who have given their attention to the subject, that the fluctuation in this amount of currency will never exceed twenty or thirty millions. Undoubtedly, now, these greenbacks being over abundant in the market would flow into these bonds; but probably ten or twenty millions would supply the whole current. I have no doubt that the mere passage of this law would restore to our greenbacks the value that bonds now have, and probably would raise both nearer to the standard of gold; but if twenty or thirty or even fifty millions should flow into the Treasury and bonds should be issued, what harm is that? It is simply paying our debt, paying the United States notes in the best thing we have to pay, that is, our bonds, nothing more. We ought to do that.

But the Senator from Maine says the law compels the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out the greenbacks thus received. Not at all. This money must be kept, or sufficient of it at least kept, for the purpose of meeting the countervailing provision of this bill. Whatever is necessary to pay the ordinary course of operations of the Treasury would be paid out. The currency would be diminished to the extent that a superabundant currency was pervading in the money markets of this country. Probably ten, twenty, or thirty millions would flow into the Treasury in that way, and these bonds would be negotiated without cost by the voluntary actions of the people. Then if there should be a change in the money market, which occurs at least two or three times every year, and generally every seven or ten years, a powerful contraction occurs, the other provision of the law would take effect, and immediate relief would be given by presenting these bonds for currency. Either operation would be beneficial to the Government. In the first case we redeem our notes which are due by giving our bonds at par, and thus make a voluntary exchange—the very thing the Senator seems to desire—of our bonds for our notes; and in the other case, the case of contraction, all we do is to issue our notes for bonds bearing five per cent. interest in gold.

Mr. President, we are bound, in my judgment, to make this provision for the noteholder of the country, and without this it will be impossible for any man to answer either to the laborer or to the banker the palpable fact that now stands in the financial eye that this note of ours, which we promise to pay on demand, we do not try to pay and refuse to take in payment of our own bonds. Suppose I was a business man in the world and had my bank notes out payable on demand, and I should refuse to give my promissory note for them; would I not be dishonored? Now, sir, all that this bill does is to provide that the United States shall, when any man presents $1,000 of these notes, either pay them in specie or give its time-note bearing five per cent. interest, and with the privilege also, if for that bond he should desire to get back these identical notes, of doing so.

This section would be complete without the last clause; that is, it would be complete in one sense; but it is better, in my judgment, to leave it as it is, so that this provision may meet the sudden contractions in the currency of the country, and may yet provide to raise the value of the greenback nearer the standard of gold. It will not have the operation the Senator from Maine fears. No considerable amount will flow into the Treasury under the operations of this bill, because the very fact that it flows into the Treasury will tend to raise the value of all that is left outstanding, and bring it nearer to the standard of bonds, to remove the discrimination which my honorable friend from New Hampshire pointed out; and under this bill there never can be any difference in value between the bond and the note, nor ought there to be. That disgraceful fact in our financial history will be removed, and we shall be standing in the position at least of a debtor who, not having gold to pay, is willing to give his time note, amply secured by the national credit, in payment of his demand note.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Notwithstanding the great heat I seem, from the few remarks I have made, to have increased the strength of my friend from Ohio very much. His strength was exhausted a short time ago, but he has now manifested that his strength has not all gone, at any rate.

I do not pay much attention to the guess of any gentleman, however wise he may be, in regard to what will be the effect, of how many millions will come in and how many millions will go out. We cannot tell much about that until we see the practical operation. But, sir, with regard to this matter the Senator is mistaken in his recollection. The law was not changed because people would not convert fast enough. That was not the trouble. We put that clause into the bill originally that the United States notes might command a bond at the same rates, for this reason: we were of necessity at that time borrowers of money; we wanted to sell our bonds with rapidity; we wanted to get out as many of them as we could; and for that reason we made it easy and advantageous to make the exchange. But what was found to be the case? It was found by your Secretary of the Treasury that the bonds never would rise above nominal par. Why? Because there was no competition. Anybody who could get a sufficient quantity of greenbacks could command them at par. For $100 in greenbacks he could have a bond of $100. Consequently, as that could be commanded at any time by anybody who could raise the notes of course the bonds in the market would stay at par, and for that reason the Secretary of the Treasury was very anxious to get rid of the obligation; and we did it by a lucky thought of one of the Senators from Vermont [Mr. Collamer] at that time. The great difficulty was in the way of the contract in the law; but we shuffled out of that by giving notice that we would not do it after a certain time, and they must bring their greenbacks in; and as they were not in at that time, or whether they were or not, after that time the greenbacks were put out as usual, and they could not command the bonds. That was a necessity of the time.

But allow me to say to my honorable friend that the case of a man who is anxious to sell bonds because he wants money is very different from that of a man who has the money and does not wish to sell bonds. At this time we do not want to sell our bonds; we do not want to increase our funded debt; we want to keep it where it is if we cannot diminish it. The logic does not apply in any one sense of the word. We are in an entirely different condition; and therefore he does not meet the objection I raise with regard to the possible effect—I might say probable effect—of the operation of this clause.

He talks again about the necessity of raising the character of our greenbacks for the benefit of the poor man. Now, sir, how does this operate? Look at it for a moment. Will the day laborer be able to buy any bonds, as a general rule? Will it be for his benefit? In order to show that it is for his benefit you have got to show that after you have passed this the greenback will buy more in the market, that it will command a greater amount of the necessities of life, not that it will buy a bond.

Mr. CATTELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CATTELL. If the bond is worth 105 and can be bought for $100 in greenbacks, the greenbacks are worth $105, and will they not buy $105 worth of either meat or bread or flour?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I say it does not follow.

Mr. CATTELL. I differ with the gentleman entirely.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It might appreciate them a little, but probably very little. Who would command these greenbacks? The capitalist. He is the man who would buy the bonds. The laborer would not be able to buy them. The man who gets three or four dollars a day would not be able to buy them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The greenbacks would be all the scarcer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They would be nearer worst specie then.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They might appreciate somewhat, and I presume they would; but the idea that they would ever be in the hands of the laborers, who get these small quantities of them, is, in my judgment, an entire misapprehension. But suppose money to be plentiful; they would be gathered up in that case—and the more plentiful greenbacks are in the market the less they will buy—by the man who is able to take them in quantities to the amount of $1,000, if you please, and he while money is plenty transforms them into a bond which is worth 105. That is for his benefit. The rule works (and the more facilities you afford in this way by these contrivances, the more it works so invariably,) for the benefit of the capitalist and against the man who is not a capitalist and who is a day laborer, the man you are talking about. Then the person who has the funds gathers the funds and makes his speculation upon the bonds.

But suppose it changes and money becomes scarce and he wants it: the man who has plenty of bonds already, the capitalist, does not need your greenbacks, but it is the people who are doing business. He will change his bond back again, but will he do it without a consideration? Will he do it unless he finds he can make money after he has done it, by lending out the funds he gets? What else is it but giving him another and additional premium for the use of the very money with which he bought up the bond originally? That will be, in my judgment, or very likely to be the operation of the whole contrivance. The truth of the matter is, it will have only one effect that I can perceive, and that is indefinitely to put off specie payments, to get out the whole amount of $400,000,000 of greenbacks and keep them out, because there will be no inducement in the community then to put them in; and it is only an escape from what, if you would pursue any regular system, you could accomplish in a very short time; and that is, to bring us back to a regular, stable currency that does not fluctuate from day to day. You cannot reach it by any of these contrivances in my judgment, and instead of reaching it by this, you are only deferring it to an indefinite period, and those who wish to accomplish that end of course will support it.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a phrase that has been much used in this discussion which impresses my mind at this moment. The Senator from Ohio has spoken of the "oscillation" of these bonds. Let me confess that on this identical question before us I have had an oscillation of my own. When I first read this section and undertook to study it, as I did most carefully and conscientiously, I inclined against it; I inclined to the course of reasoning which the Senator from Maine has so ably presented to-night, as he always presents his views. But the more I have meditated, the more I have studied it, the more I have been able to communicate with those elsewhere to whose judgment I sometimes defer on questions of this kind, the more I have been inclined to conclude in favor of it.

And now let me state the process by which I have been brought to my conclusion. In the first place, as I studied it, I saw that this section was, as the Senator from Ohio has told us to-night, little more than a reproduction of a clause in the original bill which at the same time created the greenback, and also created the five-twenty loan; for the greenback and the five-twenty loan were born out of the same womb. You will find them defined and described and taking their financial life out of the same act of Congress. If you will refer to that you will find, as the Senator from Ohio told us to-night, that this very provision appears there substantially. It was there provided that the greenback might be turned at once on presentation into the five-twenty bond. Now, that is what is proposed to do at this moment. It was when I saw that in the original statute that I was led, in the first place, to think more favorably of this proposition.

As I undertook to analyze its character I saw in it, as it seemed to me, an agency toward specie payments. I call it an agency. The Senator from Maine has made an ingenious argument to show that it might act in another way. I do not think so. I think the action of this provision would be toward specie payments; and I will tell you how I was brought to that conclusion. By looking at any newspaper you will see what the market value of the greenback is, and the market value of the bond. At this moment the greenback stands at 71; the bond stands at seventy-six or seventy-seven.

Mr. SHERMAN. Seventy-eight.

Mr. SUMNER. Seventy-eight; so much the better. Now, there is the difference between them. Just so sure as the bond stands at seventy-six, seventy-seven, or seventy-eight, and the greenback stands at seventy-one, as a mere matter of business, there will be an irresistible tendency of the greenback into the bond. What is the consequence of that? The greenback will be in demand; the greenback will be raised in value; it will be lifted; it will be nearly as good as gold. There will be a demand for these bonds in Europe. What better operation could a great financial house in New York—I will not mention any name, but Senators may supply the name—do than, when greenbacks are at seventy-one and bonds in Europe, for instance, are at seventy-six or seventy-seven under this very provision, to turn their greenbacks into bonds, send them to Europe, and by the return mail get their cash; and they will make an operation which, in a business point of view, is better than cotton or corn or any other subject-matter of business would enable them to make, so it seems to me. What will be the irresistible tendency then? The bond will be raised in the market and the greenback will be raised in the market. Both will be raised, and both will be brought nearer than they now are to an equality with gold. I believe that is what we are all desiring.

That brings me to the question which the Senator from Maine has just touched upon, as to whether this proceeding should have in it anything of stringency. Clearly not if it can possibly be prevented. It ought to be so conducted, to have in it such elements of moderation, of caution, of precaution, as will, if possible, prevent all stringency. The money market should not be tightened beyond what might necessarily grow out of the exigency of the case; but, nevertheless, the business should proceed, and as it proceeds the necessary and the inevitable consequence of it, as it strikes my mind, must be, in the first place, to elevate the greenback, and then almost at the same time, or immediately after, to elevate the bonds, and, of course, to bring them both on a par with gold.

I am at a loss to see any one specific measure which can possibly bring us by a shorter cut to that conclusion than this very provision; and when I say that in my inquiries and studies I have been brought to this conclusion, I say again that I have been brought to it against my first judgment; that I have gone through the processes, in my humble way, of course, of reasoning that the Senator from Maine has presented to-night. I have gone through them, and I have been obliged to abandon them. It seemed to me that they could not be sustained, and that if we adopted them, if we founded our conduct upon them, we should interpose an impediment to specie payments. I want specie payments. I do want that instrumentality of peace in this country. I wish to have the anarchical condition of our finances brought to an end. I want that repose which we are now seeking to establish in our politics transferred also to our finances. I believe that this whole bill is a very important measure in that direction; and among the agencies of this bill I do not put as the least this very third section.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I move to strike out the third section, and I beg to assign briefly my reasons for making the motion.

To enable myself to comprehend the bearings of this section I begin by considering the bargain we are about to make. I understand that, in substance, to be this: having determined for ourselves that an opportune time to refund has arrived, we propose to put it into obligations binding us for at least twenty years to pay interest amounting now, as far as we can see, to about ten per cent. If any Senator thinks I overstate this, I beg him to notice the way in which it computes itself. A bond, not redeemable until after twenty years, is to be issued bearing five per cent. interest in coin. With gold at 140, the interest is precisely seven per cent. Taking taxes as they are in the State from which I come, three per cent is to be added for the immunity, unknown up to this time in our Federal obligations, which is to be conferred upon these bonds. I have been looking at some of the previous loan laws, and none of them affect to exempt Government securities from anything but State taxes. Here is a provision peculiar in itself, peculiar in its effect, and I am afraid destined to be somewhat more peculiar in the manner it will strike the common eye:

Which said bonds shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes.

I say, then, including this unprecedented immunity, we so far favor the obligations which we are to issue that, to begin with, as I understand it, they bear an interest, with the equivalents of interest, amounting to not less than ten per cent.

Now, sir, by this section, which does not strike me as being an oscillating section, but which is rather a provision for an automatic currency, a self-adjusting volume of currency, first of all, it seems to me, (and I submit with great deference to the Senator from Maine that that is the way to put it, rather than to accept the idea that it is to elevate the greenback in the market,) we reduce these favorite securities which we are to issue to par, to par in paper. I understood the honorable Senator from Maine to accept, for argument or illustration's sake, the idea that we were to appreciate greenbacks by this, and that the greenbacks were to become worth 105. Not at all. I submit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not accept it. I said I supposed they would appreciate somewhat; but I did not believe for practical purposes they would appreciate except for the purpose of buying bonds.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware that the Senator made that qualification; but I mean for the purpose of buying bonds, and I submit to him and I ask him to consider whether it is not true that greenbacks are not to be appreciated at all even for the purpose of buying bonds? Why? For the reason which the Senator so clearly stated, which led to the repeal of the provision, so unlike this, in the law of 1862, to which this has been likened. There was a provision that a man having greenbacks in requisite quantity might take them to the fiscal agent of the Government, and in lieu of them receive a bond, and there it stopped. What was the reason, borrowing the expression of the honorable Senator from Maine, that the Government eventually "shuffled out" of this provision? Because, as the Senator said, and as is perfectly obvious, we thereby established a standard for the bonds, above which they could not go, and which irrevocably fixed their value at par, par in paper. Why? Because a bit of paper stamped by the Government with "$100" bought a bond for $100; did it not? And, therefore, just as much as a bank note formerly, anterior to the suspension of 1857, redeemable in coin, and exchangeable for a gold dollar, it being itself of the denomination of a dollar, was of equivalent value for all commercial purposes, so I submit it to be $100 of greenbacks and the bond which the fiscal agent of the Government is compelled to deliver for the identical amount upon receipt of this $100.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that my friend is right; I am inclined to think he is; but I ask him if this consequence would follow: if the effect of this provision that any man for $100 in greenbacks may get a hundred-dollar bond at the Treasury at any time, bearing five per cent. interest, is to keep it at par nominally as it did before and might now, then does it not unavoidably follow that this exchange which gentlemen are talking about as about to take place of a six per cent. bond, which is worth more than par, never will be made, and therefore the bill will be inoperative?

Mr. CONKLING. That very likely follows. But to pursue for one moment this point, I ask gentlemen to consider whether by these two provisions together we are not launching a bond which, for the present, is as good as a ten per cent. security where taxes are as high as they are in the State of New York, and yet fixing upon it a brand, so to speak, amounting to a prohibition against its ever rising above par in paper. It seems to me we are.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts finds in this operation a parallel with that provision to which I have referred, contained in the act of 1862, which I have before me. What was the philosophy of that act? We put out legal-tender notes, destined—as a conspicuous candidate for the Presidency then in the House of Representatives and a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, was fond of saying—to be wanderers and fugitives on the face of the earth, with a brand like Cain upon their brow, and so on. Those who took part in issuing the first $150,000,000 in greenbacks—

"Back recoiled, they know not why, E'en at the sound themselves had made."

We remembered continental money; we remembered the assignat of France; and we wondered what was to become of these legal-tender notes; and as one of the modes of appreciating and commending them, after we had stated in speeches and reports that $16,000,000,000 was the assessed valuation of the property which the securities of the United States mortgaged, we provided that mortgages upon this magnificent basis of taxation should be exchangeable for these greenbacks; and there we stopped. But did anybody ever dream of providing that the operation should be not to receive absolutely the greenbacks, to use them for their paying and circulating property afterward, but, as the Senator from New Jersey now zealously insists this bill intends, for the purpose of holding them idly as money borrowed upon call? Why, sir, what sort of a concomitant would that have been of the policy inaugurated by the act of 1862? Everybody will see that it would have defeated and refuted the whole theory upon which it went; and so I submit does this provision here, for the additional reasons which I shall endeavor to assign.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey insists as a part of the case that this money is to lie idle. How much money? As much as we can become possessed of under a limit of $400,000,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then consider the bargain we are to make, paying five per cent.

Mr. CONKLING. I am coming to that in one moment. Not paying five per cent—I beg to protest against that sotto voce admission of the Senator. It is more than five per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In coin?

Mr. CONKLING. Five per cent. in coin, with this extraordinary exemption which ties us up for twenty years at least, to the bargain that these bonds shall go unburdened, untaxed with tribute of any kind whatever, either by State or national authority. I was just coming, as the Senator from Maine admonishes me to come, to the consideration of the bargain that we are to make. We take these promises to pay of our own, not absolutely as in 1862, not above all things for bonds which we are anxious to put out; but we are to create afresh an addition to our funded debt for the purpose of paying it out in exchange for this money. Why? Not to use it as money is used, not to turn around with it and extinguish so much of the five-twenty interest-bearing bonds, not to buy so much of commodity or defray so much of current expenses, but to have it lie idly by in the coffers of the realm, to be called for at any moment as a call loan. Did anybody ever hear of an arrangement like that, of banker, of Government, of broker, of pawnbroker, or any sort of person engaged in traffic, paying ten per cent., or seven per cent., or five per cent., or one per cent., for money on call, which was not even to be so much available that he could contribute it as a balance to put anywhere to his credit with a view to enhance it, or seeming to enhance it? That is this proposition.

But again, Mr. President, when are we to receive this money? Whenever money is comparatively useless and worthless, then we are to receive it. So that the Government is to stand as a trustee, as a backer for this purpose in all times of need to speculators who are unwilling to invest their money permanently even in Government securities, rich as that investment is, but who wish to keep it all the time, using a vulgar phrase, where "now you see it and now you don't," where it can earn something all the time, be it for a month or a week that they do not want it while they are lurking for speculative opportunities, and instantly when they find them they are permitted to call for it and the Treasury must respond. Is that a wise thing, looking—

Mr. SHERMAN. Do I interrupt my friend by interposing?

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from New York whether in this the Government of the United States is in any respect different from an ordinary banker. A banker has $100,000 outstanding of his notes. To all the world that is money; but to the banker it is a debt. Now, the United States have $360,000,000 outstanding. To all the world that is money; to us it is a debt that we are bound to pay. Ought we to refuse to pay that at any time, either by payment in gold, the money of the world, or by giving our note? Is not every banker under the same burden of liability which the Senator describes now? Every banker is bound to pay his notes when presented, and every broker outside, and every speculator, and every sharper watches when that money is worth the most and presents it to the banker for payment. Can he then refuse to pay it merely because more possibly is made out of it than at any other time? Is not that the condition of our Government? Our notes are out. They are our debts. They are not money to us, but debts. Are we not bound to pay them whenever they are presented, and whenever payment is demanded by the creditor? Is not he the judge of the time he wants it; and ought we not, if we cannot pay the money, that which we are giving to the bondholder, exchange it for other bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is one side; now look at the other.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me answer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not trench upon the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all. I am very much obliged to the honorable Senator from Ohio for putting that question, because it enables me to state two propositions, each of which I believe to be precisely in answer to his.

In the first place, his question whether we ought not in ethics and in commercial honor, to redeem these promises to pay, goes back to the old question of the legal-tender act; it goes back to the old question of an enforced loan; of an individual assuming the right, if you could suppose the prerogative to rest in an individual, of issuing his checks bearing no interest and compelling his creditors to receive them at par. That is all there is to that; and I submit, stopping there for a moment, to the honorable Senator, that no consideration of ethics or of casuistry rests upon us at this moment with one feather of weight in addition to that which the same consideration had two years or four years ago. When the time shall come that we can resume specie payments, that we can atone in the commercial atonement of the world to all of these creditors, undoubtedly we shall be bound to do it, and undoubtedly within every principle we shall be in guilty default if we do not do it. I do not see why that does not answer entirely one branch of the suggestion which the Senator makes.

But I want more especially to come to the other. He asks me whether this is not precisely what every banker does? No, sir; no banker who is permitted to hold up his head in any commercial community stoops so low as we propose shall stoop the Treasury of the United States. Why? I ask the honorable Senator from Ohio whether he was ever upon terms so confidential with any bank that he would be tolerated for one moment, in a stringent money market, in going to that bank and borrowing money for seven per cent., or the ordinary per cent., in order that he might turn around and speculate upon the vicissitudes of his neighbors, making them pay him for it a much larger per cent. Every man knows a bank would not tolerate that. What would the honorable Senator from New Jersey think of me, if I were his most esteemed friend, and I should resort to his bank in times of commercial panic and stringency to borrow money by reason of my access there, in order that I might turn around and lend it to men who would pay me more for it than the interest I paid him? Is not that what the Treasury is to do? The honorable Senator shakes his head. I beg him to hear me a moment upon that. I say that the money in this automatic arrangement will transmute itself into bonds when money is worthless and useless, comparatively. I say it will be resumed whenever it can be used for speculative purposes at a far greater profit; and when I have said that, I have affirmed, in other words, that the capitalists who have it there upon call, drawing it as they will, will turn around in every period of panic and lend it to men and venture it in operations by which there will be brought back to them an interest greater than that they realize by lending it upon call. Is there anything plainer than that? "Where a man's treasure is, there is his heart also;" and where the mode of speculating upon this money is, there will be the attention, and in that direction the action of those with whom we are about to treat.

Is there any bank that would tolerate that? Is there any bank, I ask again, that will discount for stockholders, directors, officers, confidential men of any kind, in order that suiting the action to the time and the opportunity, they may get money, not for their own business, but to turn around and lend it to other persons? Why, sir, it strikes me that one of the conspicuous things in which this provision is odious is that the Government becomes the accomplice of usurers. That is what no respectable bank means to do.

Now, Mr. President, there is one other item that I omitted, speaking of what is paid for this, and a very important item too. This five per cent. in coin is to be paid semi-annually. I do not stop to dwell upon it, but I ought to have included it in stating the value of these bonds.

What else does this section do? The honorable Senator from Massachusetts finds in it a look toward the resumption of specie payments in the third section; so he says. I have looked at it very closely; I have read the letters and the comments of those whose eyes are far sharper and better than mine; and I have been entirely unable to discover anything like that. I can discover an inflation of the currency to the amount of forty-five or fifty or fifty-five millions; and I doubt very much whether my honorable friend from New Jersey, so candid always, and so well instructed on this subject, will say that I am wrong when I affirm that the effect of that section is to inflate the currency forty-five or fifty millions. Why do I say that? Men carrying greenbacks to the Treasury receive bonds, and carrying bonds to the Treasury they receive greenbacks, and they continue to receive them until they have received $400,000,000. Is not that so?

Mr. CATTELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my honorable friend tell me how many greenbacks are afloat now?

Mr. CATTELL. Three hundred and fifty-six million dollars.

Mr. CONKLING. Three hundred and fifty-six million dollars: so that there is a provision specific for an inflation of $44,000,000, to be adopted by the champions of hard money and sound prices! It seems to me that is very extraordinary. If there is any need of an automatic currency—and, by the by, I ought to apologize for the use of that word—this scheme was conceived, as I understand it, some time ago, two years ago, I think, at least, in the State of Massachusetts, by a man who put out a pamphlet, and several Massachusetts people who spoke to me about it were fond of calling it an automatic currency, and I wish to give credit for that word lest it may be supposed I was capable of inventing it myself, which I was not; if there is any need, I say, of this automatic currency, it presupposes that shift from side to side in the market which will render it desirable or convenient to take back the greenbacks for the bonds. That you must presuppose in order to suppose that the scheme is to have any substantial working; and when you do suppose that, then you at once embrace not only the possibility, but the incident actually to occur, of an increase of the currency to the amount of $44,000,000.

Again, Mr. President, let us look at the morals of this in another direction. The whole country is astir upon the question of taxing Government securities; and the cause of that stir and the reason of it perhaps all gentlemen do not appreciate. I can mention a township within my knowledge in which nearly all the men of substance and means upon whom the bulk of taxation used to rest, have exempted themselves entirely by the purchase of Government securities. What sort of a provision is this in reference to eluding taxes? To-day a man holds Government bonds for the bulk of his property, and to-morrow the assessor calls upon him, and he explains his position and makes his affidavit; and day after to-morrow he goes to the Treasury and takes back his money, for which he deposits a bond, and then he does not hold any Government securities at all; and yet in the meantime he has not been taxed. Is that a wholesome provision? In the State of the honorable Senator from Ohio, I know from one of his colleagues at whose suggestion I myself reported a bill from the Ways and Means Committee in the House, that the exemption, or supposed exemption, of national bank bills has led to an abuse of this sort upon a very large scale.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if a man cannot do that under the law as it stands?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire how?

Mr. SHERMAN. Cannot he take his money on the 1st of April, convert it into bonds at the market price, and the next day after he has made his return sell his bonds without any loss or trouble? This does not change the case at all?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, that is ingenious in the Senator; but he knows the answer to it a great deal better than I, though I think I know the answer well enough to explain it.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the answer?

Mr. CONKLING. The answer to it is this:

the man who chooses to take all the chances of the market can do what the Senator says; and if it so happens that at the time it is fortunate to buy Government securities and make on them, he is able to do it; if it happens to be the other way he cannot do it. That is the answer to it. There are other answers to it, but that is sufficient. He does it across all the side winds that blow, all the other things which go to make up this consideration; and the honorable Senator understands as well as I do that the avoidance of taxation in stock operations would only be the dust in the scale, so to speak—a make-weight, and not even a controlling make-weight. But what is this operation? Here every fraudulent tax-payer and shirk is indemnified beyond all question. By an operation perfectly simple, costing him nothing but the expressage from his home to the Treasury Department or the sub-Treasury, he lays down his greenbacks and takes up his bonds, and when the occasion has passed by he lays down his bonds and he takes up his greenbacks. I admit that there is force in what the Senator says. It might happen at times that a sharp man could do it now, and very likely it is done; but is that a reason why we should open another door, make a place which will be "as wide as a church door and as deep as a well," which the other is not?

Now, Mr. President, I have said quite as much as I intended to say about this matter, and I leave it with a further suggestion: As I understand it, saying nothing about the morals involved, nothing about the expansion of the currency, nothing about those things which determine whether it is a wholesome or an unwholesome operation as introduced now as an element in our finances, it is a proposal by which when money is worth nothing, or substantially nothing, we take it and pay ten per cent. for the privilege of keeping it, being all the time forbidden to use it; because the Senator from New Jersey said with entire candor, as the bill pre-supposes, that it was not to go into circulation, but must be held all the time subject to call. We are the custodians of it, holding it in a fiduciary capacity, to exchange back with the owner the moment that he comes. That is the proposition; to pay this enormous percentage for the privilege of being the unpaid custodians of money which we cannot use while we hold it.

I do not attach the same importance that others do to any part of this bill. I have not the same faith in its financial aspects, or in some other aspects to which I have heard reference made; and if a provision of this sort is to be embraced in it I shall feel clear in my conscience and in my judgment in voting against it until I see reason to face about and advance again in the direction of expansion, turning my back upon the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to offer an amendment to the third section before the vote is taken on the motion to strike out the section. My amendment is to strike out all of the section after the word "prescribe," in line six, and to insert in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out the words "and the lawful money so received shall be canceled and not again reissued;" so that the section will read:

That the holder of any lawful money of the United States, to the amount of $1,000, or any multiple of $1,000, may convert the same into bonds for an equal amount, authorized by the first section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the lawful money so received shall be canceled and not again reissued.

Mr. President, I have heretofore submitted my views at length on this subject, upon a bill containing the main and very similar provisions to this bill, and I shall not weary the Senate or myself by repeating them again to-night. I am cordially in favor of the first and second sections and the last section of the bill, and trust they will pass. I think they will tend to settle this financial question on a permanent basis, and settle it to the advantage of the Government and to the general welfare of the people, by making a very large reduction in the amount of interest that we are called upon to pay annually. But the third section, notwithstanding I have had every disposition in the world to be in accord with the majority of the Committee on Finance, I am yet compelled to regard as a drag upon the bill. I believe that it is an excrescence, and that it is calculated to defeat the purposes of the previous sections, and therefore I offer this amendment. If this amendment should prevail the bill will be as near perfect as it can be, so far as I can comprehend it. I trust the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Massachusetts, who cite the section of the law of 1862, will recognize the value of my proposed amendment; for if this amendment should be adopted we shall then have the precise measure with which those Senators are so much in love. If their arguments are valid they must accept it.

Mr. President, I cannot regard it either for the interest of the United States, or of any sound bank, to receive money and agree to pay interest thereon and keep it all the time, earning nothing, in their own strong vaults. If it is to be paid in let it be canceled. I know that Senators may say that it will produce a stringency if it is canceled. Why, sir, all that risk is encountered by launching this section. If there is to be any stringency in this bill it will be created by the first branch of the section, whether the last branch is attached or not, and no bonds will ever be returned to the Treasury until that stringency occurs. Then, if we are to encounter all the evils of the bill, why not place ourselves in a position to reap the benefits from it? If all are anxious, as all profess to be, for a return of specie payments, when we have advanced three steps in the day time, why shall we, like the frog in the well, go back two feet every night? Worse than the frog, why shall we, after reducing our legal-tenders to $356,000,000, suddenly authorize an increase to $400,000,000? Some Senators think they can discover some approach to specie payments in this section. On the contrary it is a section to perpetuate paper currency. With such a law in force resumption would never take place.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio in one respect, that this measure will have a tendency to equalize the value of bonds and of United States notes; but look and see at what an immeasurable cost. Here are fifteen or sixteen hundred million dollars now outstanding that are to be affected by a reduction of values, and only $356,000,000, as it now stands, or $400,000,000, if the whole shall be issued, to be affected by a rise in values. Suppose that we equalize the value, will it be pretended that the notes are to be brought up to the value of seventy-eight cents from seventy or seventy-one? That cannot be expected. Then, if the bonds are to be brought down from seventy-eight to seventy-one or seventy, see what a loss we throw upon the world. Instead of this being a work of financial wisdom and propriety, it is a work of destruction, in my judgment, of something like one hundred million dollars of property in the hands of somebody. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] within my hearing, says he does not believe it. It must have a tendency to equalize the value. Where will you fix it? If you put it at half way between and say that it raises the value on $400,000,000 four per cent., and that it reduces the value on sixteen or seventeen hundred million dollars four per cent., then adjust your loss. It must obviously be a losing operation to somebody.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is a suggestion which has occurred to me which I think corresponds with the view just expressed, and I submit it to the Senator. If the bonds which are now out were all worth 140, they would be equal to gold.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They are worth from one hundred and ten to one hundred and fourteen. So just as much as they are above par they approach gold. If these bonds which are created by this law are as good, being free from taxation and payable in coin, as the five-twenties, as we assume they are if the one is to take the place of the other, then we are not only to destroy what the Senator from Vermont has said, but we are to destroy the great value of all the bonds that are out and bring them all down to the level of par instead of being worth 114.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly, that will be the tendency. But, Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from New York have so thoroughly discussed the points upon which I had proposed to make a few comments that I shall not trouble the Senate in relation to them. It appears to me, however, that the proposal at the end of this section defeats the first part of the bill. What is the desire? Evidently that the parties now holding our bonds shall come forward and exchange them for these new bonds. While I am ready to admit that we may make the new bond in its purchasing power equal to the six per cent. bond, which has only a short time to run, and therefore induce the parties to make the exchange, yet at the same time, if we accompany it by a provision whereby bonds cannot possibly be above par, as the Senator from New York so well stated, how is it possible that we can expect these parties to come forward and make this exchange? I cannot but regard the third section, therefore, as a clog to the bill. I do not impute any purpose to any party; but whether the object is or not to have the entire bill a success, in my judgment, if the last part is tacked on to the first as it stands it will defeat the exchange which is proposed.

Now, sir, I desire to have a vote on this amendment. I wish to see whether there is a majority or not in the Senate who are willing to take any steps by which we can approach specie payments and by which we can be relieved from all trouble in relation to all our financial questions.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I hope that this third section will be stricken from the bill, for I should like to vote for the other three sections, but with this third section in I should feel compelled to vote against the whole bill. The bill would then be evil and only evil in all its workings.

In the first place, we are to-day borrowing all the money that we choose to borrow on call at three per cent., payable in currency. We can borrow $100,000,000 and probably $200,000,000 payable on demand at three per cent. But this bill proposes instead of borrowing money on call at three per cent. in currency, to pay five per cent. in gold up to the amount of $400,000,000. Of course all your three per cent. certificates would be taken up. It is true you prohibit the conversion of those three per cents into these new bonds, but they would change their three per cents into a security that could be converted into these bonds, and you would immediately, instead of paying as now three per cent. in currency, begin to pay five per cent. in gold for every dollar that you borrow on call. Now, sir, take $100,000,000—and that amount is now in demand, called for, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] to-day introduced a proposition increasing the amount of three per cent. certificates $25,000,000—take $100,000,000; three per cent. in currency on that $100,000,000 would be $3,000,000 per annum which you pay; but, sir, if you pay five per cent. in gold on that self-same $100,000,000, and it would be converted immediately, you would pay $5,000,000 in gold, and the price of gold being to-day forty per cent would make it $2,000,000 more; and upon that single transaction on $100,000,000 that you could obtain to-day for three per cent. in currency you would lose $4,000,000 the very first year.

Now, sir, if the Senate has decided not to resume specie payments, or approximate to them, there never was a proposition introduced equal to this in satisfying the world that you never will come to specie payments. You proclaim to the world that while this law stands, you may have $400,000,000 in circulation all the time. Sir, whenever this Government is prepared to resume specie payments, specie payments will be resumed on that day and that hour; but the Government never will resume so long as it has $400,000,000 outstanding demand notes.

The first section of this bill in its action will be good, if there is any action under it. I like the section very well. I have no objection to the second section, and have already voted for the fourth; but with this third section in, I should be compelled to vote against the bill. I hope it will be stricken out. If it is not I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. CATTELL. With the temperature of the Chamber as it is to-night, and in my present physical condition, I am unable to say over a dozen or two words upon this third section. I object to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, because so long as the Government holds its hand upon the currency of the country, and limits and controls it, I am unwilling that any process of funding shall go on which shall take one or two hundred millions out of the currency which may be needed for its legitimate business purposes.

Mr. CONNESS. It is direct contraction.

Mr. CATTELL. That is a direct contraction, and a contraction how rapid you cannot tell. Therefore I would greatly prefer to have the section stricken out entirely than to have the amendment of the Senator from Vermont adopted. I am in favor of the section as it stands. I believe with the Senator from Ohio, that the least thing we can do for the creditor of the United States, who holds our promise to pay on demand either five, five hundred, or five thousand dollars, in the maintenance of our public faith and our honor, if we cannot pay it, is to give him an obligation of indebtedness and pay him interest on it. My own opinion always has been that the highest stretch of power which Congress took during the whole of this rebellion was the passage of the legal-tender act; when they took pieces of paper and stamped upon them the authority of the Government that they should be received throughout this nation in the payment of all debts, public and private. I think that the only authority for it was to be found in that unwritten law which provides that a Government may do anything to save its own life.

Now, Mr. President, that act was done, and you have got $356,000,000 of those notes in circulation. They are in the hands of your people everywhere. You are not prepared to redeem them. You have promised to redeem them, but you do not do it. I am compelled to receive them for any obligation which is due me; I can pay them for any obligation which I owe; but the Government of the United States, the promisor to pay, you propose shall be excused from any effort at payment, or any sort of recognition of them whatever. Is it not the least possible thing that the Government of the United States could do to give to its creditor, upon whom it has forced this issue of legal-tender notes, an obligation that it will pay at some time, and at the lowest rate of interest which it is paying to all other creditors? Is there not justice and equity in such a course as this? My friend from New York said in the course of his argument that when the money becomes worthless it will be taken to the Treasury and left there. What money will become worthless? The promises of the Government of the United States to pay so many dollars on demand. That is the thing that is worthless, and the more it is worthless the more you are bound in honor and in justice and in good faith to give to the holder of it something that is valuable.

Now, Mr. President, I say just that far in regard to this bill the right to do this does not admit of an argument. If these notes had only one single quality there would nothing remain but to give a bond, take them in, and cancel them because they are a debt; but unfortunately or fortunately, whichever it may be considered, these legal-tender notes of ours possess three distinct qualities. What are they? First, they are a public debt: they are a debt of the Government of the United States, and as such they ought to be paid. If they cannot be paid they ought to be funded. If they had no other character than simply that of a debt they ought to be canceled as fast as they are taken in.

But what are their other characters? The second character which this note has is that it is currency. It has become an essential element in our commerce and in our trade, and the Congress of the United States has seen proper, from time to time and from year to year, to limit the amount of this currency, to judge for the people of the United States just how much they want, and just how much they shall have. They begun with the legal-tender notes without any such limit at all; but they said, "You shall have $300,000,000 of bank circulation, and you shall not have any more. You have now got $656,000,000 of circulation, and that is just what you want. This is a wise Congress, and always has been, and it has fixed now just exactly the amount you want. It shall not be any more, and it shall not be any less." Therefore these legal-tender notes become an essential necessity for the conducting of our trade and of our commerce. They occupy not only the character of a debt of the United States, but they occupy a material character in relation to our commerce and to our trade. You cannot take these in any given quantity that you may choose and put them into your Treasury and cancel them. Why? Not unless you give the people of the United States some other currency in place of them. If we have not got too much money, if you take $100,000,000 out of the currency and cancel them, and reduce it that much, what is the result? The result is distress in business. At the very commencement of this session we concluded that we could not afford to continue to reduce $4,000,000 a month, and the Congress of the United States by a very large vote in both branches directed that the Secretary of the Treasury should cease canceling them. Is not that saying that we have not too much?

If you adopt this plan it will obviate a state of things which, I think, is discreditable and disgraceful to the Government of the United States, that a man should come and say, "Here is your promise to pay me so much money; will you be kind enough to do it?" "No; I have not got the means." "Will you give me your obligation at some future day, at a low rate of interest, the same rate of interest you are paying other persons?" Will my friend from New York object to that? Ought we not to do it? Is it not honest? Is it not right?

Mr. CONKLING. No more honest now than it would have been all the time.

Mr. CATTELL. We ought to have done it before. Because we have done wrong is that any reason why we should not do right now? We ought to have done this before. We have had a great many things said about this. We have not, perhaps, been brought to a careful view of the subject until now.

Now, we have come just to this point: this is a thing that ought to be done; we have no right to refuse it under the circumstances; but if you say you will do this, allow these notes to be funded and canceled, you are interfering with the currency; you are taking the life-blood of trade and commerce; and you cannot afford to take it away.

But more than that, these notes have another character. They are not only a debt of the United States, and not only currency of the United States, but they are the very highest order of currency. And why? Because they are a legal tender, and the foundation upon which all trade and all business is based; the foundation on which my bank and everybody else's bank stands; the kind of material that you require by law we shall keep in our vaults in order that we may be ready to meet our debts. Now, you propose not only to take it away as currency, but you propose to take away an article which has a higher character than that of currency, which is the foundation upon which you permit me to issue four dollars to one; for in a bank I may owe four dollars and keep one as a reserve. I say under this condition of things you cannot afford to open a door by which, in easy times when money is plenty, this money can be funded into the bonds of the United States and then destroyed, with Congress all the time sitting here with its hands clutched upon the currency of the country and saying it shall not be increased, you shall only have so much. If we have not got too much money now, with the growing interests of our country and its commerce, it will be too little by and by.

What is the answer to this argument? I insist upon it the only condition is just this: that having agreed you will fund this money, having agreed you will give the holder what he deserves, he ought to have your bond for the money. From the very character which you have given to this money and the very position in which you have placed it, you are compelled to take care of the interest of the country and to provide that if this money shall be needed for legitimate purposes there shall be some method of getting at it. That is all there is in the whole third section. It is nothing more and nothing less.

The Senator from New York talks about the extravagant rate of interest. It is the same rate of interest that we are offering to other creditors. We would like to fund all our debt at five per cent. in gold; and all this talk in the country about taxation is a thing of the past. All that was arranged when your laws were made. All that is a question which I do not think pertinent here. I wish to say just in this connection, however, that, in my opinion, the very moment this great Government gives up the right to borrow money and to make it free from taxation by State authority, it surrenders the greatest element of its sovereignty, and I do not believe the Government of the United States will ever consent to it in the world. It may work evil somewhere, at some time and in some place; but it is one of the evils that we cannot avoid. We give up an essential element of sovereignty when we admit that the States may tax our bonds; for if they can tax them one per cent. they can tax them five per cent., and if they can tax them five per cent. they can tax them fifty per cent.; and what is your credit good for to borrow money if a State can tax it? But that is off the line of my argument.

What I am trying to argue is just this position: that we are bound to do something for the creditors who hold these greenbacks of ours, and that from the very character which you have given them; from the very fact that you keep your hands clutched upon the currency of the country, and say to the people of the United States "Thus much you shall have and no more;" from the fact that you limit the banking circulation and prevent the institution of State banks because your tax on their circulation is so great that State banking institutions cannot under any possibility exist, you cannot refuse to do this much. Then you ought to adopt the other principle of the section and give them an opportunity when necessity requires it, when the business of the country requires it, and it will not be done at any other moment. People do not convert an interest-bearing security into money unless the money is wanted for the legitimate purposes of the country. It is not likely to be done at any other time.

Another thing: there are great differences of opinion in regard to how much or how little we ought to have. You adopt this section and it will settle that whole question. Whenever there is a surplus of currency it will be funded. My friend from Maine will perhaps be gratified by finding that more than fifty million dollars in the first year may be funded, and it is very possible that it may never be drawn at all. We may issue more national bank circulation; we may do something else; we may be in the very road to fund all this money.

One word in regard to the argument of the Senator from Maine and of my colleague in reference to the reduction in the value of the bonds. In my judgment, the argument is utterly fallacious. The passage of this bill would not affect the price of the bonds a solitary shade per cent. in the European markets where they are sold for gold, and that is the true test of this question. To measure these bonds as to their premium by an India-rubber yardstick, which is longer to-day and shorter to-morrow, which depends for its value exactly upon the value of gold, is not a fair test to test this question by at all. The fact is that it would improve the value of the greenback. It would elevate that beyond all sort of question. It is only our home measure by which we are measuring the value of these bonds. It is not their actual value in the money of the world, because it does not change them a single stiver. They will bring precisely the same amount of money on the other side of the water with this clause in the bill as if it were out, because it only has relation to our currency, not to gold and silver. It does not affect them in the slightest degree, and therefore I insist that the whole argument is a fallacy.

Mr. President, as I have said, I have not the strength, nor do I wish to detain the Senate with any lengthened argument. I see clearly that this section, I was going to say this very much abused section, this section which has had its share of argument, and had its share of abuse, this wonderfully-abused section, is likely to fail in the Senate from the expressions of opinion which I have heard around me. I submit to the wisdom of Senators that they may know better than I do on this subject. I surrender my judgment cheerfully to theirs; and if the bill is more agreeable to them after the section be stricken out, I shall still vote for the bill; but I think I shall live to see the day when, on a careful examination of the section, and its probable influence upon the currency of the country, and upon the trade and commerce of the country, it will have a higher reputation than it has in the Senate of the United States to-night.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, as the motion of which I gave notice, to strike out the third section, has been anticipated by the Senator from New York, I desire to express my views upon it. In my opinion this section will have a tendency to drag down the price of United States securities. We desire to keep those securities at the highest point possible, that we may reap as much from them as we can in exporting them to foreign countries. We must now send the United States bonds out of the country, or we must send gold or its equivalent. We are now shipping the gold out of the country, and, as I stated before to-day, we have shipped during the past three months between thirty-eight and thirty-nine million dollars of gold. We are shipping two dollars of gold where we are producing one.

The tendency of this bill, in my opinion, is to reduce the price of United States bonds. Possibly it might increase the price of legal tenders one per cent. where it will reduce the price of United States bonds five per cent. If they are to be brought on a par so that they can be exchangeable, United States bonds for legal tenders and legal tenders for United States bonds, they then become the foot-ball of every man who chooses to use them as a circulating medium; and all the smaller denominations will go into regular circulation, and it will be one of the grandest schemes of expansion that could possibly be adopted. If you desire to place the finances upon a system that will secure the greatest expansion and the greatest difficulty of returning to specie payments, it seems to me this is the process. You directly inflate the currency forty-four millions, and then you place them upon a par, so that the bonds of the United States can be used in a circulating form. They are both upon a par, and they circulate equally.

It seems to me that this section, if adopted, will work great harm to the stability of the financial affairs of the country, and will give an opportunity to speculators to oscillate and to operate in these bonds, and to create a stringency in the market from time to time, as they feel disposed to control the market, and you will distress the poorer classes, because the poorer classes are not the people who are handy to the Treasury of the United States. Those who are in the interior do not have the opportunity of exchanging their greenbacks for United States bonds and United States bonds for greenbacks. It is the bankers, the men who are at the money centers, who will have that opportunity; and they will take advantage of it as occasion requires and as they see a speculation presents itself. I hope, therefore, that this section will be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The question being put, it was declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I call for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those who are in favor of the amendment will rise.

Two Senators rose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw the call for a division. I see it is too warm to-night for anybody to rise. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is rejected. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS, Mr. SUMNER, and others called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was requested by Mr. VAN WINKLE to state that he was paired off on this question, and also on the bill, with Mr. DAVIS, of Kentucky. He would have voted against the amendment, and Mr. DAVIS, I understand, would have voted for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Rice, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cole, Conness, Henderson, Morgan, Nye, Osborn, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Welch, Willey, and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Howard, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, and Yates—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 14, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

On motion of Mr. MYERS, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

SAMUEL N. MILLER.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Patents Senate bill No. 454, for the relief of Samuel N. Miller. It is to correct an error which the Commissioner of Patents writes was made in the Patent Office.

Mr. SPALDING. I will not object if it does not give rise to debate.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Patents, reported the bill back, and moved that it be put on its passage.

The bill was read. It provides that Samuel N. Miller, who obtained a patent for an improved compound anchor, dated the 29th day of June, 1852, for fourteen years, which expired on the 29th day of June, 1866, be authorized to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of said patent for seven years, under the regulations now in force in relation to the extension of patents; and the Commissioner of Patents is hereby directed to investigate and decide the application for extension on the same evidence and in the same manner as other applications for extension are decided, provided that the applications for extension be made within sixty days after the approval of this act, and the decision of the Commissioner be rendered within ninety days from the filing of said application in the Patent Office; and provided also, that nothing herein shall be so construed as to hold responsible in damages any person who may have manufactured or used the said improved compound anchor between the expiration of the said patent and the approval of this act.

Mr. MYERS. I do not propose to debate it, but will state that the Commissioner of Patents writes that this claimant did not get a hearing, as some of the clerks mislaid the papers. The bill is only to grant him a hearing.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It seems that he has already had the use of the patent for fourteen years.

Mr. MYERS. The Commissioner of Patents asks that this error of his office be corrected so as to let this party have the privilege of the ordinary application.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 16, 1868.

SIR: On the 14th of March, 1866, an application was filed in this office by Samuel Nye Miller, of West Roxbury, Massachusetts, for the extension of the patent granted to him on the 29th of June 1852, for an "improved compound anchor." Owing to an inadvertence on the part of one of the officers of this office, the case was not brought to the attention of the examiner in charge of the class to which Mr. Miller's case belonged until after the expiration of the patent, too late to correct the mistake.

As the requirements of the law had been complied with, and the mistake being of the Patent Office, as will further appear from the affidavit of the examiner, (a certified copy of which is herewith inclosed,) I respectfully request that authority be given, by special act of Congress, to examine the application as presented, just as though the error had not been committed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. M. STOUT,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. W. T. WILLEY, Chairman Committee on Patents,
United States Senate.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MYERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAGON-ROAD AT WEST POINT.

Mr. McCARTHY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back House bill No. 761, to build a wagon-road for the use of the Military Academy from West Point, in the county of Orange, to Cornwall Landing, in said county, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point to use the labor in the employ of the United States Government at that post, when not otherwise employed, in building and constructing a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing, in the county of Orange, said road to be located under the direction of said superintendent over land now belonging or hereafter to be ceded to the Government of the United States for that purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCARTHY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER M. CARMICHAEL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The member from the Albany district of New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] who is now absent and may not be able to be here before the close of the session, has sent to me a little private bill which has received the approval of the Committee on Commerce, and which I ask in his behalf that the House may now pass. It is a bill entirely proper, simply enabling a man to get his salary at the Treasury Department, there being at present a technical difficulty in regard to his not having taken the oath a second time on assuming the duties of an office similar to that which he had before held.

There being no objection,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, reported from the Committee on Commerce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) for the relief of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in auditing and adjusting the accounts of Peter M. Carmichael, surveyor of the port of Albany, to admit and allow the charge of $1,008, that sum having been paid by him to John Hastings, deputy surveyor and inspector of that port.

Mr. SPALDING. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is not; but I send to the Clerk a letter from the Department which will explain the reasons for the passage of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS,
June 25, 1868.

SIR: Upon receiving the appointment of surveyor of customs at the port of Albany, Mr. Peter M. Carmichael appointed John Hastings as deputy surveyor and inspector with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury; but as Mr. Hastings occupied at that time the position of deputy collector at New York, and as Albany constituted a part of the district of New York, Mr. Carmichael did not think it necessary that Mr. Hastings should take the oaths over again; and he has been performing his duties without taking the required oaths. This prevents the charges for the money paid to Mr. Hastings from being allowed at the Treasury without authority from Congress for their allowance; and I herewith send you a joint resolution authorizing the allowance of said charges, which I trust Congress will see fit to pass.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. SARGENT,
Commissioner of Customs.

Hon. E. B. WASHBURNE, Chairman of the Committee on Commerce, House of Representatives.

Mr. SPALDING. Does this bill give double pay?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It does not. This officer took the oath once, and did not suppose it necessary to take it the second time; but the requirement of the law is otherwise.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES DEPOSITARY, CHICAGO.

Mr. LOGAN, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill (H. R. No. 387) to fix the compensation of the United States depository at Chicago.

The bill, which was read, provides that after January 1, 1868, the whole allowance of compensation to the United States designated depository at Chicago shall not exceed $2,500; and so much of the first section of an act to provide compensation to such persons as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury to receive and keep the public money under the fifteenth section of the act of 6th August, 1846, for the additional services required under that act, approved March 2, 1853, as provides for fixing and limiting the annual compensation of the designated depository at Chicago, not to exceed the annual sum of $1,500, be amended and modified to conform to this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIZE CASES IN FLORIDA.

Mr. DAWES. I desire the House to consider at the present time a Senate bill now on the Speaker's table, to which there will be not the slightest objection, and which it is very important should be passed. I will state in a word what it is, and if there is the slightest objection I will not urge it. The United States marshal at Key West, James C. Clapp, died in an insane asylum. It was found after his death that he was a defaulter to the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of the Navy have settled with his representatives, and they have deposited $116,000 to adjust that settlement in a bank in the city of New York. But they find that there must be a distribution of this money, and there is no law regulating the distribution, so that they cannot close it up without the passage of this act. Consequently this money has been held in a bank for two years, and nobody has had any benefit of it except the bank. This bill is to dispose of that money according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of the Navy. There can be no objection to it.

The bill (S. No. 486) to facilitate the settlement of certain prize cases in the southern district of Florida, was accordingly taken up and read a first and second time. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the execution and delivery to him by the administratrix of the estate of James C. Clapp, deceased, late United States marshal for the southern district of Florida, of a proper written release of all claims and demands for, or on account of, all costs, charges, fees, and expenses due, or claimed to be due, the said Clapp as marshal aforesaid, or to his estate, in any prize or other cases in said district, to accept from said administratrix the sum of $50,000 in full satisfaction of all claims and demands of the United States against the estate of the said James C. Clapp, and against the sureties in said Clapp's official bond; and that said sum of $50,000 when paid, together with the sums now on deposit with the Assistant Treasurer in New York to the credit of the said Clapp and to the credit of the United States district court for the southern district of Florida, shall be deposited with the Assistant United States Treasurer at Washington, District of Columbia, subject to the order of the United States district court for the southern district of Florida, for the purpose of meeting decrees of distribution or restitution in certain named prize causes pending in said district. Sections two and three regulate the distribution of the prize moneys of the steamers Adela and Nita, &c.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Has this been before any committee?

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Naval Affairs are in favor of it. It does not take any money out of the Treasury, but puts money into the Treasury which cannot be otherwise disposed of.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It is a compromise of a law-suit, I believe.

Mr. DAWES. It does not confirm any suit. The money has got to be distributed, and the law does not describe how. It has got to be distributed pro rata. The adjustment of the account of the United States with the representatives of Mr. Clapp is made under a general law which authorizes such compromises; it was done two years ago, and this money has been on deposit in a New York bank all the time because it could not be covered into the Treasury until some act authorizing the distribution of it should be passed. That is the origin of this bill. It has been before the committee of the Senate, and the Senate were unanimously in favor of it. It was before the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, who had the same bill ready to report, and they recommend its passage.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Cannot prize money be covered into the Treasury without the authority of a special act of Congress?

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly it can; but when the whole sum total is not enough to adjust all the cases there is no law to authorize the pro rata distribution. Here is a sum total against which all the prize cases in the court at Key West are to be settled, and this bill authorizes the holding of this money when it goes into the Treasury to answer to those prize cases. Some of them have been decided in the Supreme Court and some are pending in it. The representatives of Mr. Clapp have no interest at all in their adjudication. They have deposited this money according to an arrangement between them and the Treasury and Navy Departments. But it cannot go into the Treasury until some act is passed of this kind. Two committees have examined it thoroughly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It is rather an unusual bill, but I have so much confidence in the Naval Committee who have examined it that I do not deem it proper to interpose any further objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHTING STREETS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. KOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee for the District of Columbia a joint resolution (S. No. 57) relative to lighting the streets of Washington city, District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. KOONTZ. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. Pennsylvania avenue and Four-and-a-half street are in darkness on account of the failure of an appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOONTZ] that I do not make any captious objection. We had that matter before the Committee on Appropriations, and concluded that Washington city might light her own streets.

Mr. KOONTZ. A part of this joint resolution provides that the council of the city shall levy a tax for the purpose of lighting the streets.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, let the substitute be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Joint resolution relative to lighting the streets of Washington, District of Columbia, reducing the expense, and for other purposes.

Whereas the municipal authorities of the city of Washington have failed to carry out the arrangements for lighting the streets of said city, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government," approved July 23, 1866: Therefore

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax from the property-holders of the city of Washington sufficient to defray the expense of lighting the avenue and street lamps of said city with six-foot burners twenty-one nights in each month, from dark until daylight, and keep said lamps so lighted each year.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior, for the Government of the United States, and the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington, for the city, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed immediately upon the passage of this joint resolution, severally, to contract with the Washington Gas-light Company (if said company shall agree thereto) for a term of fifteen years for the United States Government, and for the city for such a term, not exceeding fifteen years, as may be agreed upon, for all the illuminating gas required in the city of Washington by the United States and for the avenue and street lamps and public offices of the city in the city of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of this joint resolution, at the reduced price of three dollars net per thousand feet: Provided however, That the price paid under said contract shall at no time within said term of fifteen years exceed the price charged by said company to the citizens of Washington, and that the quality of said illuminating gas shall not be less than fifteen candles standard: And provided further, That the right is reserved to the United States and to the mayor and city councils of Washington to annul the contracts authorized hereby at any time after ten years by giving two years' notice.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to increase from time to time, as the public good may require, the number of street lamps on any of the streets, lanes, alleys, public ways, and grounds in the city of Washington, and to do any and all things pertaining to the well lighting of the city, and to levy and collect a tax from the property holders therefor.

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved, That in the event of the failure of the mayor and city councils to levy and collect the tax herein authorized, or to light the said city as herein directed, then the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to levy a tax upon the property of said city and to collect the same, so from year to year, in case of such failure of said mayor and city councils to light as herein directed, and to fully execute the provisions of this joint resolution in the place and stead of the said mayor and city councils.

Sec. 5. And be it further resolved, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relieve the said Washington Gas-light Company from paying the internal revenue tax imposed by law.

Mr. DELANO. I object to the report.

ST. JOSEPH CATHEDRAL, BUFFALO.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I have been directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report for action at this time a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund duties paid on a chime of bells and a clock imported for St. Joseph Cathedral, Buffalo, New York.

The joint resolution, which was read, remits the duties on the set of bells and the clock for St. Joseph Cathedral, in the city of Buffalo, in the State of New York, and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to repay the amount paid for duty thereon.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Subsequently Mr. KELSEY withdrew his objection, but

Mr. FARNSWORTH said: I renew the objection unless I can offer an amendment to the effect that all bells imported for religious purposes shall be allowed to come in free.

Mr. SPALDING. Oh! no.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, a statement of the troops stationed along the line of the Union Pacific railroad between Omaha and Salt Lake City; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF GALVESTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 2, 1867, a communication from the chief of engineers, with a report from General M. D. McAllister, relative to the most practicable mode of improving the harbor of Galveston, Texas; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TRIAL OF GENERAL E. WHITTLESEY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with House resolutions of the 30th ultimo, the record of a military court held at Raleigh, North Carolina, for the trial of Brevet Brigadier General E. Whittlesey; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PARIS EXPOSITION, OF 1867.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting the financial reports of N. M. Beckwith, United States commissioner general to the Paris Exposition of 1867; and of J. C. Derby, general agent at New York; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW TREATY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, asking an appropriation of $15,000 to carry out the treaty stipulations with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 564) concerning the tax commissioners for the State of Arkansas.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. BANKS moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. GARFIELD in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 1096, making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the Globe some remarks upon the Alaska bill. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. When the Committee of the Whole was last in session on this bill there was an appeal pending from the decision of the Chair in regard to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] The question pending is upon that appeal.

Mr. BANKS. As it is some days since this question was under consideration, I ask the Chair to state the question and the grounds of his decision.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, That the payment of $500,000 of said appropriation be withheld until the imperial Government of Russia shall signify its willingness to refer to an impartial tribunal for adjudication and settlement all such claims by American citizens against the imperial Government of Russia as have been investigated by the State Department of the United States and declared by said Department to be just, and the amount so awarded to be paid from said $500,000 so withheld.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts was objected to as out of order. The Chair sustained the point of order on the ground that the treaty is indivisible: that the object of the pending bill is to fulfill the stipulations of the sixth article of the treaty; that that article requires the payment of a specific sum, and any proposition to withhold a part of that sum is inconsistent with the purpose of the bill, and is, therefore, not in order. The gentleman from Massachusetts has appealed from the decision of the Chair. That appeal is now pending.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Would it be proper for the Chair to state, as a great many members were absent when the question was up before, that at that time the majority of those present sustained the appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be proper, for the reason that it is the recollection of the Chair that there were thirty-six members present, and eighteen voted on each side. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

On the question there were—ayes 93, noes 27.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, to insert the following preamble and additional section:

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that in consideration of the cession by the emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas the subjects thus embraced in the stipulations of said treaty are among the subjects which by the Constitution of the United States are submitted to the power of Congress, and over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction; and it being for such reason necessary that the consent of Congress should be given to the said stipulations before the same can have full force and effect; having taken into consideration the said treaty, and approving of the stipulations therein. To the end that the same may be carried into effect; Therefore,

Sec. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I modify my amendment by striking out the word "exclusive" before "jurisdiction;" so as to make the language read, "over which Congress has jurisdiction."

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] to accept the following as a substitute for his amendment:

That in the opinion of this House, after full debate the money stipulated by treaty made with Russia to be paid for the purchase of Alaska ought to be appropriated; but in making this declaration the House at the same time asserts its right to decide, at all times whether an appropriation for the purpose of carrying into execution a treaty made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, ought to be made or withheld; and holds further that it is the right and duty of the House to investigate with close scrutiny any such appropriation asked for, and act according to its best judgment, the same as upon any and every other appropriation.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I cannot accept that as a substitute for my amendment.

Mr. BANKS. There is no objection, I believe, to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.] I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope it will not be adopted. It contains doctrines altogether false.

Mr. ELIOT. I hope my amendment may be read before that of the gentleman from Iowa is acted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is not in order now unless he offers it as a substitute for that of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ELIOT. I offer it as a substitute, and ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the original bill—

The CHAIRMAN. This is not in order as a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. Let it be reported.

Mr. BANKS. It is not now in order, and I object to its being reported.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move to add to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] the words, "and that the members of this House shall be taken into secret session with the Senate before the treaty is confirmed." Otherwise the whole thing is a folly.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. LOUGHRIDGE's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BANKS and Mr. ORTH were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 34.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on Mr. ELIOT's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 57.

Mr. BANKS demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to move an amendment which is short of the objectionable feature of the other amendment I offered.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

Provided, The imperial Government of Russia shall signify its willingness to refer to an impartial tribunal for adjudication—

Mr. BANKS. I raise the first point of order on the amendment that it is not in order, as it imposes a new condition to the treaty.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will first be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, The imperial Government of Russia shall signify its willingness to refer to an impartial tribunal for adjudication and settlement all such claims by American citizens against the imperial Government of Russia as have been investigated by the State Department of the United States, and declared by said Department to be just.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a question of order. It defeats the appropriation and imposes a new condition upon the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order that new conditions imposed upon the treaty are not in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BANKS. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee rise and report the bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 32.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARFIELD reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, House bill No. 1096, making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to close the debate under the rule. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] for the space of ten minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know I shall want ten minutes, for I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any lengthy debate on this subject. There is neither time nor opportunity nor fitness, and I will not endeavor to do anything of that sort. The amendments which have been adopted in the Committee of the Whole asserting the power of the House of Representatives, to my mind take away much of what otherwise exists with me as objection against this bill. So far as the matter of the acquisition of this territory from Russia is concerned, I admit I have not that high opinion of its value which many gentlemen seem to entertain. I have never been able to feel my imagination worked upon to the extent of according to the bargain we have made anything like the value which other gentlemen seem to find in it. Perhaps, if anything could reconcile myself, or any man, to the acquisition of this Alaska territory it might be found in the weather under which we are now suffering, and that probably is a more earnest argument in its favor than almost anything else I can find in my mind. [Laughter.]

So far, however, as to any other question or all other questions underlying the whole subject is concerned I remain precisely of the same opinion I expressed to the House when this subject was first introduced early in the session. I took the ground then which I desire to repeat now. I hold that in what has been done in relation to the purchase of Alaska and the taking possession of that territory, the treaty-making power in the first place, and afterward the Executive, have both transcended the powers given or intended to be given to them respectively by the Constitution. I admit that by the letter of the Constitution treaties made by the President and Senate are the supreme law of the land; but when I admit that by the terms of that instrument they are thus made the highest obligatory law I claim that they must be clearly within the meaning of the law intended to be made. Now, what law in the shape of a treaty can the President and the Senate make? To my mind clearly only that law which is within the scope of their power as President and Senate exercising such functions. They are the President and the Senate, respectively, of the United States. When they exercise their functions in the making of treaties they do so by and for the United States. If they go beyond that which is done by and for the United States, then, I say, they are outside of the scope and authority which the Constitution confers upon them.

Now, let me explain myself. What constitutes a nation? What constitutes a State? What is the United States as a nation? Like every other State or independent sovereignty it is made of three component qualities. It consists, first, of a people; second, of a given territory inhabited by that people; and third, of a form of government which the people within the territory have adopted for themselves. When, therefore, the supreme law in the shape of a treaty is to be made for the United States that supreme law must not interfere with either of the elements which make up the nation for which the President and the Senate act. I hold, therefore, that the President and the Senate can make no treaty which changes the people of the country. They can make no obligatory treaty which changes the territory inhabited by the people, and they can make no treaty which changes the form of Government which the people maintain within that territory. I will not stop to inquire how far these general propositions may be modified by the settlement of a question of boundary, for that I do not regard as properly an acquisition of territory. But I hold that it is out of the power of the President and Senate to make a treaty which shall disturb either of the three original component elements which constitute the United States a Government. They cannot give us a different people from what we have, a different territory from that which the people occupy, or a different form of Government.

What, then, can give validity to anything of this kind done by the President and Senate? Simply the assent of the people to this extra constitutional power, which assent can only be gathered by the concurrence of all the Departments of the Government. This I understand to have been the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson, when he claimed that the purchase of Louisiana was altogether outside of the Constitution. Mr. Jefferson, we are well advised, never regarded that purchase as having any validity under the Constitution, as an exercise of the treaty-making power, but only as obtaining its validity by the subsequent assent of the nation given through all the Departments of the Government.

Now, then, I claim that the President and Senate have transcended their power in making a treaty of this kind which acquires foreign territory not in any way contiguous to our own, seeking to make the people of that territory a part of our population and to incorporate them into the body of our citizens. And while I object to that on the same ground that I would object to their introducing one of the Japanese islands with all its people as a part of the United States, I claim that the President has himself gone much further astray when he failed to wait and see whether this treaty would have the concurrence, through the action of every Department of the Government, of the people of the country. And I hold that if Andrew Johnson has done any one thing which as much as any other would make it proper he should be arraigned by impeachment, to be tried at the bar of the Senate, it would be for having dared, without awaiting for the assent of the people of this country, by the mere making of a treaty of this kind, altering our people and our territory, to go on and assume the exercise of a jurisdiction over that territory, to send his army there, to run up our flag and take formal possession, and accept the surrender of that territory by the high contracting power with which the treaty had been made.

What, then, is our position? We stand here to cure or not by our assent this irregularity; to accept or not the bargain which has been made for us.

But I am frank to admit that I am willing to accept that bargain, not because I believe in the value of the purchase, as other gentlemen do; not because I believe the President and the Senate had the power to make such a treaty, and that treaty a conclusive one upon all the Departments of the Government; not because I believe the President did other than very wrong in taking possession of that country, and establishing our Army and our flag there; but because the treaty has been made with a friendly Power, one of those that stood by us, almost the only one that stood by us when all the rest of the Powers of the world seemed to be turning away from us in our recent troubles. We have been brought into such complications with the Government of Russia that it seems almost necessary to agree with what has been done, so as to avoid a misunderstanding with Russia herself. It is on account of Russia, therefore, that I am willing to vote for this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANKS. I now call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BANKS. I would inquire of the Chair how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifty minutes remaining.

Mr. BANKS. I have agreed to yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WOODBRIDGE.]

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. As I will not have the opportunity, by reason of the little time allowed me, to present my views fully to the House, and disagreeing with many members of the House, both as to the law and the public policy of this treaty, I will ask permission to have printed in the Globe some remarks which I may hereafter prepare.

No objection was made. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BANKS. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] my colleague on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for ten minutes.

Mr. DELANO addressed the House. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BANKS. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is to my mind so objectionable that if it be adopted I care but little whether this bill shall pass or not. Every provision in our Constitution is perfect in its form. Wherever a power is granted to one of the branches of Government no other power can encroach upon it. Now, to Congress is granted the power of regulating commerce, yet we have had repeated instances of what I have always deemed improper commercial treaties. Now, the Constitution provides that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall make treaties. No reference is made to any other power in our Government. When the Senate shall have ratified it, and it is proclaimed to the world as a treaty, it is then a perfect instrument. Now I ask the Clerk to read the ratification of this treaty.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE VII.

When this convention shall have been duly ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the one part, and on the other by his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within three months from the date hereof, or sooner, if possible.

In faith whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention, and thereto affixed the seals of their arms.

Done at Washington, the 13th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1867.

[L. S.]

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

[L. S.]

EDOUARD DE STOECKL.

And whereas the said treaty has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Washington on this 29th day of June, by William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, and the Privy Counselor Edouard de Stoekl, the envoy extraordinary of his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, on the part of their respective Governments.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same and every clause and article thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 20th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1867, and of the independence of the United States the ninety-first.

[L. S.]

ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:

WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Now, sir, it either was or was not a treaty. If it was a treaty, what does it provide? It did not provide to make an appropriation of money, but it undertook that this body should make an appropriation of money. If this body made that appropriation of money, then the treaty became a valid fulfillment. The Russian Government delivered up everything she was bound to deliver up. She faithfully executed every part of her stipulations. This Government agreed that it would do a certain thing. If we do not do it, then we annul the treaty. Do we break down this proclamation, or does it simply stand as an obligation of the United States unexecuted on our part but executed on the other part? Does it not stand as a repudiated instrument, to be executed whenever the Government chooses to fulfill the treaty? At what time should this nation interfere to make that instrument valid? If it were a valid instrument when it was proclaimed, where is the power to annul it without the consent of both parties? If it were not, and there was to be a condition precedent before it went into operation, when was this House to be called upon to intervene? When they first began to negotiate? That never was heard of. When the terms were offered? That never was heard of. When the terms were agreed upon and it went before the Senate for ratification, was this body then to be called in to state their objections? Such a thing was never heard of. It then became a perfect obligation and we were to do certain things, and Russia undertook to do certain other things. She has done them, and we have not. Shall we repudiate our part of the obligation? That, sir, is the whole question.

Mr. BANKS. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-two minutes.

Mr. BANKS. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MUNGEN.]

Mr. MUNGEN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the measure, if for nothing else, as a national necessity. The Atlantic has been the scene of maritime operations since we have any historically correct account of the same. The right to the fisheries, from the herring fisheries in the North sea down to the cod and mackerel fisheries off of our coasts, has been the fruitful theme of wars and treaties. The Protestant nations of northern Europe have been enriched by the products of northern fisheries sent to the markets of the Catholic countries of southern Europe. The Atlantic fisheries are to a considerable extent exhausted; not exactly exhausted, but they do not yield nearly so greatly as they did fifty or seventy-five years since. I beg to have printed in the Globe, not having time to have the same read to the House, the opinions of Admiral Ricord, who was Governor of the Russian possessions on the North American continent from about 1830 to 1840. They give many important reasons why this Government should be anxious to obtain possession thereof. The opinions were given by the admiral in 1841-42, long before this treaty was thought of, made to a gentleman not then an American citizen, but a subject of Great Britain. Admiral Ricord's father was an Englishman, and the admiral had been retired from active service in the Russian navy; the Pacific coast from Petropaulovski, then the territorial seat of government of the Russian possession, southward to Cape St. Lucas, or, perhaps, to Acapulco, was almost an unbroken wilderness. But he saw the importance of Alaska, and gave utterance to his views thereon in a conversation with one who, although now an American citizen, was then a young English gentleman of fortune traveling for information and observation, and a subject of Queen Victoria, who, if I remember right, had then recently ascended the throne. I ask that the letter be printed in the Globe.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1868.

DEAR SIR: About 1840-41 I was well acquainted in St. Petersburg with Admiral Ricord of the Russian navy. He had been for many years governor of the Russian possessions on the Pacific. I had repeated and very interesting conversations with him on that subject. He was a highly cultivated and intellectual old gentleman, who took great pleasure in giving information to a young man desirous of receiving it.

This opinion in brief was, that the Asiatic coast would only be valuable when settlements were made much further South and occupation pushed in that direction; but that the American possessions would eventually prove far the most valuable on account of the fisheries. These whenever developed at some future time he said would render that territory infinitely more valuable than Georgia, (called the Italy of Russia,) far more valuable than Italy itself would be. He had studied and thoroughly posted himself on the great fisheries of the north Atlantic, beginning with the herring fisheries of the German ocean, (or North sea,) and with the cod and whale fisheries of the American Atlantic coast and the northernmost waters of the Atlantic.

He pointed out the immense source of wealth and political importance they had been to Holland, to Great Britain, to France, and to the United States. How the Governments of these countries had been fully aware of that importance—the right to fish or to exclude others having been repeatedly a determining cause of wars and of treaties. How tens of thousands of seamen had been engaged in that occupation, France alone having at one time ten thousand for many consecutive years. How it was a singular fact that the market afforded by the Roman Catholic countries of southern and middle Europe had during a long period of years poured millions into the lap, and built up navies, for northern Protestant States, their rivals.

But these fisheries of the Atlantic (then much exhausted) had never, he said, begun to compare with those of the North Pacific. The fisheries of the Russian waters he considered as inexhaustible—except as regarded the whales—the least valuable part, destined, in his opinion, everywhere, at no very remote period, to become so thinned out by active pursuit as to become an unimportant branch.

To the development of this vast source of individual and national wealth there had been two objections:

Firstly, the Pacific coasts of the North American continent down to the Columbia river, down to Cape St. Lucas, and almost to the tropical region, were uninhabited wastes. The islands of Japan were then so closely sealed as to be practically non-existent.

The distant islands of Oceania—such as the Sandwich Islands—were the nearest points for vessels to refit up to that time. Russian possessions further south, on the Asiatic side, might in time remedy this. But for the second difficulty: the inaptitude of the Russians for that kind of maritime pursuit. The admiral said that the Russian, as you are aware, is a first-rate fisherman in fresh water, but you cannot make a salt-water fisherman of him. Thus, he said, we move in a vicious circle; we cannot have vast fisheries in the Pacific for want of sailors, and not having the materials for a navy these fisheries must remain undeveloped to Russia.

He feared that before his Government had taken or could take steps in the right direction, and before it had progressed sufficiently in a maritime point of view to avail themselves of the vast advantages of the American-Russian possessions as it regarded the fisheries alone, wars might ensue in which some maritime Power of greater strength in those waters would appropriate these possessions, which assuredly they would never relinquish, because they would soon find them self-paying to hold; besides being susceptible of immense development, notwithstanding their extreme remoteness from civilized settlement. So remote were they from the seat of Government that when he was Governor at Petropaulovski he only received his mails and dispatches overland once every six months, and he was only regularly visited every second year by two Russian vessels which brought out stores, &c., from the Baltic.

The climate of the sea-board of these possessions was, he said, for the most part milder than that of St. Petersburg—the islands much milder. In the vicinity of St. Petersburg all the small grains are cultivated, and many fruits come to high perfection.

This, my dear general, is the substance of what I gathered many years ago from my conversation with the ex-Governor, on a subject which for me had only the interest of referring to a comparatively terra incognita, what was then considered as the most desolate and inhospitable region on earth.

Very truly, yours,
C. F. HENNINGSEN.
Hon. W. MURGEN, House of Representatives.

Mr. BANKS addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. Debate has closed, and the first question is on the following amendment of the Committee of the Whole:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that in consideration of the cession by the emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas the subjects thus embraced in the stipulations of said treaty are among the subjects which by the Constitution of the United States are submitted to the power of Congress, and over which Congress has jurisdiction; and it being for such reason necessary that the consent of Congress should be given to said stipulation before the same can have full force and effect; having taken into consideration the said treaty, and approving of the stipulations therein, to the end that the same may be carried into effect: Therefore,

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty.

Mr. MAYNARD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 49, not voting 53; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next question was on the amendment of Mr. ELIOT, reported from the Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Provided, That no purchase in behalf of the United States of any foreign territory shall be hereafter made until after provision by law for its payment; and it is hereby declared that the powers vested by the Constitution in the President and Senate to enter into treaties with foreign Governments do not include the power to complete the purchase of foreign territory before the necessary appropriation shall be made therefor by act of Congress.

Mr. ELIOT. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 78, nays 80, not voting 42; as follows:

Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, and Woodward—42.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PAINE said. My colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, is paired with Mr. VAN HORN of Missouri. On this question my colleague would vote ay. I do not know how he would have voted on the question already taken.

The result having been announced as above,

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was disagreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time. If a separate vote is desired on the preamble it will be reserved until the vote is taken on the engrossment of the bill.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed; it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question on the passage.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will it be in order to ask for a separate vote on the preamble?

The SPEAKER. It would have been in order when the Chair stated that the preamble would be reserved if any gentleman desired it. It is not in order now.

Mr. MAYNARD. I then ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection if it be by general consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. I make the motion to reconsider in order that we may have a separate vote on the preamble.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was accordingly laid on the table.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 43, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Beck, Benjamin, Blair, Bontwell, Boyden, Brooks, Buckland, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Cobb, Cook, Coburn, Coyode, Cullom, Delano, Elia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Gravelly, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Lynch, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Scofield, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—43.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Boies, Boyer, Burr, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Deweese, Dodge, Eggleston, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Halsey, Harding, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, Lincoln, McCormick, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Newcomb, Pile, Polesley, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, and Woodward—44.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PAINE said: My colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, is paired with Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. If present he would have voted no.

Mr. McCARTHY said: My colleague, Mr. PRUYN, is absent, and I am paired with him. If he was here he would vote ay, and I should vote no.

Mr. BOYER said: Upon this question my colleague, Judge WOODWARD, and myself are paired. He would have voted ay and I would have voted no.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. CHANLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, directed to inform this House of all facts which have come to his knowledge relating to the obstruction to free and safe navigation of the main or ship channel off Sandy Hook, known as the wreck of the ship Scotland, and what means in his judgment can best be used to protect the commerce of the United States from the annoyance and danger to which it is now exposed from the said wreck.

Mr. CHANLER obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the Globe some papers in relation to the resolution. [See Appendix.]

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTE.

The SPEAKER. The next business is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution. This bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and was postponed until after the consideration of the Alaska bill with the understanding that it should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. That allows five minutes debate on amendments.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following as a new section, to come in at the end of the bill:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the number of students in the collegiate department from the several States as authorized by act of March 2, 1867, shall be increased from ten to twenty-five.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to, and I desire to make a statement with regard to this whole institution.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman from Illinois is opposed to the whole bill, and he has agreed with me that the previous question may be called, and then I will give him forty minutes of my time to make known his objections to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to offer another amendment after that shall be disposed of, and I hope the bill will not be closed for amendments. My amendment is a substitute for the bill, and I also desire to offer an additional section.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] whether amendments of this sort are to be offered, and then the previous question is to be moved and debate closed in forty minutes?

Mr. SPALDING. I will hear what the amendments are.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing of any arrangement made privately by members. The bill is to be considered as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and read by sections for amendments.

Mr. MULLINS. By what rule do we get into an hour speech by moving the previous question while considering the bill in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. For the reason that after the previous question shall be seconded and the main question ordered the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole will have terminated, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] having originally reported the bill, will be entitled to the floor for one hour to close the debate.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] give me a portion of his time before the amendment and substitute are voted upon, because I desire the House to understand this matter.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will now be considered as having been perfected in Committee of the Whole, and as being now before the House with the amendments pending.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] take his hour now, or after the previous question shall have been seconded?

Mr. SPALDING. I will take it now, and yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to get the attention of the House to a simple matter of business. This bill now before the House is a bill making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution. I can say that in the first instance the Committee on Appropriations were divided upon this bill, and there was a minority report of four members of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN,] the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] and myself.

I desire the attention of the House to the minority report in this matter that we may know what we are to vote upon, and what is this Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. It is an institution in which the Government has no interest whatever, but which has obtained from the Government the sum of $325,000; and if we vote the appropriation here called for the total amount will be $376,860.

Now, I wish to ask the Clerk to read the report of the minority of the Committee on Appropriations, in order that the House may know how this money has been expended, and in order that we may know what we have been paying for the education of the deaf and dumb in the District of Columbia, while we assent to the proposition that it is but right and just that the Government should educate the deaf and dumb of the District of Columbia we deny that it has the right to educate the deaf and dumb of all the States, and to build up an immense institution here with the money of the people.

This report will show that these pupils which have been educated here have each cost the Government the enormous sum of $7,200. This bill proposes to appropriate the sum of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars; when less than $7,000 will educate at the best institutions in any of the States every deaf and dumb pupil we have here in the city of Washington.

The facts in relation to this whole matter are set out in this report, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The report is as follows:

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on Appropriations, being unable to concur in the action of a majority of the committee in reporting House bill No. 541, entitled "A bill making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution," and also being unable to concur in the provisions of House bill No. 859, entitled "A bill appropriating money in support of benevolent institutions and in aid of charities in the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869," so far as relates to appropriations for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, beg leave to submit the following views:

They find that an act was passed February 16, 1857, to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, which act is to be found in volume two United States Statutes-at-Large, page 161, and is as follows, to wit: (see act marked A.)

It will be seen that certain persons, and such persons as might thereafter be associated with them by contributions for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind, were created a body politic, &c., with the usual privileges of perpetual succession, and of taking, holding, and enjoying lands, &c., and using the common seal, &c. It will be observed that the further provisions were, in brief, that whenever the Secretary of the Interior should be informed, in a manner prescribed by the act, of any deaf and dumb or blind person of teachable age, properly belonging to the District of Columbia, who should be in indigent circumstances, and without the command of means to secure an education, it was made the duty of the said Secretary to authorize the said person to enter the said institution for instruction, and to pay for his maintenance and tuition therein at the rate of $150 per annum, payable quarterly out of the Treasury of the United States. And it was made lawful for the said institution to receive and instruct deaf and dumb and blind persons from any of the States and Territories of the United States on such terms as might be agreed upon, &c. A further provision was also made, as will be perceived by reference to the act, that the condition of the said institution should be reported to the Secretary of the Interior on the 1st day of July in each year.

This act seems to have had its inception in an enlightened spirit and the most humane motives, to enable certain liberal and charitable gentlemen to carry out a most benevolent and praiseworthy purpose. And in the line of such purpose it was provided by law that where any deaf and dumb or blind persons of teachable age, properly belonging to the District, was in indigent circumstances and unable to command means to secure an education, the Government should pay maintenance and tuition at the rate of $150 per annum for such person.

It will be perceived, therefore, that the only obligation which the Government took upon itself in this regard was to pay $150 a year to this institution for each deaf and dumb and blind person properly belonging to the District of Columbia, in indigent circumstances and unable to command means to secure an education. No obligation was assumed to maintain or educate any deaf and dumb or blind person not properly belonging to the District, and who was not in indigent circumstances, and who could command the means to secure an education. The permission granted to the institution to receive and instruct deaf and dumb and blind persons from any of the States and Territories on such terms as might be agreed upon between the parties and the institution did not imply any obligation on the part of the Government to maintain and educate such persons.

This institution having been incorporated for the purposes and upon the terms set out in the act, procured the passage of an amendatory act, approved May 29, 1858. (Act of May 29, United States Statutes-at-Large, vol. 11, p. 283.)

This last-mentioned act provides that in addition to the liberal provision for the maintenance and tuition of pupils in that institution the sum of $3,000 per annum, payable quarterly, should be allowed for five years for the payment of salaries and incidental expenses. Three thousand dollars additional were allowed for the then fiscal year, and it will be seen that the Government further took upon itself to authorize the education of all deaf and dumb and blind children of all persons in the military and naval service, while such persons were actually in such service, to receive instruction in said institution upon the same terms as deaf, dumb, and blind children belonging to the District of Columbia.

By an act approved June 13, 1860, the "Washington Manual Labor School and Male Orphan Asylum Society of the District of Columbia" was dissolved, and the transfer of its effects to the "Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind" authorized.

The next act upon this subject was passed March 16, 1862, and it was therein provided that the sum of $4,400 per annum should be allowed for the payment of salaries and incidental expenses, which was $1,400 more a year than was allowed by the act of May 29, 1858. By the second section of this act the sum of $9,000 was appropriated for the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of two additions to the buildings of said institution. (See act, vol. 12 Laws, page 369.)

In the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, approved March 3, 1863, (12 Laws, page 747,) $4,400 were appropriated for salaries and incidental expenses of said institution; $1,470 for supplying the institution buildings with gas-making apparatus and fixtures, and $2,530 for supplying the institution buildings with heating apparatus.

By the act approved April 8, 1864, the said institution was authorized to confer degrees, grant diplomas, &c. After the passage of this act the institution undertook to assume to itself the more sounding title of "The National Deaf Mute College," by which title the advance department was thereafter to be known and designated, but the Secretary of the Interior, in his report of December 4, 1865, doubted the right of the institution to change its name without the consent of Congress, and the matter seemed to be then dropped.

In proceeding further with this matter, it appears by reference to the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, approved July 2, 1864, (13 Laws, p. 349,) $7,500 were appropriated for salaries and incidental expenses, and for the salary of an additional teacher, and for the construction of a new sewer, and for the construction and repair of fences; and $26,000 were also appropriated to purchase a tract of improved land, not for the Government, but for this institution, under the pretext of enabling male pupils to be instructed in horticulture and agriculture, and to furnish sites for mechanic shops and other necessary buildings. And there was further appropriated by this act $3,200 for the purpose of bringing the Potomac water into the institution.

Notwithstanding the very large and liberal appropriations to this institution for the maintenance and tuition of the deaf and dumb and the blind properly belonging to the District of Columbia, it would seem that the institution proposed to relieve itself of all obligation of maintaining and educating the blind, and to cast upon the Government the additional expense of instructing and educating them elsewhere. An act was therefore procured to be passed, approved February 23, 1865, (12 Laws, p. 439,) which provided for changing the name of the institution, so that its corporate name and style was thereafter to be known as "The Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb." The Secretary of the Interior was authorized by this act to cause all the indigent blind children who had been or would be entitled to instruction in the said institution to be instructed in some institution for the education of the blind in Maryland, or some other State, at a cost not greater for each pupil than is or might be for the time being paid by such State, and the amount was to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Being divested of the obligation to maintain and instruct the blind, and having imposed upon the Government such obligation to instruct them in Maryland or some other State at the public expense, it would naturally be supposed that the amount thereafter to be asked for, for salaries and incidental expenses, would be lessened; but instead of that it is found by reference to the deficiency bill, approved April 7, 1866, (14 Laws, p. 21,) there was appropriated for salaries and incidental expenses, including $500 for books and illustrative apparatus, $12,500; for the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of the two extensions to the buildings, to provide enlarged accommodations for the male department under the former pretense of furnishing rooms for the instruction of the pupils in useful labor, there was appropriated $39,445 87; and a further sum of $3,500 was appropriated to inclose, grade, and improve the grounds of the institution. The amounts last above mentioned were in a deficiency bill, but in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for the year ending June 30, 1867, approved July 2, 1866, (14 Laws, p. 317,) there was appropriated as follows: "For the Columbia Institution: for the support of the institution, including $500 for books and illustrative apparatus, $20,700; for the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of two extensions to the buildings, to provide enlarged accommodations for the male and female pupils and the resident officers of the institution, $32,240; for the erection of a brick barn, carriage-house, cow-house, shop, gas-house, and ice-house, $14,500; for the improvement and inclosure of the grounds of the institution, including under-drainage and sewerage, $4,500."

We now come to 1867, and we find by reference to the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses, approved March 2, 1867, (14 Laws, p. 464,) that instead of the last appropriation of $12,500 for salaries and incidental expenses, there was an appropriation of $25,000 for the support of the institution, including $1,000 for books and illustrative apparatus. And it was provided "that deaf mutes, not exceeding ten in number, residing in the several States and Territories of the United States, applying for admission to the collegiate department of the institution, shall be received on the same terms and conditions as those prescribed by law for residents of the District of Columbia, at the discretion of the president of the institution;" that is to say, that the Government, by this proviso, assumes to maintain and instruct not exceeding ten deaf mutes residing in the several States and Territories, who are in indigent circumstances and cannot command the means to secure an education, and to pay therefor at the rate of $150 per annum for each deaf mute; and here it is to be observed the constant, extraordinary, and progressive demands of this institution upon the Government, for this same act appropriates $21,675 for the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of additions to the buildings of the institution, to provide and enlarge the accommodations for the male and female pupils and the resident officers of the institution. There is a further appropriation in this act of $7,500 for the improvement and enlargement of the grounds of the institution, and $5,000 for an increased supply of Potomac water.

To sum up in regard to the amounts appropriated by Congress for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind, and the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, the following official statement from the Secretary of the Interior is herewith submitted:

Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, Washington, D. C.—Private institution not owned by the Government, nor the title to the property vested in the United States. Nor has the United States any control or supervision whatever over this institution.

Expended in carrying out the purposes for which appropriated under supervision of the board of directors.

For the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of additions to the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.....	$168,280 87
For supplying the building with gas-making apparatus and fixtures.....	1,470 00
For the erection of a brick barn, carriage house, cow house, &c.....	14,500 00
For furnishing an increased supply of Potomac water, &c.....	5,000 00
For supplying the institution with steam heating apparatus, &c.....	2,250 00
For the enlargement of the grounds.....	7,280 00
For inclosure, grading, and improvement of grounds.....	8,000 00
For salaries and incidental expenses for instruction of deaf and dumb.....	89,500 00
For maintenance and tuition of pupils.....	29,359 51
	$325,560 38

After the appropriation of so large a sum of money as $325,560 38 for the institution, and in view of the fact that we are now asked to appropriate a further sum of $51,000 for the same purpose, which, if appropriated, would make a total of $376,560 38, it would seem to be the duty of Congress to inquire into the obligations and the rights of the Government in the premises. The original obligation on the part of the Government, which was a very just and proper one to be assumed, was to pay a certain sum per annum to the institution it had incorporated for the maintenance and tuition of such deaf and dumb and blind persons, properly belonging to the District, who were in indigent circumstances and could not command the means to secure an education. This was all that seemed to be expected of the Government; and if Congress were to undertake to maintain and educate the deaf and dumb and blind of the District, who were in indigent circumstances, it would seem to have been proper to maintain and educate them at an institution in the District, if the same could be done on the same terms as at an equally good institution outside of the District. The provision of law by which the institution was authorized to receive and instruct deaf and dumb and blind persons from any of the States and Territories on terms to be agreed upon, implied that it was to be an institution that should be self-supporting—an institution which, with the contributions made by benevolent persons, would support itself. In compliance with the law, annual reports have been made by the institution to the Secretary of the Interior. The first report was made for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1855, by which it appears that the institution received from the United States, for the maintenance and tuition of beneficiaries, by the act of February 16, 1857, $2,125 25; and salaries and incidental expenses by the act of May 29, 1858, $3,000; and other amounts by subscription and otherwise, making a total, up to that time, of $6,513 25; and the expenditures that are given are a little less than that amount. The number of deaf and dumb pupils was twelve, and the number of blind pupils six, and all from the District of Columbia with one exception; but it is not stated in this report how many of these were beneficiaries of the Government, and how many were pay pupils. According to the regulations of the institution affixed to the report, pay pupils were to pay $150 per annum.

The second report of the institution, for the year ending June 30, 1859, shows that $5,451 96 were received from the Government and $1,158 91 from other sources, and the expenditures were very nearly the same sum. There were this year fourteen deaf and dumb pupils and seven blind pupils, all but three being from the District of Columbia; and it is not shown by this report how many were Government beneficiaries and how many were pay pupils.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1860, shows receipts $6,509 26; the amount received from Government being $5,759 26, and $750 from other sources, and the expenses were about the same. The number of deaf and dumb pupils was twenty-four, the number of blind pupils was six.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1861, shows the receipts from the Government $6,425 91, and $1,700 25 from other sources, making in all $8,126 19, and the expenditures very near the same amount. Number of deaf and dumb pupils, twenty-four; and number of blind pupils, six.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1862, shows the same number of deaf and dumb and the same number of blind pupils, and that the institution received that year from the Government and other sources the sum of $8,863 49, and the expenditures varying a very little from this amount.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1863, shows there were forty-nine deaf and dumb pupils and five blind pupils, but only nineteen of these were from the District of Columbia. The amount received from Government and other sources was $1,050 49, the expenditures the same.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1864, shows there were fifty-six deaf and dumb and six blind pupils, but twenty-four of whom were from the District of Columbia. The receipts of the institution this year were $13,085 16, and expenditures, $13,475 67.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1865, shows eighty-five deaf and dumb pupils and nine blind pupils, thirty-five of whom were from the District of Columbia and belonging to the Army. The receipts were $21,732 24, of which sum $11,775 was received from the Treasury of the United States; the expenditures, $22,602 30.

The report for the year ending June 30, 1866, shows one hundred and seven deaf and dumb pupils and no blind pupils, the institution having procured them to be detached from it. Only twenty-two of this number of one hundred and seven belonged to the District of Columbia and to the Army. The receipts were $26,388 44—$15,937 50 being from the Treasury of the United States. It will be perceived that, for the year ending June 30, 1865, with thirty-five pupils from the District of Columbia, there was received from the Government $11,775. In the year ending June 30, 1866, with twenty-two pupils from the District of Columbia and the Army, there was received from the Treasury $15,937 50. It will thus be seen, in the year ending June 30, 1865, that, instead of the $150 per annum, which the Government obligated itself to pay for each pupil, it actually paid $336 43 for that year; and for the year ending June 30, 1866, instead of the $150 per annum, it actually paid $724 43 per annum for each pupil.

From the last report, which is the tenth annual report, for the year ending June 30, 1867, there were one hundred and seventeen deaf and dumb pupils, and twenty-five from the District of Columbia and from the Army. The receipts of the institution were $33,661 07; the expenses were the same amount.

It appears from an examination of the reports that there were at this institution deaf, dumb, and blind pupils from the District of Columbia and from the Army, as follows:

Equal to about fifty-six pupils in all, as it is estimated each pupil is at the institution for four years.

It has been shown herein from official sources that the sums appropriated by Congress for this institution up to the present time, for salaries and incidental expenses, buildings and grounds, for supply of Potomac water, for carriage-house, barn, cow-house, shop, ice-house, gas-house, and for inclosing, grading, and improving the grounds, amount to $325,860 38; this is the sum which it has cost the Government to maintain and educate two hundred and twenty-six pupils; or, in other words, each pupil has cost the Government the sum of $7,202 10. The statement is put in this way for the reason that the Government has no interest whatever in the property of this institution, and has no control or direction in its management. The institution is under no obligation to the Government whatever after all of these appropriations, except to maintain and educate the indigent deaf and dumb of the District and of the Army who cannot command means to secure an education for the sum of $150 per annum. It seems extraordinary that Congress should have gone on from year to year making these large appropriations for this institution without reserving to itself any right or control whatever. The Government has had no voice whatever in the expenditure of the money appropriated. It appears that the only bond ever given by any one for the faithful disbursement of the money appropriated by the Government to this institution was a bond for $3,000, given by the superintendent in March, 1862, and the accounts of the disbursement in the various reports are not satisfactory. A statement of the expenditures in detail is hereto annexed. Although the Government appropriates for salaries and incidental expenses, and for the support of the institution, it has no voice in fixing the number of teachers and the rate of salary; and the report ending June 30, 1867, shows that the large sum of $14,732 56 was expended for salaries and wages.

The following statement from the Register's office of the Treasury Department, dated March 31, 1868, is interesting as showing the increase of the expenses of the institution from year to year for salaries and incidental expenses:

As will be observed, Government has had but little to do with the institution except to appropriate its money and to require reports to be made to the Interior Department. The Interior Department has, in its annual reports to the President, made reference to this institution for the information of Congress, and it has sometimes attempted to check the assumptions of the institution. Hon. O. H. Browning, Secretary of the Interior, in his annual report of November 19, 1866, speaking of this institution, says:

"This is not a Government institution. The United States have no control over it, nor are they vested with the title to the property purchased with their munificent benefactions. It had its origin in the generous purpose of public spirited individuals to secure a home and the means of intellectual and moral training for the indigent children of this District who were blind or deaf and dumb."

The Secretary further says:

"The directors submit the following estimate for the next year: $25,000 for the support of the institution, and $62,175 for buildings and improvements, making an aggregate of $87,175, being $15,235 in excess of the last appropriations for the same objects."

"The expediency of granting so large a sum is submitted for consideration. If it is the intention of Congress to pay the salaries of the officers and teachers, and to provide merely for those who are entitled under existing laws to the privileges of the institution at the charge of the Government the sum of $25,000 is fully adequate to the purpose. But it has been suggested that the advanced department should be maintained on such a footing that the deaf mutes of the several States on completing their preliminary studies may enjoy, free of charge, the privileges of a course of instruction equal to that pursued in the best American colleges. Such persons, if in indigent circumstances, have been heretofore maintained and educated at the State establishments at the expense of the State, to which they belong. The directors conceive that an institution which offers advantages which cannot be afforded in the local institutions should be as free to the citizens of the States as to those of the Federal District and to children of the Army and Navy. There is in my judgment an obvious distinction between the exercise by Congress of its conceded power to legislate for the local wants of this District and for the Army and Navy, and its assumption of a power which has wisely and to the fullest extent been conferred upon the States. No necessity whatever exists for the erection of additional buildings to meet present wants."

"The whole subject is respectfully presented for consideration, in connection with the estimates furnished by the board. In my opinion no further sums should be advanced until the charter of the institution be so modified as to secure to the Government an efficient control in its management, and a proper accountability in the application and disbursements of the funds appropriated."

The Secretary of the Interior, in his last report of November 13, 1867, refers still further to this "Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb." After speaking of the character of the institution, he says:

"I am, nevertheless, of the opinion that when Congress shall have liberally provided for the indigent deaf mutes who reside in this District, or are the children of persons actually in the military or naval service, it will have fully discharged its duty, if not exhausted its constitutional power over the subject. The present buildings are more than sufficient for the ample accommodation of the Government pupils. The board of directors, in addition to the school for the primary branches, desires to maintain a preparatory department, where the deaf mutes of the several States may be prepared for admission into the college proper. The studies in the latter will embrace as thorough and comprehensive a course of instruction in ancient and modern languages, and in the literary and scientific branches, as is furnished in the best American colleges. The indigent deaf mutes of the several States who are competent to profit by these advantages are to be maintained and instructed at the expense of the General Government. It certainly was not the original intention of Congress to provide for the gratuitous instruction of these afflicted persons. If unable to incur the expenses of an education they should appear to individual munificence, or to that of the States in which they reside. The support of paupers is an appropriate subject of State legislation, and has never been regarded as falling within the province or constituting a duty of the General Government. The arguments advanced to justify Congress in furnishing educational privileges for the indigent deaf mutes of a State would equally require a similar provision for the blind or lame or those who, without natural infirmities, desire collegiate instruction, but are excluded by their poverty from obtaining it.

"Should these views be regarded as erroneous, however, and Congress deem it their constitutional duty to establish and maintain a national deaf-mute college, the United States should control it, and be vested with a title to the grounds purchased by their means for its uses. The erection of buildings required for the accommodation of all the students who may desire instruction and maintenance free of charge will require a very large outlay independent of the amount which, from time to time, must be advanced to meet the annual expenses of the institution."

Assuming, what is readily conceded, that it may be the duty of the Government to educate the deaf and dumb of the District in poor and indigent circumstances, and unable to command means to secure an education, we find by the last report of the institution there are twenty-five deaf and dumb pupils belonging to the District and the Army. The question arises, what would it cost the Government per year to educate each pupil at the best institutions in the country?

The following is a statement of the annual expense per pupil in the following deaf and dumb asylums for the year 1857:

Asylums.	Annual expense per pupil.	Annual charge to paying pupils.
American asylum, Hartford.....	$166	$100
New York institution for deaf and dumb, New York.....	138	150
Pennsylvania institution for deaf and dumb, Philadelphia.....	113	140
Ohio institution for deaf and dumb, Columbus.....	135	100
Kentucky institution for deaf and dumb, Danville.....	123	105
Indiana institution for deaf and dumb, Indianapolis.....	170	100
Illinois institution for deaf and dumb, Jacksonville.....	190	100
Michigan institution for deaf and dumb, Flint.....	123	100

There are no later figures so complete as these, but the State documents in three States show the following expense per pupil for 1856:

Pennsylvania.....	$240
New York.....	225
Ohio.....	220

In Great Britain the annual expense per pupil (in twenty deaf and dumb asylums) varies from eighteen to thirty pounds per annum.

It will be seen by this statement that the highest cost per pupil in any institution for 1856 was $240 per annum, in the Pennsylvania asylum. The expense therefore for educating the twenty-five pupils from the District at the Columbia Institution would have been $6,000, as against the one item of $25,000 for salaries and incidental expenses and the other appropriations, taken in connection with the interest upon the money which the Government has appropriated to this institution.

In reply to suggestions which may be made touching the charitable contributions made by private individuals for the benefit of this institution, the following statement is given:

They also received for fourteen scholarships, at $150 each, the sum of $2,100.

Hon. Amos Kendall subscribed $200 a year for five years. This amount he paid for two years, making cash..... $400
And on the third year he made a donation of real estate, which he estimates at..... 10,600

The whole amount of contributions from private sources, including real estate at a valuation of.....$10,600
And cash..... 3,557
And including scholarships subscribed..... 2,100

Total.....$16,257

It will be seen by this statement that the whole amount of actual money subscriptions was $3,557, exclusive of money received for fourteen scholarships, at $150 each, making the sum of $2,100; to this should be added $200 a year, paid by Amos Kendall for two years. The contribution of real estate, valued at $10,600, might be taken in connection with the subsequent purchases of real estate of Mr. Kendall for the institution, amounting to $25,000; giving credit for the full amount of contributions, including the estimated value of real estate, they only amount to $16,257, against $325,860 38, amount appropriated by the Government.

The following letter shows the amount of land purchased for the institution, of whom purchased, and the amount paid:

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.
WASHINGTON, May 5, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I received last evening a note from Major Stevens, requesting me to furnish you a statement of the several purchases of land made for this institution, with money appropriated by Congress.

On the 13th of July, 1864, a lot of ground containing two acres, and having upon it a dwelling-house and barn, was purchased of William Stickney, esq., for the sum of $7,500. On the same day a portion of ground, containing twelve acres and having upon it three frame buildings, was purchased of Hon. Amos Kendall for the sum of $18,500.

The payments for these two tracts were made out of an appropriation of $25,000, made on the 2d of July, 1864, with special reference to these purchases, the price having been agreed upon before the appropriation was made.

On the 30th of March, 1867, a piece of ground was purchased of Mrs. Catharine Pearson, which contained about three and a half acres, (one hundred and forty-six thousand nine hundred square feet,) the price agreed upon being $9,000. On this purchase there remains yet to be provided for by Congress $1,600, the appropriation of the 2d of March, 1867, namely $7,500 not being sufficient.

I inclose herewith a plan of our grounds, with marks which will indicate the several purchases above explained.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully and truly, yours,
E. M. GALLAUDET.

Hon. RUFUS P. SPALDING.

8. Appropriation for supplying gas arrangements..... 1,470

9. Appropriation for supplying steam heating apparatus..... 2,250

$325,860 38

It will be seen by the above statement that there have been expended for salaries and incidental expenses $89,500, and for maintenance and tuition of pupils $29,351, making in all $118,851. Taking this amount from the total amount appropriated, $325,860 38, leaves $207,009 38, which the Government has invested in buildings, grounds, improvements, &c., which is about two thirds of the whole amount, and for which it has nothing to show, and over which it has no control, the institution being, as has been shown, one of a private character. The question now is, what shall be done under the circumstances? It is evident that Congress would not be justified in making any further appropriations for this institution, unless it shall become a Government institution, with the property all transferred to the Government, and the institution to be managed and controlled by the Government. Even that is not now recommended, as it would devolve upon the Government a vastly greater expense than it would cost to educate all the deaf and dumb of the District at the very best institutions in the country.

Congress has made donations to other charitable institutions in the District, and is now called upon to make still further appropriations for them, and without reserving to itself any right of control over the expenditures. As the amounts appropriated and the amounts asked for are so large, it is evident that before any further appropriation shall be made the whole subject should be further considered and a special law passed, establishing a "commission of charities" for the District, to regulate and control all the charitable institutions of the District, sustained by the beneficence of the Government.

E. B. WASHBURN.

We agree to the conclusions of the above report, because we are opposed to the collegiate course introduced into the institution, and also to any appropriation of Congress to a corporation that is not wholly under the control of the Government.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
F. C. BEAMAN.

I concur in the foregoing report so far as it recommends, as a condition of further appropriation to the institution, its transfer to the full ownership and control of the General Government.

J. G. BLAINE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have asked the Doorkeeper to place a copy of this report upon the table of each member. I call the attention of gentlemen to the fourth page of this printed report, where they will see stated the amounts we have appropriated for this institution, in which, as I have already said, the Government has no interest whatever. The statement is as follows:

For the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of additions to the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.....	$168,280 87
For supplying the building with gas-making apparatus and fixtures.....	1,470 00
For the erection of a brick barn, carriage house, cow-house, &c.....	14,500 00
For furnishing an increased supply of Potomac water, &c.....	5,000 00
For supplying the institution with steam heating apparatus, &c.....	2,250 00
For the enlargement of the grounds.....	7,200 00
For inclosure, grading, and improvement of grounds.....	8,000 00
For salaries and incidental expenses for instruction of deaf and dumb.....	89,500 00
For maintenance and tuition of pupils.....	29,351 51
Total.....	$325,560 38

All this has been appropriated for the purpose of educating twenty-five pupils a year in this institution. And a little further on in the report gentlemen will find a statement showing how this thing has grown up; how we have gone on year after year increasing these appropriations. There have been expended for salaries and incidental expenses as follows:

For the year ending June 30—
1858.....	$1,789 40
1859.....	3,460 60
1860.....	3,000 00
1861.....	3,000 00
1862.....	3,750 00
1863.....	4,400 00
1864.....	4,400 00
1865.....	7,500 00
1866.....	12,500 00
1867.....	20,334 14
1868.....	24,873 34

We appropriate this sum in gross. Yet we have no control over the institution. We put the whole of this vast amount under the control of the superintendent, who has given only one bond, which is in the sum of $3,000. Yet we appropriate thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands to build up this establishment, and allow the money to be disposed of as the superintendent sees fit, without any control whatever on the part of the Government.

Now, sir, I understand very well how this institution started. It was at first merely a private institution. But afterward those interested in it came in here and said that many benevolent individuals had made large subscriptions for the benefit of the institution; hence we were asked to make appropriations for it; and we did so. Now, sir, the aggregate of subscriptions from private sources was $16,257. How was that amount contributed? It will be seen by the statement contained in the report of the minority that the actual amount of cash subscribed was $3,557, exclusive of the money received from scholarships, which, at the rate of $150 each amounts to $2,100. To this is to be added $200 a year paid by Mr. Amos Kendall. Then there was a contribution also by Mr. Kendall of real estate valued at $10,600. The Government afterward purchased additional real estate of Mr. Kendall, paying him $26,000, and giving him credit for the full amount of contributions, including the real estate at its estimated value. The total amount of private contributions from all sources is $16,257, against $325,000 appropriated by the Government. The appropriations proposed to be made in this bill will make the aggregate $376,000, which we shall have given to a private institution in this District.

And what do we get for this amount taken from the pockets of our constituents and expended on a private corporation here in the District of Columbia? By reference to the fifth page of the report it will be seen that the number of pupils maintained and educated in this institution since 1858 has been as follows:

1858.....	17 pupils
1859.....	18 "
1860.....	20 "
1861.....	25 "
1862.....	24 "
1863.....	16 "
1864.....	24 "
1865.....	35 "
1866.....	22 "
1867.....	25 "

Total..... 226 "

Mr. WELKER. Can the gentleman state how many of those pupils were actually residents of the District of Columbia?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot state the exact number; but the gentleman will find on examination that the education of these pupils have cost us $7,200 apiece.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would like to ask the gentleman, in this connection, whether these are all indigent pupils?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They are pupils of this institution, I presume, in accordance with the terms of the law. I know nothing to the contrary.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is any difference noted in the report between those who are indigent and those who are able to pay for their own support?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think there is not. The law is very loose on that subject.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is it not to be presumed that a portion of these pupils are abundantly able to pay the expenses of their support and education?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It may be so; but I am assuming, for the purposes of the present argument, that they are all indigent; and I say there can be nothing to justify us in voting away this vast sum of money to build up a private corporation here in the District of Columbia. I say it is a private corporation. We have no control over it; we have no part in its direction. Will any gentleman on this floor say that the education of these pupils from the various parts of the country is a proper subject for these expenditures by Congress?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Are not the accounts of this institution annually settled at the Interior Department, and have they not been ever since the institution came under the patronage of the Government?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The accounts have all to go to the Treasury Department; but there is no control there over those accounts. I have taken pains to obtain from that Department a copy of the accounts, that the House might see where the money of their constituents is going. Now, sir, here it is. I said there was no control over the superintendent, and I have the estimate here. It seems he paid $4,500 for an architect. There are many other items of that kind. There is a large amount for traveling expenses, for express hire, for garden seeds, for kitchen utensils, for furniture, for farming tools, for lounges, for carts, for rockaways, and so on. Every sort of thing is purchased by the superintendent out of the appropriations we make.

Mr. LOGAN. Are the appropriations the only things by which he is controlled?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If my colleague will look he will see that the law of 1857 has been amended by subsequent laws which are set out in the first part of the report.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there any authority other than that for any appropriation of Congress?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If my colleague will look he will see all the statutes set out, and they will show him the full authority.

Mr. LOGAN. I have examined that. I do not know whether there is any authority other than the sums appropriated from year to year for these purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Nothing but mere appropriations, and they are unlimited; and, sir, it shows us how the people of the District of Columbia can come here and button-hole members and get appropriations to these vast amounts for themselves. This minority report was concurred in by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BEAMAN,] not now here, and the distinguished gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] The report says:

"Taking this amount from the total amount appropriated, $325,860 38, leaves $207,009 38, which the Government has invested in buildings, grounds, improvements, &c., which is about two thirds of the whole amount, and for which it has nothing to show, and over which it has no control, the institution being, as has been shown, one of a private character. The question now is, What shall be done under the circumstances? It is evident that Congress would not be justified in making any further appropriations for this institution, unless it shall become a Government institution, with the property all transferred to the Government, and the institution to be managed and controlled by the Government. Even that is not now recommended, as it would devolve upon the Government a vastly greater expense than it would cost to educate all the deaf and dumb of the District at the very best institution in the country."

Here is a great abuse. Year after year we have been making these appropriations for putting up these buildings and saddling these great expenses upon the Government. Now, the question is, What shall we do? I propose, and I think the minority of the committee agree with me, that we shall make no further appropriation for this institution. It is our duty to take care of these deaf mutes, but let us do it by adopting the amendment I have proposed, and make an appropriation of a sufficient sum to educate them in one of the best institutions of the country. I took the pains to ascertain the cost of educating these pupils in institutions in the States, and what do you suppose it is as compared with what we are paying here? In Pennsylvania it is $240, in New York $223, and in Ohio $220. I say, therefore, let us appropriate the money and let these pupils be educated in some of these institutions, and instead of saddling our constituents with $50,000 a year to keep up this man's establishment, we can do all that humanity and duty require of us for less than $7,000 a year.

Now, sir, I think every member upon this floor, when he comes to look upon the contributions we have made for charitable institutions in this District—and I would make all we are called upon to make as humane men—will agree that we should have some control of these charities. I wish, therefore, to call attention to the amendment I have pending, and to see whether every member of the House will not agree with me that it should pass, my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] among the number. If we are to appropriate so much for the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, for the Providence Hospital, and so much for the Lying-in-Hospital in the District, then I say we should have some control over the expenditure of the money. I trust my friend will agree to my amendment which provides in the first section that the Secretary of the Interior, the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Surgeon General of the Army, the chief of the Bureau of Medical Surgery of the Navy, and the chief engineer of the Army, shall constitute a commission, which shall be known and designated as the "Commission of Charities for the District of Columbia."

The second section provides that the said commission shall organize immediately upon the passage of this act, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be the president thereof, and he shall designate as secretary of said commission a clerk of his Department who is of the fourth class, and who shall keep a record of all the proceedings and transactions of the said commission.

Now, let me ask what objection any gentleman can have to this provision of my amendment?

That the said commission shall have the full control and direction of all the appropriations made by Congress to the charitable institutions of the said District of Columbia, and of all such appropriations as may be made for the purposes of charity in the said District, and shall have the power of visitation and examination of all the institutions in the said District to the support of which appropriations shall be made by Congress. No money shall be drawn from the appropriations made to the charitable institutions of the District or for the purposes of charity in said District, except upon the requisition of the president of the commission, made upon an order of the commission, duly entered in the journal of their proceedings, and all the accounts of the said commission shall be audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury. And it is hereby provided that the provisions of this act shall not be deemed to include the Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

Then I further propose by my amendment:

That no money shall be expended for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, and for the Providence Hospital, until the title to the property, real and personal, of such institutions shall be transferred to the United States by conveyances, certified as being valid by the Attorney General of the United States, and conveying all the right, title, and interest of the said institutions in the property conveyed.

Now, I ask gentlemen, is it right for us to go on constructing these buildings upon property which does not belong to the United States but to private parties? If we are to make these large donations is it not just and proper, ay, imperatively demanded by every consideration of public justice, that this Government should have the title to the property.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to ask the gentleman whether he would not be content with one half the total amount paid by Congress?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Congress is paying all the money and constructing all the buildings, and I insist that this Government should have the title. At any rate I will not consent to put up buildings on land belonging to individuals unless we shall have some control over them. Now, I propose further in my amendment:

That it shall be the duty of the said commission to make a full report to Congress, at the December session of each year, of all its transactions and of all the expenditures made under its direction, together with a statement of the condition of the charitable institutions of the District for which appropriation shall have been previously made and which shall have been expended under its direction.

I ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] if he will not agree to that, so that we may have some control over these institutions. Then, if the House will pass my other amendment, and appropriate enough money to educate every one of these pupils in one of the best asylums of the country, we shall then have cured a great abuse and accomplished a great work. I call attention to the fact that my amendment has nothing to do whatever with the amounts we have appropriated, but it provides that when appropriations are thus made we shall have somebody to overlook and control the expenditure. Is it right that you should put $300,000 into the hands of a man here to disburse with only a bond of $3,000 a year. I trust the House will adopt both my amendments, so that we may have some control over this matter.

Now, look at what the bill before us proposes. First, an appropriation of $3,000. Then for continuing work upon the building in accordance with plans heretofore submitted—how much? Forty-eight thousand dollars. All for this private building. Then there is a provision—

That no part of the real or personal property shall be devoted to any other purpose than the education of the deaf and dumb, nor shall any portion of the real estate be aliened, sold, or conveyed except under the authority of a special act of Congress.

That is not what we want. If we are building upon this real estate we want the title to the property; we want control of the institution. All the private subscriptions to that land amount to only $16,000, as I have shown, and yet we have paid out $325,000, and now we are asked to pay $51,000 more.

Mr. DELANO. I understand there is another appropriation of $80,000 for construction and improvement.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is only carrying out what we have commenced and what has been going on from year to year. If we pass this appropriation this year we will have another call for a larger amount next year, and there will be no end to the demands made upon us. Hence I say here to-day when we have this matter before us, while we do justice to those pupils whom we are bound to educate let us do justice to the people by preventing this squandering of their money in the way in which it has been done, in my judgment, heretofore.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will bear with the learned gentleman from Illinois, for he means well in his course on this matter as he does in all his opposition to appropriations by Congress. But he is so morbidly constituted that he cannot make any distinction between an appropriation necessary and requisite to be made and one which is improper. He does not know, he does not realize, that while—"The primal duties shine aloft, like stars;

The charities that soothe and heal and bless
Are scattered at the feet of man like flowers."

My friend has made it during this whole session of Congress his principal aim to destroy this appropriation bill which is intended for the benefit of the deaf and dumb, the poor mutes to the number of about a hundred assembled here in the District from all the States and Territories of this great Union, and he says that we must cut it down because it is a private institution, a private corporation. Mr. Speaker, I deny that it is a private institution. I acknowledge that it had its origin in the day of small things. It had its origin in private munificence, but it could not go upon the donations of private charity for six short months. Congress was obliged at once to interpose, and when it authorized these few charitable individuals in the District of Columbia to collect these poor, forsaken, stricken objects of humanity together and attempt to make their lot more endurable, Congress agreed to pay $150 for every deaf mute collected from the District of Columbia, and also the sons of men in the Army and Navy. They afterward, and within the first six months, found that this provision would not answer, and they passed an act of Congress amendatory of the act of incorporation, assigning for five consecutive years, $3,000 a year out of the national Treasury to pay the expenses of the officers and students of the institution. That was paid for some three years, and then it was found that this sum was not sufficient. Then it was that Congress passed another act. And here I would say to the gentleman from Illinois, that he must not complain of the founders of this institution, not of its trustees, not of its officers and agents; but he must complain of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the various Presidents who have approved of these acts. In 1862 an act was passed, and I have it here, amendatory of the first act incorporating the deaf and dumb institution and essentially making it an institution of the United States; and for the truth of this, after having read it, I will appeal to the good judgment of every man within the sound of my voice. The act is as follows:

An act to amend an act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $4,400 per annum, payable quarterly, shall be allowed for the payment of salaries and incidental expenses of said institution, and the sum of $1,400 is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $9,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the erection, furnishing, and fitting up of two additions to the building of said association.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all receipts and disbursements under this act shall be reported to the Secretary of the Interior, as required in the sixth section of the act of which this is an amendment.

The very first act required that reports should be made annually to the Secretary of the Interior. The agent for the expenditure of the money appropriated from time to time by Congress is required to give bonds to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How much?

Mr. SPALDING. I do not care. They can be given in any amount the Secretary sees fit to require. I am proud to say that there is no complaint that one half dollar has ever been lost through the misconduct of the principal of this institution. No man dares impute to him any want of faith or honesty. Nay, the Secretary of the Interior in his famous report, of which my friend avails himself, says that if this be not a private institution, and if it be such an one as Congress sees fit to foster and encourage, no more faithful officers can be found in the United States of America than those who have been intrusted with the care of this institution for the deaf and dumb of the District of Columbia.

Now, further, Congress for a series of years appropriated this sum of $4,400 under this permanent law, and then found it necessary to appropriate a still larger sum. They also added to the capacity of the institution by providing that it should have power to confer collegiate degrees; and a branch of the institution was established for the instruction of teachers for deaf and dumb institutions in other States. Now, it is of this that the gentleman mainly complains.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We want to get at the truth.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. He has had the advantage from the very first of the session up to this time; and I have given him two thirds of my time to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not want to hear the question; I do not consent to be interrupted for any such purpose.

There are now in this institution more than one hundred deaf mutes, collected from the different States of the Union, and there are thirty-five pupils in the collegiate department of the institution. I have here somewhere a statement showing the different States from which they come.

And let me say here that there are young men in this collegiate department, deaf mutes, who would put to shame the most astute and learned man to be found here. I would not be ashamed of them if put in competition with any man in the Senate or in the House; these poor deaf mutes, some of whom have been instructed in this institution for only twelve months in the higher branches of philosophy and mathematics. I have seen the experiment tried, and I know it to be so. There are thirty-five of these pupils from the different States in the collegiate department of this institution, as follows: from Maine, two; New Hampshire, one; Massachusetts, one; Connecticut, two; Vermont, one; New York, two; Pennsylvania, six; Maryland, two; Ohio, two; Michigan, four; Illinois, one; Wisconsin, four; Iowa, two; District of Columbia, two; and from England, one. There are about seventy in the other branches, the primary department of the institution. Some of them, perhaps thirty of them, are those contemplated by the first law enacted upon this subject; deaf and dumb children of people here in the District of Columbia, and deaf and dumb children of officers in the Army and the Navy. In addition to those there are deaf mutes from Maryland who actually pay for their board in the institution.

But I must be concise. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] says the expenses of this institution amount to over seven thousand dollars each for all the boys and girls that the Government is bound to take care of in this institution. Now, will the House believe me when I tell them that in order to make out his candid argument my friend from Illinois has charged over to these deaf and dumb pupils all the expenses of the institution? He takes into account all the expenses of the land, the buildings, apparatus, and everything in connection with the institution for all time past and all time to come; he charges it all over, and divides the round sum by the number of pupils the Government has to take care of.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is not that fair?

Mr. SPALDING. Will any man say that it is fair? Suppose the gentleman charged all this over to the first five or ten pupils that entered the institution, how much would it cost them?

There was laid awhile ago on the table of each member, a statement showing the whole amount of appropriations to this institution. For all purposes there have been appropriated the sum of $321,824.52 during the past eleven years. Of that sum there have been appropriated for the current expenses of the institution $104,401.50; leaving a balance expended for grounds, buildings, furniture, and fixtures of $217,383. That property is all visible, is all tangible here. It is estimated that that very property is worth at this time at least $270,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Whose is it?

Mr. SPALDING. There again is a specimen of the gentleman's fairness. He came in here with the report of a minority committee. There were in fact but three members of the committee who objected to this appropriation. One of them, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] signs the report with the express reservation that he does not object to the appropriation provided the property be put under the control of Congress. Now, sir, this bill is specially framed for the very purpose of obviating the gentleman's objections, and he knows it. It was drawn up for that very purpose by a majority of the committee; and by that majority I was authorized to report it and advocate its passage as obviating those objections. The bill by its terms appropriates $3,000 which has been called for by the Secretary of the Interior as a deficiency, to pay for the increased expense of maintaining nine or ten pupils from the different States who were admitted into the institution under the law of March 2, 1867. That amount is due, as every one admits. The institution has now one large building completed; and there is a central building which has been carried up one story or one story and a half; but it is going to decay for the want of this appropriation. By the bill we propose to appropriate $48,000 for completing that building, so that it may furnish accommodations for the poor youth for whose benefit the institution is designed. Those are the two items of appropriation contained in the bill, $3,000 for a deficiency which, as the Secretary of the Interior states, is justly due; and $48,000 for the purpose of carrying on to completion the building, the foundation of which has been laid, and which has been carried to the height of a story and a half.

The gentleman from Illinois has complained that Congress has no control over the management of this institution. Now, sir, the directors have passed a resolution unanimously agreeing that Congress may, if it sees fit, provide for choosing three or more directors, to be members of the board, and to have a voice in the management of all the affairs of the institution. In accordance with that proposition, the second section provides—

That, in addition to the directors whose appointment has heretofore been provided for by law, there shall be three other directors appointed in the following manner: One Senator by the President of the Senate, and two Representatives by the Speaker of the House; these directors to hold their offices for the term of a single Congress, and to be eligible to a reappointment.

The third section meets the objection which has been raised that these donations made by Congress may be wasted. It provides—

That no part of the real or personal property now held or hereafter to be acquired by the said institution shall be devoted to any other purpose than the education of the deaf and dumb, nor shall any portion of the real estate be aliened, sold, or conveyed, except under the authority of a special act of Congress.

The board of directors have unanimously accepted these provisions, and they agree to the repeal of the provision contained in the act of incorporation providing for the payment of $150 per annum for the maintenance and tuition of each pupil admitted by order of the Secretary of the Interior. They have not taken this money for several years. They say they are not entitled to it because Congress has given them a gross sum to assist in carrying on the institution. Accordingly the fourth section makes the following provision:

That so much of the act of February 16, 1857, as allows the payment of $150 per annum for the maintenance and tuition of each pupil admitted by order of the Secretary of the Interior, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Now, sir, I have here an exhibit showing what has been the annual expense for the pupils chargeable to the Government, and none others during the eleven years last past. The annual expense ranges from two hundred and nine dollars to five hundred and twenty-one dollars; but the average is $294 for each of those pupils for whom Congress was bound to provide. The greater part of the outlay upon which the gentleman from Illinois has dwelt so long and loudly is for the purchase of the land, the erection of the buildings necessary for the accommodation of the pupils, the introduction of water, gas, &c., and other necessary expenses.

Now, sir, although Congress has by its uniform action since 1857, recognized this institution as eminently worthy of the fostering care of the General Government and has contributed most bountifully toward its support, the objection suggests itself that perhaps under a strict construction of the Constitution we ought not to appropriate money for such a purpose. But I ask where throughout our wide empire will you find any objects of charity which have been so little cared for by the Government of the United States as these stricken people, the deaf and dumb of the United States? We have provided homes for the landless. We have colleges for farmers. We have provided for the insane. We have erected an institution for that purpose across the river where some three or four hundred lunatics are cared for. No one says anything against those appropriations.

The gentleman says that each State will take care of these matters for itself. To the honor of the different States they have provided for them in the most handsome manner, and provided for them in a different spirit from that manifested upon this floor to-day. Be it remembered, however, that no one State has enough deaf mutes of its own to erect a college to educate teachers for them. It is expected this should be done by the Federal Government, by an appropriation from the Federal Congress. Here, now, by a small outlay, we can bless thousands and the nation will never feel any loss. Our constituents will not feel it. It is easy to talk about taking tax from the tax-payers and about the poor man's light; taking the tax off petroleum and thereby enriching a few capitalists; but when you come to the great want of educating these deaf mutes every difficulty is raised. Shall we close the doors of this charitable, humane, hospitable institution, and turn these mutes out upon the world? Shall we deny them bread; shall we deny them food for their intellects, which they crave more than bread for the body? I hope not.

I do not desire to detain the House in this warm weather. I did not want to speak. I ought not to have been required to speak in this behalf. I am only one member of the committee. It is true I belong to the majority of the committee which recommends the passage of this bill; and I do honestly recommend its passage with all the force and earnestness I can muster. If this House sees fit to vote it down the responsibility rests with them, not with me.

An amendment was introduced by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to increase the number of college pupils from ten to twenty-five. This is called for by a great number of States, and the pupils are ready to enter. They are only waiting for the action of Congress to enter. The president of the institution says it will only cost $6,000. The following letter is from one of those pupils:

AURORA, ILLINOIS, May 5, 1868

DEAR SIR: I wish to apply for admission to the collegiate department of the institution under your charge.

I am twenty-two years of age, and have been totally deaf since my twelfth year.

I was at the Hartford school a short term, leaving there in 1862. Since I have been in various printing offices in this State, in all capacities—boy of all work, compositor, foreman, and editor; and during the closing years of the civil war was a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune.

I can lay no claim to "scholarship," as the term is usually received; have no acquaintance with any foreign language, except such phrases as a general and too desultory reader gathers.

I regret that I was not sooner aware of the advantages which you have placed within the reach of myself and fellow-unfortunates; because, at my age, I do not think it will be profitable for me to undertake either the study of the dead languages or the four-year course. As to the former (Latin first) I would be willing to accept your better judgment, and make all the preparation I can in my leisure moments between now and the opening day. I should much prefer to take up German, rather than Latin, as I can turn the former to practical use; also algebra the first year, object-drawing, and such other studies as will be most apt to perfect me as a writer.

Being entirely dependent on my own exertions for support, I ask the aid granted by Congress in such cases.

In case you decide to admit me, an early reply to that effect would greatly oblige me, for the reason mentioned above in speaking of studies.

Mr. John B. Hotchkiss was acquainted with me at Hartford, and, I think, will be pleased to answer any questions you may see fit to ask concerning me.

Yours, most respectfully,

AMOS G. DRAPER.

Mr. E. M. GALLAUDET.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question first recurred on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 31.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 59.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, and Mr. SPALDING were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 50.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That there be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated a sufficient sum of money for the support of the deaf and dumb pupils now in the Columbia Institute for the Deaf and Dumb in some good deaf and dumb asylum in one of the States of the Union for the year ending June 30, 1869, all to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The question being put on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 51, noes 52.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BUTLER of Massachusetts, and KELSEY.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 50.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 68, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Bailey, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Delano, Dockery, Ela, Ferriss, Fields, Haight, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Hotch-

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I rise to make a privileged report from a committee of conference.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask the gentleman to withhold that report till we can dispose of the pending bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I cannot do so.

Mr. SPALDING. I did not suppose the gentleman would. [Laughter.]

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: strike out all of said amendment after the word "office," in line seven, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That all the moneys standing to the credit of the 'Patent Fund' or in the hands of the Commissioner of Patents, and all moneys hereafter received at the Patent Office for any purpose or from any source whatever, shall be paid into the Treasury as received, without any deduction whatever, and the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated for salaries and miscellaneous and contingent expenses of the Patent Office and for withdrawals and for moneys paid by mistake, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Patents to communicate to Congress at the commencement of every December session a full and detailed account of moneys received for duties on patents, and for copies of records, and drawings, and all other moneys received by virtue of said office, and of all moneys expended by him under and by virtue of this provision for said contingent and miscellaneous expenses and for salaries, and the names of persons to whom such salaries are paid and the amounts thereof paid to each."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following: "Provided, That no part of this property shall be sold or transferred without the consent of the United States first had and received."

B. B. WASHBURN, E. F. BUTLER,

J. B. BECK,

Managers on the part of the House.

L. M. MORRILL,

J. HARLAN,

C. COLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report of the committee of conference was then adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 541, making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution.

The pending question was upon the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to add to the bill the following:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior, the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Surgeon General of the Army, the chief of the Bureau of Medical Surgery of the Navy, and the chief engineer of the Army, shall constitute a commission, which shall be known and designated as the "Commission of Charities for the District of Columbia."

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the said commission shall organize immediately upon the passage of this act, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be the president thereof, and he shall designate as secretary of the said commission a clerk of his Department, who is of the fourth class, and who shall keep a record of all the proceedings and transactions of the said commission.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the said commission shall have the full control and direction of all the appropriations made by Congress to the charitable institutions of the said District of Columbia, and of all such appropriations as may be made for the purposes of charity in the said District, and shall have the power of visitation and examination of all the institutions in the said District, to the support of which appropriations shall be made by Congress. No moneys shall be drawn from the appropriations made to the charitable institutions of the District, or for the purposes of charity in said District, except upon the requisition of the president of the commission, made upon an order of the commission, duly entered in the journal of their proceedings, and all the accounts of the said commission shall be audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury. And it is hereby provided that the provisions of this act shall not be deemed to include the Government hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no money shall be expended for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, and for the Providence Hospital, until title to the property, real and personal, of such institutions shall be transferred to the United States by conveyances, certified as being valid by the Attorney General of the United States, and conveying all the right, title, and interest of the said institutions in the property conveyed.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said commission to make a full report to Congress at the December session of each year, of all its transactions and of all the expenditures made under its direction, together with a statement of the condition of the charitable institutions of the District for which appropriations shall have been previously made and which shall have been expended under its direction.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE moved that the House adjourn, but withdrew the motion.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. PILE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, by unanimous consent reported two amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1877) to reduce and fix the military peace establishment; which were ordered to be printed and recommitted.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 454) for the relief of Samuel N. Miller; and

An act (S. No. 486) to facilitate the settlement of certain prize cases in the southern district of Florida.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to the office of the surveyor general of Louisiana and the archives of that office; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 352, to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments.

No objection was made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in; and that the House ask for the appointment of a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee on the part of the House Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. MARSHALL.

COMMANDER D. LYNCH.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Commander D. Lynch, asking to be restored to the active list of the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

EMMELINE H. RUDD.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill (H. R. No. 1431) granting a pension to Emmeline H. Rudd; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emmeline H. Rudd, widow of John Rudd, late a commodore in the United States Navy, and to pay her a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month, commencing November 12, 1867, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is there any report in this case?

Mr. MILLER. There is a report, but I have not it here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like some explanation of this bill.

Mr. MILLER. This officer entered the Navy in 1814, and remained in the Navy until 1867, when he died of disease contracted in the service. And this bill is to give his widow a pension.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This bill should be amended so as to provide for the payment of this pension out of the naval pension fund.

Mr. MILLER. I will not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and, agreeably to order, resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CULLOM in the chair) for general debate, Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, being entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. At the request of my friend from Ohio [Mr. VAN TRUMP] I have consented to yield to him this evening, and will take some future occasion to express my views upon the pending political issues.

CONGRESSIONAL REGULATION OF SUFFRAGE.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Mr. Chairman, I propose to speak to-night to a bill now pending in committee, and introduced into this House by my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] intended to regulate, by Federal authority, the election of members of Congress in Ohio at the coming elections; and I do so for the reason that we are rapidly approaching the close of the session, in consequence of which, under a recent rule of the House, the bill may at any time be reported back under the operation of the previous question, thus cutting off all opportunity of exposing to the country, and especially to the people of Ohio, the unconstitutional enormities which it involves. Sir, the Chinese have a proverb that "Medicine is good for sickness, but not for fate;" the moral of which is, that it is useless to struggle against the Inevitable. This wise saw of our oriental friends is daily exemplified within these walls in regard to everything the minority may say or do upon any matter which, by any possibility, can be tortured into a party question.

Sir, if it were not that we may occasionally exhibit some wholesome constitutional medicine to a people sick with the political nostrums of Republican quacksalvers, we on this side of the House would have very little inducement to indulge in the cacoethes loquendi so liberally enjoyed by our friends across the way. It is not, therefore, with any vain or delusive hope that I shall possess the power to change a single vote, the capacity to reach a single conscience, or even for a moment be able to check the wild and revolutionary onward march of the majority on this floor, that I rise to speak to this extraordinary bill. Sir, "Ephraim is joined to his idols;" and although we here on this side of the House may not be disposed to "let him alone" in his idolatrous worship stern necessity compels us to yield to "superior force," and to content ourselves, by voice and vote, to protest in the name of the people against such oft-repeated and accumulating outrage and oppression. This bill, as presented by my colleague from the capital district, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] is only a part of a deliberate and well-planned scheme to centralize and consolidate all the powers of the Government, the total absorption of the rights as well as the sovereignty of the States, into the all-ingulfing maelstrom of congressional usurpation.

Sir, the apprehensions and the prophetic warnings of many a revolutionary patriot in the debates upon the formation of our Constitution in general Convention, and of the several State conventions in its ratification, are now being fearfully realized in almost every measure of the party now in power—reconstruction acts, negro suffrage bills, radical changes in the judiciary for mere party ends, unconstitutional aggression upon the executive department of the Government, the demolition of State rights, the supremacy of the military over the civil authority, corruption and extravagance unbounded, the dictation and erection by Federal power of State constitutions against the will of the people over whom they are declared to be perpetual and unchangeable; all these bold, bad acts, by bold if not bad statesmen, tend to fasten upon the thoughtful mind the inevitable conviction that our unhesitating and unscrupulous opponents have formed the devilish determination to change this proud and well-ordered confederation of independent States into a centralized and powerful despotism, the Republic into an empire.

Sir, these men and this party forget or seem to be indifferent to the great political and philosophical fact, that there exists in the civilization of free government something higher and holier than mere party; that private selfishness is not public virtue; that temporary success in political organizations may be purchased at too dear a price; and that the penalty of violated law and the inevitable consequences of a criminal disregard of moral and constitutional obligations on the part of public rulers will sooner or later follow as the avengers of public justice. Sir, I know it is attempted to make the advocates of State-rights under the Constitution odious in public opinion because a portion of the American people, led on by selfish and ambitious leaders, in an evil and most unfortunate hour for them attempted to assert the doctrine through the heresy of secession. But their error, or even their wicked design, does not affect or invalidate its existence under the Constitution. The fact that they mistook their remedy does not vindicate us in an equally unjustifiable and revolutionary assault upon that same Constitution. If they wickedly braved the dangers of Scylla it is no reason why we should foolishly encounter the kindred dangers of Charybdis. Because they attempted to destroy the Government by force of arms is no good reason why we should subvert and overthrow it by usurpation. I know, sir, that the self-approving excuse offered for all these high-handed usurpations of power, both during and since the war, is the miserable delusion and fallacy that it was necessary to do so in order to save what is flippantly called the "life of the nation." The life of the nation, sir! What is the life of the nation? "The way, the truth, and the life" of this nation, if it may appropriately be called a nation, is its organic law, the Constitution, which gave it vitality and being. That Constitution is the political pabulum which sustains its existence; it is the breath of its nostrils; it is the blood of its veins and arteries; it is that, and that alone, through which it "breathes and moves and has its being." The whole legal, national life pulsates from the heart of the Constitution, sending its currents of health and vigor through every part and ramification of the body-politic. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that some enterprising speculators in the theory of government upon the floor of this House have boldly repudiated this old-fashioned principle of the inner life of the Republic, and claim to have discovered in their indefatigable researches a more convenient external power of national life "outside of the Constitution."

So enamored was the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] with this new discovery that he not long ago rebuked his friends for denying that he had made the declaration that we were legislating outside of the Constitution. He seems to be specially proud of the position, wholly unconscious or regardless of the fact that the proposition is a naked political felo de se. Does not the honorable gentleman know that Congress itself is nothing more than the mere creature of the Constitution? He knows as well as any man can know, for no one doubts his great legal ability, that Congress has no rightful powers but such as it derives from the Constitution, and that all powers exercised not derived from that instrument is mere naked, unqualified usurpation. He knows that he can just as reasonably affirm that animal life could exist without an atmosphere as that the legislative powers of this Government can legally exist without or outside of the Constitution. He knows that the Constitution is the creator of the law-making power just as well as he knows that God created him; and that it is just as absurd to declare that we, as a political body, can exist "outside" of the Constitution as it would be impious to say that poor, weak, and erring man could exist without God, the universal Creator.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall show very conclusively I think before I take my seat that the legislation proposed by this bill is just as clearly "outside" the Constitution as are any of the acts admitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to be extra-constitutional. Sir, the fact that this most anomalous bill now under consideration has been introduced into this House for the purpose of improperly interfering with the just authority of State legislation, is only another indication that the party now in power is the legitimate successor of the old Federal party of 1801 in everything which tends to centralize and consolidate the powers of the General Government by the absorption of all local State authority, so carefully separated and distributed by the Constitution existing in common over all. I shall not stop to recite the evidence of this proposition; it is to be found upon almost every page of the Statutes-at-Large, teeming with congressional usurpation for the last eight years.

The bill now before us is of the same character. In order that its vicious object may be clearly understood a brief analysis of its provisions should be presented. The preamble recites that by the constitution of the State of Ohio persons of African descent with a preponderance of white blood are entitled to vote for members of Congress; that on the 16th day of April, 1868, the Legislature of said State passed an act designed to render it impracticable for such electors to vote at any election in said State, and which said act, for that reason, has been declared by the supreme court of said State to be in violation of the constitution of said State and void; that by the Constitution of the United States the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter the regulations of any State as to the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress; that to the end that all the legal electors of said State may be permitted freely to vote for such Representatives, it is provided in said bill that so far as the act of the Legislature of said State attempts to control the manner of holding elections of Representatives in Congress, the same is set aside and rendered void; and the manner of holding such elections, and of challenging and determining upon the right of such electors to vote for such Representatives, and the character and amount of evidence, interrogatories, and answers which may be required to determine the right of such electors to vote as aforesaid, and the rights of such electors shall, in all respects, be the same as they would be if the said act had not been passed. The bill further provides that whenever said electors having African blood shall tender to the judges of election a ballot, with the words "for Representative in Congress only" written or printed on the back thereof, and said judges or other persons shall, under the provisions of said act, challenge said electors' right to vote, or shall in any way attempt to enforce the provisions of said act, and said electors having African blood shall be prevented from voting, either by force, violence, threats, intimidation, or by reason of the enforcement by said judges of the provisions of said act, then it shall be lawful for such electors having African blood to hold at such place in said voting precinct as they may select a separate poll for Representative in Congress, at which all such electors of said precinct may vote for Representative in Congress; that for the organization of such poll it shall be lawful for such electors having African blood to choose the judges and officers of such separate poll in the same manner as is provided by law in said State when the judges of election shall fail to attend.

The bill further provides that any judge or other officer of election, who shall enforce any of the provisions of said void act so as to prevent any such elector from voting at the same poll with the other electors of said State for Representative alone, or so as to hinder, delay, or control his casting such ballot for Representative alone, at either the regular or said separate poll, shall be guilty of a high crime, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

Such, Mr. Chairman, are the extraordinary provisions of this most extraordinary bill now, by the force of party drill, sought to be enacted into a solemn law by what ought to be the solemn Congress of the United States! Sir, a high and weighty responsibility rests upon the Republican party for these persistent innovations upon the well-settled practice of the Government, and these oft-repeated perversions of the plainest provisions of the Constitution. Where, I would most seriously inquire, in the Constitution of the United States, upon a state of fact as here alleged in this bill, does the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] find authority for any legislation such as he now proposes? I confidently assert that nowhere within the lids of that Constitution can such authority be found. I defy any gentleman on this floor to point to a single line or syllable to sustain such a bill upon such a state of facts.

The honorable gentleman, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] with all his acknowledged legal ability, in his over-wrought zeal for the negro and the supremacy of his party, has wholly misconceived and misapprehended the true meaning of the constitutional provisions upon which he has evidently framed this bill. Sir, what are these provisions? Let us examine them for a moment in the light of the contemporaneous history of the Constitution, as exhibited in the debates upon its formation and ratification, as well as in the commentaries of those great legal minds who have established its construction, and see whether the founders of the Government ever contemplated a bill like the one now before us. The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution reads as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Mr. Chairman, as illustrative of the genius and peculiar structure of our Government, and which marks so clear and distinctive a line of separation from all other civilized Governments, whether ancient or modern, I know of no clause in this Constitution of ours more characteristic than the one now under consideration. None more clearly exhibits that equipoise of power, or the manifestation of that system of checks and balances which runs through the Constitution in the distribution of its powers, either as between the several departments or the Federal and State Governments. Edmund Burke, in his beautiful picture of the British constitution, a mere traditional organ of Government, not made permanent by parchment covenants, like ours, but subject to change and revolution through the whims and caprice of unrestricted parliamentary power, describes it as—"A scheme to prevent any one of its principles from being carried as far as, taken by itself, and theoretically, it would go; that to avoid the imperfection of extremes all its several parts are so constituted as not alone to answer their own several ends, but also each to limit and control the other; inasmuch that take which of the principles you please you will find its operation checked and stopped at a certain point; and that the whole movement stands still rather than that any part should proceed beyond its boundary."

Sir, that magnificent description of the workings of the English political machinery, by one of England's profoundest thinkers, is but a literal transcript, a constitutional photograph, of the very spirit and design of the section we are now considering. The Federal Congress is a direct representation of the people of the several independent States of the Union. But while it represents the entire body of the people, subdivided into States, it also forms one of the great branches of the General Government. The Constitution, therefore, as the instrument of supreme government over all, carefully provides that while the power of fixing the times, places, and manner of holding the elections for these Representatives shall be given primarily and plainly to the people of these several States, yet, for the purpose of checking a possible abuse of this power, and more especially with the object of shielding the General Government from any combination among the States to harass or break it up by a non-user or misuser of the power, the Constitution, thus understood, wisely confers upon Congress a supervisory but contingent and secondary authority to prevent such calamity.

It is not to be denied, Mr. Chairman, that upon first blush and a hasty and inconsiderate reading of this section by those not thoroughly familiar with the history of the Constitution there would seem to be some probable ground for the legislation now proposed. But we are not to stop at even the most careful and thoughtful reading of the section. There is a vast field of other elements of interpretation. In the first place, allow me to say that there is furnished to us no inconsiderable canon of construction, no trifling circumstance for our consideration as legislators, in the remarkable fact that this section has been suffered to lie dormant for more than eighty years, a period which embraces some of the fiercest struggles between parties strictly founded upon the great question of Federal power in the Government as against the counterpoising force of local and State authority. It is, Mr. Chairman, a most pregnant fact—a fact which cannot be ignored or disregarded upon the question of power now sought to be exercised—that this is the first bill of the kind ever presented for the action of the Representatives of the people since the foundation of the Government.

In the stormiest periods of the Republic, at a time when Federal supremacy was sought to subordinate all State authority whatever, even upon questions in which the Constitution in express terms recognizes the paramount force of the State governments, no man ever dreamed, no Congress ever imagined, that the fourth section of that Constitution would support a bill like the present upon any such state of fact as is therein set forth, even in relation to white men, much less to negroes. Mr. Chairman, I repeat, because it is the point of the argument, that nothing in that entire Constitution better exhibits and exemplifies the peculiar character of our Government in its checks and balances, in its limitations of power upon and among its several departments, as well as between the State and Federal Governments, by way of protection to each against the aggressive spirit of any or all the others, than this very fourth section now under consideration. It was not for the accumulation of indefinite legislative power at large in the General Government, but it was for the simple purpose of protecting that Government in the specific powers with which it was clothed by the States themselves, that this section was inserted in the Constitution.

It was intended as a shield of defense, and not as a weapon of attack in the hands of the Government. Our fathers, in balancing and adjusting this complex machinery of Government, understood as well as any mere human comprehension could understand the aggressive and grasping character of all organized political power, and the imminent danger which was to be apprehended in a struggle for supremacy between the General and State Governments. That this is the true character of the provisions of the Constitution upon which this bill is sought to be sustained, I shall now proceed to show by the debates upon this subject, both in the general and in nearly all of the State conventions. But before I come to this part of the argument I wish to recur to another point already touched upon. The provisions of this section belong to what has been very aptly termed the "extreme medicine" of the Constitution—a dormant power reserved to be exercised only on extraordinary emergencies, when what our friends on the other side of the House denominate the "life of the nation" is endangered by the encroachments of one branch of the Government upon another. This is manifest from the fact that the power has never heretofore been resorted to in the ordinary arrangements for the election of members of the House of Representatives. If it was intended that Congress should have the right to interfere in the usual arrangements for the election of Representatives, without regard to any danger, real or apprehended, to the entirety of representation in the General Government, it is a most remarkable and unexplained fact that Congress never has interfered, even at periods when such danger might have been reasonably anticipated. Even at an early day in the history of the Government, when one of the New England States, in a spirit of secession, whose votaries now they would consign to "hell's dark concave" and everlasting fires, withdrew her representatives from the national Legislature, no attempt was made by Congress to exercise the power granted in this fourth section of the Constitution. Again, sir, if my learned colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is right in his construction of these provisions by supposing they will support the principles of his bill, why is it that Congress has never heretofore corrected the numerous discrepancies and want of uniformity growing out of the exercise of the power of regulating these elections by the several State Legislatures?

The States have regulated the times, the places, and the manner of electing Representatives to Congress, exclusively and without Federal interference, since the foundation of the Government. Will my learned friend explain this fact consistently with his present interpretation of the Constitution? There is a total want of uniformity both in the time and in the manner of these elections, and yet we never, until now, when party success is so transcendently important, heard of any attempt by Congress to correct the evil. In some of the States the candidate must have a majority of all the votes cast; in others a plurality is the rule. In some they are chosen viva voce; in others by ballot. The discrepancy of the time of holding these elections in the several States sometimes works very marked results as to representation in the House, because we all know that it has frequently occurred that at an extra session, called perhaps by some pressing public emergency, whole States have been without representation in this body. And yet no one of the many very able men in Congress, during all this time, has been lawyer enough to understand the proper interpretation of these provisions of the Constitution, if the learned gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] has at last discovered their true intent and meaning.

Sir, if this last construction is the right one, then the fathers who framed the Constitution, and the ablest law-writers whose commentaries upon it have been accepted as its correct interpretation, have been most singularly mistaken in regard to its true intent and meaning. I shall cite but a few of the many passages from the writings of these able men to sustain the view I have taken of this question. In the first place, Mr. Justice Story will be recognized as competent authority on this subject, not only because of his great ability as a constitutional lawyer, but mainly for the reason that his political opinions leaned to the side of Federal power; and therefore, when we find him ranged on the side of State authority we can feel some assurance that his judgment is unbiased by prejudice or partisan feeling. He, in effect, says that the single object of the fourth section is protection to the General Government. He declares that—

"Its propriety rested upon this plain proposition: that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." * * * * *

"The regulation of elections is submitted in the first instance to the local governments which in ordinary cases and when no improper views prevail, may both conveniently and satisfactorily be by them exercised. But in extraordinary circumstances the power is reserved to the national Government, so that it may not be abused, and thus hazard the safety and permanence of the Union." * * * * *

"Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power in the State Legislatures to regulate elections for the national Government would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy."

So much, Mr. Speaker, for the leading commentator upon the Constitution. Now let us turn to the solemnly expressed opinion of one who, next to Mr. Madison, had the most controlling influence in its formation and adoption. Alexander Hamilton, a man of all others of his time the most ultra-Federal in his views, who was in favor of the strongest Government consistent with public liberty, and who looked upon purely Democratic institutions as the dream of an enthusiast rather than the practical convictions of a sound and enlightened statesman. In the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist he thus refers to this question:

"I am greatly mistaken if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." * * * * *

"They have submitted the regulations of elections for the General Government, in the first instance, to the local administrations, which, in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety." * * * * *

"Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the national Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy."

In the debates upon this clause in the North Carolina convention in 1788, Mr. Davie made the following remarks:

"The gentleman from Edenton has pointed out the reasons of giving this control over elections to Congress, the principal of which was to prevent a dissolution of the Government by designing States. If all the States were equally possessed of absolute power over their elections, without any control of Congress, danger might be justly apprehended where one State possesses as much territory as four or five others, and some of them being thinly peopled now, will daily become more numerous and formidable." Without this control in Congress those large States might successfully combine to destroy the General Government. It was, therefore, necessary to control any combinations of this kind. Another principal reason was that it would operate in favor of the people against the ambitious designs of the Federal Senate. I will illustrate this by matter of fact. The history of the little State of Rhode Island is well known. An abandoned faction have seized on the reins of government, and frequently have refused to have any representation in Congress. If Congress had the power of making the law of elections operate throughout the United States, no State could withdraw itself from the national councils without the consent of a majority of members of Congress. Had this been the case that trifling State would not have withheld its representation. What once happened may happen again; and it was necessary to give Congress this power to keep the Government in operation. This being a Federal Government, and involving the interests of several States, and some acts requiring the assent of more than a majority, they ought to be able to keep their representation full. It would have been a solecism to have a Government without any means of self-preservation."

I shall make, Mr. Speaker, but one more quotation from these debates. One of the ablest lawyers who sat in the Convention which framed the Constitution, Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, was also a member of the State convention which ratified it. He was also a Federalist in his political opinions; and in answering the objections of the Republicans to this clause, and giving the reasons for its incorporation into the organic law of the land, he said:

"This clause is not only a proper, but necessary one. I have already shown what pains have been taken in the convention to secure the preservation of the State governments. I hope, sir, that it was no crime to sow the seed of self-preservation in the Federal Government; without this clause it would not possess self-preserving power." * * * * *

"If the Congress had it not in their power to make regulations, what might be the consequences? Some States might make no regulations at all upon the subject. And shall the existence of the House of Representatives, the immediate representation of the people in Congress, depend upon the will and pleasure of the State governments? Another thing may possibly happen, I do not say it will; but we were obliged to guard even against possibilities as well as probabilities."

"A Legislature may be willing to make the necessary regulations, yet the minority of that Legislature may, by absenting themselves, break up the house and prevent the execution of the intention of the majority. I have supposed the case that some State governments may make no regulations at all; it is possible, also, that they may make improper regulations. If those Legislatures possessed, uncontrolled, the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner of electing members of the house of representatives, the members of one branch of the General Legislature would be the tenants at will of the electors of the other branch, and the General Government would be prostrate at the mercy of the Legislatures of the several States."

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, we have in these clear and distinct views of the framers of the Constitution the true interpretation and meaning of this power of the General Government over the times, places, and manner of choosing members of the House of Representatives. It is shown to be a mere supervising and corrective power, for the single purpose of self-protection and defense; not an original and absolute dominion over the subject-matter itself.

It has authority only to regulate that subject-matter simply as a check to an abuse which may tend to strike at its own existence. It assimilates itself to the veto power of the President. It is a principle of self-preservation, not an inherent and unqualified power of administration. It is to repel an attack; not to sound a charge. It is a fortification thrown around the Federal Legislature; not a battering-ram to be used by Federal power to break down the original, and within its proper sphere, the supreme authority of the State Legislatures. Sir, any other construction to be put upon this clause of the Constitution places it in the power of Congress to abolish all State government whatever. It was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, and such has been its operation ever since its adoption by the people, that Congress itself should exist only through the constitutional action of the State Legislatures. The Federal Senate owes its continuous existence to these bodies, inasmuch as it is only by the action of the State Legislatures that Senators of the United States are, or can be, constitutionally elected.

So, too, with the Federal House of Representatives; if the framers and commentators of the Constitution knew what they were saying and doing then it is only through the action of the State Legislatures, by establishing the districts and providing for the time and manner of election, that the Federal House of Representatives can exist as a constitutional body. Let Congress once assume, by usurpation, and God only knows what it may not yet assume in that direction, to keep up and sustain its organization independent of State legislation, and there will be an end at once of all State government; State rights, State sovereignty, and all local independent authority will become absorbed and merged in one gigantic centralized and consolidated despotism. Sir, I am drawing no improbable or exaggerated picture—no uncommon occurrence in these days of change and revolution. It is a picture, sir, which other and better men than myself have limned in the better days of the Republic, in regard to the misuse and abuse of this very power in the Constitution. Patrick Henry, in the Virginia convention, was especially alarmed at the facility with which an unscrupulous Congress might seize upon this power, and he denounced it with that fervid eloquence for which he was so remarkable beyond all his compeers. In reply to a speech of Mr. Nicholas he thus speaks of the dangers which would follow an improper use of this power:

"I shall make a few observations to prove that the power over elections which is given to Congress is contrived by the Federal Government that the people may be deprived of their proper influence in the Government by destroying the force and effect of their suffrages. Congress is to have a discretionary control over the time, place, and manner of elections. The Representatives are to be elected, consequently, when and where they please. As to the time and place gentlemen have attempted to obviate the objection by saying that the time is to happen once in two years, and that the place is to be within a particular district or in the respective counties. But how will they obviate the danger of referring the manner of election to Congress? Those illumined geni may see that this may not endanger the rights of the people; but in my unenlightened understanding it appears plain and clear that it will impair the popular weight in the Government. Look at the Roman history. They had two ways of voting; the one by tribes, and the other by centuries. By the former numbers prevailed; in the latter riches preponderated. According to the mode prescribed Congress may tell you that they have a right to make the vote of one gentleman go as far as the votes of one hundred poor men. The power over the manner admits of the most dangerous latitude. They may modify it as they please. They may regulate the number of votes by the quantity of property without involving any repugnancy to the Constitution. I should not have thought of this trick or contrivance had I not seen how the public liberty of Rome was trifled with by the mode of voting, by centuries, whereby one rich man had as many votes as a multitude of poor men. The plebeians were trampled on till they resisted. The patricians trampled on the liberties of the plebeians, till the latter had spirit to assert their right to freedom and equality. The result of the American mode of election may be similar. Perhaps I shall be told that I have gone through the regions of fancy, that I deal in noisy declamation and mighty professions of patriotism. Gentlemen may retain their opinions; but I look on that paper as the most fatal plan that could possibly be conceived to enslave a free people. If such be your rage for novelty take it, and welcome; but you never shall have my consent. I am anxious, if my country should come into the hands of tyranny, to exculpate myself from being in any degree the cause, and to exert my faculties to the utmost to extricate her. Whatever may be the result I shall wait with patience till the day may come when an opportunity shall offer to exert myself in her cause."

Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown clearly and conclusively that the purpose of inserting this clause in the Constitution was for anything else than to sustain a project such as is contained in this bill. Sir, the design of this legislation is too manifest to be mistaken. It is only a continuation, in a new phase, of the great scheme of the Republican party to crush out the sovereignty of the several States of this Union, to break down and overthrow their independence, and thus render them the mere political vassals of Federal power and domination. One of the most startling and extraordinary propositions contained in this bill, clearly looking to the consummation of this design, is the wild and visionary assumption that Congress is invested with the great supreme judicial power of passing upon the validity or invalidity of a State law! This bill serious and with solemn enunciation undertakes to set aside a public statute of the sovereign State of Ohio, and to declare it absolutely null and void. Sir, can party madness or political fanaticism go any further than this? Are we to overthrow and trample under our feet every principle upon which this Government has heretofore been admitted to be based? Does the gentleman from the capital district claim that Congress is clothed with any power not expressly granted, or which does not arise by necessary implication upon the terms of the grant itself? I challenge him, or any gentleman on this floor, to point to a single provision in the Constitution upon which such implication can be raised by the most violent presumption or the most latitudinarian construction. The honorable gentleman, unless he is willing to usurp this power, must have had some confusion of mind upon the subject of the power. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that because the attempt was made in 1787 to ingraft this power upon the Constitution the gentleman supposed, from an imperfect or confused recollection of that circumstance, that such power was in fact embodied in the Constitution. But in this he is wholly mistaken. A congressional negative upon all State legislation was attempted in the Convention which framed the Constitution. On the 8th day of June, 1787, Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, (and it is one of the strange things of our early history that such a proposition should come from that State,) moved "that the national Legislature should have authority to negative all laws which they should judge to be improper."

In support of this proposition he argued that such a universality of the power was indispensably necessary to render it effectual; that the States must be kept in due subordination to the nation; that if the States were left to act of themselves in any case it would be impossible to defend the national prerogatives, however extensive they might be, on paper; that the acts of Congress had been defeated by this means, nor had foreign treaties escaped repeated violation. Mr. Madison held kindred sentiments on this particular question in the Convention, although he afterwards completely changed his views, as will be seen by consulting his introduction to the "Madison Papers." After full debate the motion was lost by a vote of—ayes 3, noes 7. Virginia stood 3 ayes and 2 noes, General Washington not voting. The State of Delaware was equally divided. And yet, Mr. Chairman, in the face and eyes of all this, the extraordinary proposition is now submitted for Congress to declare a law of the sovereign State of Ohio null and void! Sir, Congress has no more power to make such a declaration, by way of effecting such a law, than has the Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau. That is a naked, judicial power, a power which has been already exercised and exhausted by the supreme court of the State of Ohio; for that court has decided this very law to be unconstitutional and void under the State constitution. Is not the honorable gentleman satisfied with the decision of his own court, every judge of which entertains political opinions in harmony with his own?

Sir, whether that decision is right or wrong, whether partisan or impartial, it stands as the law of the land until it is legally and properly reversed; and I here affirm, with the utmost confidence, that the Democrats of Ohio are too law-abiding, too much the tried friends of good order and good government, to disregard its authority, so long as it shall stand as the pronounced adjudication upon the question which it involves. This bill, then, Mr. Chairman, has no practical purpose to sustain, unless it is intended to indicate the ultimate designs of a party in relation to radical changes in the whole system of our Government. If it has any other end to accomplish, it must be the covert and sinister one of obtaining the surreptitious votes of full-blooded negroes, in a state too doubtful, in the apprehension of somebody, to submit the question to an honest ballot-box.

Mr. Chairman, there is, in my opinion, another power usurped in this bill, to which I wish to draw the attention of the country. Sir, I will be very much obliged to the gentleman who introduced this bill, or the committee who reported it, if they can make it clear that Congress have the constitutional power to invade a sovereign State with a criminal statute to punish its citizens, upon a subject-matter over which the legislative authority has exclusive jurisdiction, and as to which they have, by their own laws, declared the penalty. This bill provides a punishment by fine and imprisonment against certain State election officers for misconduct in office, in legal effect covering the same acts, for the commission of which a law of the State already provides a punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary.

By a law of Ohio, passed March 20, 1841, it is provided that—

"If any judge or clerk of election, on whom any duty is enjoined by this act, shall be guilty of any willful neglect of such duty, or of any corrupt conduct in the execution of the same, such judge or clerk, on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary and kept at hard labor not more than five years nor less than one year."

Now, what is the duty enjoined by law on a judge of election? It is that he shall receive the votes of all duly-qualified electors presented to him; and a violation of that duty would be a willful or corrupt refusal to receive such vote, the punishment for which would be imprisonment in the penitentiary. The law of Ohio now is, under this decision of the supreme court, that every male citizen of the proper age, who has a preponderance of white blood, is a qualified elector.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, the Ohio statute and this bill, if it shall become a law, will cover the same ground, and provide separate punishments for the same act. Which shall be paramount? or shall the delinquent be punished under both? Sir, I hope gentlemen will well consider both whether Congress has the constitutional power to pass such a criminal statute, and also the effect of two penal laws, State and Federal, upon the same subject-matter, when that subject is the elective franchise and the protection of the ballot-box within the jurisdiction and touching the sovereignty of a State.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I want to put the question squarely to the majority on this floor, whether they intend to pass such a bill as this? Sir, if I could forget my obligation as a sworn Representative of the people, and was willing to look only to party advantage in the discharge of my public duty here, I would wish and vote for the passage of this bill. As the result of its passage I would expect, from what I know of the people of Ohio, that the fifty thousand Republicans who voted against negro suffrage last year in despite of the whip and spur of the party leaders, would unite with the Democracy in carrying the State by a still greater majority against the nominees of the Chicago convention. No "war-horse" nomination could withstand the tide of popular feeling running in the same direction. Not even the new-born cry for "peace," so hypocritically sounded in our ears of late, could check the swelling flood of popular indignation against these oft-repeated outrages.

"We want peace," says General Grant in his letter of acceptance. Yes, sir; we want peace; but not that kind of peace which follows the subjugation and degradation of millions of proud and intelligent freemen; not that kind of peace held in the grasp of tyranny and despotism; not that kind of peace which the wolf grants to the sheep-fold; not that kind of peace which exists amid desolation and humiliation, the peace of helpless despair, the peace of ruined trade, of wasted energies, of the tortured and crushed pride of humanity, and the utter deprivation of everything which belongs to liberty and independence. Sir, the people at last are becoming aroused to a higher sense of "peace" than such as is meant by General Grant. They are at last resolved to redeem the country by placing new men in old places; they are at last determined that these gross usurpations of power shall cease, and the Government once more brought back to its former dignity and prosperity. If this great effort is made as it should be made, the dark clouds which now hang over us will be dispelled, the storm will pass away, and the bright bow of promise will once more span our political firmament as a covenant of real peace between the two great sections of a common country under a common Constitution, and will again shine out in all its former beauty and splendor "upon the broken and retreating tempest."

PURPOSES OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Mr. SCOFFIELD. Mr. Chairman, which way are we moving? Are we, as some persons apprehend and charge, drifting under party excitement and confusion, through misrule and usurpation, toward despotic government, or are we, though in the midst of the storm, but in spite of it, still holding a compass-line inside the words and spirit of the Constitution toward a more perfect development of republican government?

What line should we follow? What is the fundamental theory of our Government? The great men who laid its foundations held that "all men are created equal." They proclaimed this sentiment in the face of a world heavily oppressed with inequality, rank, and privilege. They spoke and fought for it. Their eloquence and valor established it upon this continent. And that, I understand, is or ought to be the recognized theory of our Government. It is a simple formula, a few words, a single principle, one idea; but upon it our fathers raised the fabric of the new Government. It is that one idea which makes the Government great, gradually rising above all other Powers on the face of the earth, even in its infancy giving liberty and protection to forty million people at home, and reaching out a helping hand to the oppressed and humble all over the world.

I know it is said that the founders of the Republic did not really mean that all men are created equal, because they did not at first and at once confer equal rights upon all. It was impossible. Existing institutions, vested interests, erroneous convictions, and deep prejudices stood in the way. They went as far as they could then, as far as the public sentiment of their day would permit, and then holding to and advocating equal rights for all men as the correct Republican theory, awaited the fit times and opportunities and the proper development of the public sentiment to make that theory more and more practical. Upon this theory they founded a new political party, which they called the "Republican party." This word indicated as near as any one word in the language could the commonality of all governmental rights. They added to this name the adjective "progressive," to indicate that they did not mean to go backward nor to stand still, but move forward on this theory of human rights. It was not many years before this "progressive Republican party" came to control the country.

See what was done. The slave trade was interdicted and the trader declared a pirate. In many of the States slavery was abolished, and by an irrevocable ordinance all the territory then held made free forever. The franchise was enlarged; and except in the single State of New York, without distinction of race. Legislation could not make all men equal in talents, but it could give all an equal opportunity to cultivate whatever God had been pleased to bestow, and therefore free schools were established. It could not make all men equal in wealth, but it could give all an equal chance to acquire it; and so imprisonment for debt was abolished, exemptions from execution allowed, and the laws of inheritance equalized. These great advances toward the equalization of governmental advantages were not secured without resistance. There were conservatives in those days as well as in ours. They saw ruin in every progressive step. The prohibition of the slave trade would deprive the poor African heathen of a chance to hear the gospel and save his soul. The dedication of the territories to freedom was sectional and unconstitutional. Non-imprisonment for debt and exemption from execution would both defraud the creditor and destroy the credit of the debtor. Free schools would burden the thrifty with taxes to educate the children of idlers. The enlargement of the franchise would be its degradation. But in spite of conservatism and its evil prophecy the country improved, and what is far more important mankind improved. But conservatism did not surrender; it never does surrender. The "progressive Republican party" becoming in time divided into several parties upon temporary questions, and losing its distinctive name and organization, conservatism allied itself with the slave power and obtained for the time the mastery over the several divisions. Immediately the brakes are whistled down; all progress stops. It is now found out that the great declaration of our fathers for equal political rights was "a glittering generality," "a rhetorical flourish," "an unmeaning abstraction." It is now found out that political distinctions are necessary; that political equality is a degrading level; that the law should assign duties to one class and privileges to another. The revival of this old doctrine was not received without objection among the disbanding progressives. Small dissenting parties began to spring up. The abolitionists, the equal rights party, the free Democracy, barnburners, free-soilers, Benton Democrats, and others which escape my memory as I speak, from time to time and in various States attracted the attention of the public.

They were numerous enough to exhibit the deep discontent of thinking, progressive men, but too feeble to resist the retrograde movement inaugurated by the allied powers—conservatism and slavery. In 1856 representatives of these various organizations, or rather of the sentiments indicated by them, met in Philadelphia, and then and there, in the old State House, in which the theory of political equality had been first proclaimed, formed a national party, pledged to take up the principles and carry forward the work of the fathers. They took the name which had been honored by the advocates of equal rights in the better days of the Republic. The friends of freedom and equality all over the country began to gather into this new organization, while the advocates of privilege, the conservatives, the anti-progressives and the backgoers squatted at the feet of the slave power and assumed the misleading name of Democracy. These Philadelphia conventionists assumed the name and reaffirmed the doctrine of the first Republican party, to wit: that "all men are created equal," but like that party they did not expect to secure to all men their equal rights at once. Centuries of vested wrongs still stood in the way. Reasserting the principle, holding fast to the liberties already acquired, they only proposed to move forward slowly, securing to the unprivileged classes, act by act and measure by measure, as time and opportunity should permit, greater influence and advantage in the Government; until, in the course of time, in the distant future, the world should behold a great nation in which every citizen, without exception or distinction, had secured to him his equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—a nation with no ignorant, no poor, no enslaved, no degraded class.

It is now twelve years since this party was organized, and I submit that the history of the country proves that it has held steadily to its declared purpose; to give every child an equal chance of education, it has advocated and legislated, both in the States and Territories and in the District of Columbia, in favor of free schools; to give every man an equal chance to acquire property, the old Republican party, as I said before, abolished imprisonment for debt, and made the necessities of life exempt from execution. Following in these footsteps, the new Republican party, in the first year of its national triumph, secured to every landless man a one-hundred-and-sixty-acre farm without money and without price; and in the further practice of the same principle only last year it released the honest but broken debtor from the further pursuit of unrelenting credit. By an amendment to the Constitution slavery in sixteen States, in the District of Columbia, and in all the vast Territories of the country has been abolished, and its restoration made impossible forever. We have many bright pages in our short history—I trust we are to have many more—but the page that records this brief amendment will be the brightest of them all. The franchise, which lifts up the humble, protects the weak, educates the ignorant, and endows the poor, the synonym of liberty and self-respect, has from time to time been greatly enlarged. Under Republican legislation the volunteer soldier retains his privilege and sends home his vote. One year's service of the country endows the alien with the ballot. In twelve States, in all the Territories, and in the District of Columbia, the franchise has been extended to all and without distinction of race, and the whole tendency of Republican debate and legislation has been toward an enlargement of the franchise without restriction, except for crime.

All these measures look in one direction, and lead only to one result. They enlarge the rights, privileges, and opportunities of all the people, and subordinate the laws to the popular will. That is not despotism, but freedom. These measures may all be wrong, but if so, it is because the theory of popular government is wrong. I have a right, therefore, to conclude that the charge of despotic tendency preferred against the Republican party is entirely without foundation.

It may be said that two of these measures, namely, the emancipation of the slaves in all the States and their enfranchisement in the eleven rebel States have been too much hurried. The Republican party did not in the beginning intend to move so rapidly. Emancipation, which would withdraw from the enemy and add to us four million population, became a military necessity. The great purpose of the rebellion was to withdraw slavery from the wasting influence of the nineteenth century; to build it around with a new nationality, and wall out the light and warmth of a Christian age. That motive could only be destroyed by the destruction of slavery itself, and we struck it a hurried but fatal blow. Premature enfranchisement, if premature it is, has been forced upon us for a somewhat similar reason. The returning rebels demanded two sets of Congressmen, all their own, and thirty-three more for the blacks, both sets to be elected exclusively by themselves. Under the amended Constitution the claim was legal. But such double power would enable them to vote down your soldiers' pensions, repudiate your plighted honor, force upon you the payment for emancipated slaves, and finally to master and redivide the Union. To break the strength of this disunion element, we put the ballot in the hands of the loyal black man. Our own safety and the safety of the Union demanded it, but it is in accordance with the theory of our Government, and if a little premature, time will soon overtake it.

But you have passed laws restraining the power of the President; where is the despotism of that? A despotic government is a one-man government. All executive. How can restraints upon that one-man power be also despotic? They might be considered too Republican, too Democratic, but to call them despotic involves a contradiction. What are the facts? During the war the President was clothed with extraordinary powers. The Democrats complained. They apprehended that these powers might be used to destroy the liberties of the people. At length the war was over, Mr. Johnson had come to be President, but the extraordinary powers were still attached to the executive office. They were no longer needed, but were as dangerous as ever. Mr. Johnson himself said in his celebrated East Room speech, that he possessed power enough to make himself dictator. A great many people thought he intended to try it. Then Congress began to do what the Democrats claimed they should have done long before, confine the executive power to its old peace limits. Then they complain again. To confer these powers was despotic, to recall them is despotic. One or the other complaint is unfounded. We could not be wrong each time. We were really right each time. It was proper that the President should have large powers to suppress the rebellion, and that these powers should be surrendered after the necessity was passed.

But your mode of reconstructing the South is despotic! Not so much so as yours, provided you adopt the President's plan; and you have adopted it. The President put the people of the South under military rule; Congress did not. We did not order the Army there. We did not keep it there. We took no action till March 3, 1867. Up to that time the President had his own way, and all this time he governed the South by the Army. Till then his despotic will was law. He got up conventions. He selected the voters. He shaped the constitutions and declared them adopted. He allowed no popular vote. That was his plan. It was your plan. This was real despotism—unrestrained one-man military power. Our plan was only a restraint upon yours. We did not order the Army away, to be sure; but we put it under the control of law. We did not prohibit the assembling of conventions, but released them from the dictation of the President. We did not forbid constitutions to be framed, but required their submission to the people. Your plan was to originate State governments in accordance with the President's will, ours in accordance with established law.

But you are making encroachments upon the Supreme Court! A bill which requires the concurrence of two thirds of the judges to declare a statute of the United States void was proposed, but never became a law. Suppose it had, what despotism is there in that? Who compose the Supreme Court? Usually nine judges. They are appointed by the President and hold their offices for life. The people can change their Representatives once in two years, their President once in four, and their Senators once in six; but the judges of this court are always beyond their reach. This is the only anti-republican, aristocratic, despotic feature in our Government. While these judges are entirely above the influence of the people, they are not above the common passions and infirmities of mankind. They are still politicians, as much so as Senators and Representatives, though not progressive. They held to whatever was uppermost when they were lifted out of politics to the bench. You can tell the politics of a judge by the date of his commission, and the date of his commission by his politics.

They crystallize in the sentiments of their day and are changeless ever after. Some of them cannot even now realize that there has been a great war; and, on trying to decide that a constable and grand jury were equal to the "late political disorder." Some cannot realize that the slave power had been legally dethroned; and, on trying to retain in the legislation of the country at least a few memorial shreds of the odious institution, I have the best authority for saying that a majority of these judges have made up their minds that the "legal tender" law is unconstitutional, and will so decide in the cases now pending in their court. I mention this fact, not for present criticism, but as an illustration of the vast power of these nine men over the fortunes of the people. Is a law that requires the agreement of one or two more judges before they make a decision that will ruin all the debtors of the country by requiring them to pay their debts in gold despotic? Every debtor in the country who now thinks such a law would be despotic will have reason to change his mind before he is two years older.

Again, it is said that our legislation tends to centralization of power in the General Government, and that centralization tends to despotism. I deny it. We have endeavored to preserve the Union of the States, because individual liberty can be best secured in a single republic. The Republic was divided before we came to power. On the 4th of March, 1861, Mr. Buchanan surrendered to Mr. Lincoln the northern half, having surrendered the southern half to Jefferson Davis nearly a month before. We found the Union dismembered, and we have restored it. We found it with slavery, the chief incentive to disunion, and we broke the chains of four million bondmen. We found an hundred kinds of money that would not pass as many miles from home, and we have reduced them to one uniform system of equal value all over the land. We found the Pacific States separated from the East by a vast unoccupied country, and growing up into isolated nationality, and we have stretched out great lines of railway to secure their commerce and hold their interests and affections in the Union. We found commerce between the States everywhere burdened and obstructed by local and illiberal State legislation, and we have undertaken some measures of relief. These enterprises, undertaken to preserve the harmony of the States and secure the growth and development of the whole country, are mistaken by small politicians for acts of centralization.

In addition to carrying on a four-year war for the suppression of the rebellion all these beneficent and permanent reforms have been secured during the short life of the Republican party. Take as many years of Democratic administration prior to that and tell me what record you have left to awaken the gratitude or pride of the people. There stands the gallows upon which they immolated old John Brown, a brave but erring enthusiast of human freedom; but its victim is more honored to-day than its cruel architects. Just beyond is the Dred Scott decision, rendered in violation of precedent, law, and Constitution for the brutalization of four million Christian people. It has no friends now. Further on you behold the Missouri compromise—our fathers' bond of Union—the peace offering of its day, repudiated, broken, and trampled under foot that the inhumanity of the hour might be without restraint. Standing around it, as fit witnesses of the wrong, are the "border ruffian war," the "Lecompton villainy," and the small tyrannies of Pierce and Buchanan. Still further down this dreary history stands the "fugitive slave law," to which every Democratic knee was wont to bow. Its manacles are broken. Its bloodhounds no longer bay upon the track of its victims. No gurlands crown its ugly brow. It has no worshippers, no admirers, no defenders, no apologists even. All have sneaked away. These are the monuments of their administrations. During all these weary years nothing was done by the predominant party to elevate and honor labor, to educate the poor, to lift up the fallen, to endow the landless, or to soften the cruelties of bondage. You cannot point to a single act that anybody will celebrate, that anybody will honor, that anybody will remember even except with regret or shame.

This doctrine of political equality forms the great "divide" between parties now as heretofore. The conservative or anti-progressive element, always beaten, except when allied with the slave power, takes heart from the complication of public affairs and enters the arena with new disguises. The remnant of the slave aristocracy rallies to its standard. The foiled secessionists extend their crimson hands both to aid and to be aided. A great church, believing that the mass of mankind should be guided rather than educated, leads its vast flock when otherwise we would least expect it into the support of anti-republican distinctions. Many submit to the theory which degrades them because it degrades others more than themselves. And many mistake license to the vicious for liberty to mankind. It is the old combination, so often beaten. There may be a few recruits; some few who have attained senatorial and judicial honors by the advocacy of equal rights, through the natural selfishness of the human heart, have come to believe in rank since they have reached the highest. A few descendants of eminent men, unable by personal merit to command the position of their fathers, reject their fathers' doctrine. John Quincy Adams was a progressive Republican, and his grandson is a conservative. The descendant claims by law what the ancestor acquired by desert. To these add a few natural grumblers, and you have the present Democratic-conservative-sorehead-rebel party.

Such elements can be held together in a party of opposition, because a minority party need have no affirmative policy. They bring forward measures of their own. It is their business to hold back, to oppose, to criticise, to denounce, to threaten, not to originate, to propose, to decide, or to act. To avoid present accountability for the past they even condemn their own history and acquiesce in the defeat of their own measures. They were opposed to the "Lecompton fraud" and "border ruffian war" after Kansas became a free State. They approved the homestead law after it was enacted. They do not worship the fugitive slave law after it is repealed. They are in favor of the war after it is over. They are opposed to slavery after it is abolished. They will doubtless be opposed to repudiation after the debt is paid, and in favor of universal suffrage after everybody can vote. But they attack whatever is proposed by others, whatever is uppermost for the time being. During the last seven years they have done nothing but scold. Scolding is their vocation; their sovereign remedy for all public ills.

They scolded the Union party when Buchanan divided the Republic, and scolded harder when we attempted to restore it. If the Army lacked men they would scold. If a draft was ordered to fill it they would scold. If the Treasury was empty they would scold. If taxes were levied they would scold. If a loan was attempted they would scold. If a battle was lost they would scold about mismanagement. If it was won about subjugating the South. They scolded terribly when $300 would commute the draft, and worse when the law was repealed. They scolded when greenbacks were issued, and scolded again when the issue was stopped. They scold when the rebel States are kept out, and scold when they are brought in.

While this party remains in the minority scolding may answer their purpose. It may even enlarge their numbers by the addition of malcontents and impracticable men. But if they carry the elections next fall they must become actors instead of critics. What will they then do? If they have been honest in their opposition to Republican measures they must attempt to undo them all. They were opposed to coercion; they must, therefore, restore the confederacy and treat for terms of separation. They were opposed to emancipation, they must reestablish slavery. They were opposed to the amendment of the Constitution, which forbids payment for emancipated slaves and the assumption of rebel debts; they must, therefore, repeal it. They were opposed to the repeal of the fugitive-slave law; they must therefore reenact it. They opposed the readmission of the eight reconstructed rebel States; they must therefore turn them out. Their candidate for Vice President says they will, and that by revolution if they cannot by law. They were opposed to the enfranchisement of the colored people in the rebel States; they must therefore disfranchise them and leave the rebel power without check or division. They opposed the enfranchisement of the citizen soldiers, and they must be disfranchised also. It may be said they cannot accomplish all this. That is true, but they can try it. They must try it, because if they do not it is a confession that they have all along been wrong, and we have all along been right, which is a confession that they ought to be defeated at the polls. They carried the Legislature of Ohio last fall, and immediately began the work of demolition. Their first attack was on the franchise. They at once withdrew from the soldier, the student, and the quadroon, whom they classed and proscribed together, the right to vote. Ohio had given her consent to the constitutional amendment, which makes the loyal States equal in representation in the Federal Government to the rebel States, and prohibits payment for slaves and the assumption of rebel debts, but this Legislature revoked it. Suppose they fail in their efforts, how is the country to be benefited by a four years' struggle over it? If they succeed, the old slave aristocracy becomes again the masters of the country. The defeated rebels become the political victors. Hampton and Forrest and Preston will be the honored soldiers at Washington, as they were in the New York convention, and Grant and Sherman and Sheridan will be discharged on parole.

It is said they will not carry matters so far; the northern wing of the party will moderate and restrain the insolence of the rebel wing. So we were told when Pierce and Buchanan were candidates, but after the election we soon found that the southern Democrats controlled the northern. Whether the northern Democrats design it or not it will be so again.

But it is said this party can get us out of all financial trouble. The southern wing got us into it, but how can they get us out? Will they pay it? They ought to do so, but they will not, and I suppose they cannot. They pay no taxes. They say they have nothing to pay with. They could do nothing, then, but tax us and dispose of our money. Why should they be selected for that office? When have they shown any financial ability superior to northern men? They run the confederacy four years and two months, and so far from developing financial ability they developed a great lack of it. Their only schemes were forced loans, to be paid out of taxes on the loans themselves. Their currency became so worthless that they were forced to collect taxes in kind. They developed great military ability, I concede, but as financiers they were total failures. It was always so. Before the war they borrowed from the North the money to improve their estates, build their railroads and public works, and it has been mostly paid in confiscation and bankruptcy. They might double your debt by adding theirs to it, but how would they, or could they, discharge it, except by repudiation?

What could the northern wing of the party do? They have had the Administration and run the Treasury Department for the last three years. The whisky tax that ought to yield $90,000,000 per year has, under their management, yielded less than fourteen million dollars. They are in favor of free trade, so they would get nothing from customs. The internal taxes are now nearly all collected from whisky, tobacco, banks, and incomes. Could they find any better sources of revenues? Would they take the tax from whisky and put it on bread? From tobacco and put it on coffee? From incomes and put it on labor? Or would they abolish taxes altogether? How, then, could they relieve us of debt? No way, sir, except by following their southern wing into repudiation. That would be an expensive payment. It implies disgrace abroad, and distress, revolution, and anarchy at home. I have always thought the liberties of this country could not survive a repudiation of its debt. In my judgment it would produce a convulsion which would end in the establishment of a less popular form of government.

But it is said, again, they could tax the bonds. Very well. But why make that a party question any more than taxing whisky or incomes? If all the bonds were taxed, including those held abroad, at the rate proposed, that is, ten per cent. upon the interest in addition to the five per cent. already collected, we could only realize from this source $12,000,000. Compared with our other sources of revenue, this is a small sum. Why surrender the Government, with all its financial, military, and political interests to those who but three years ago were in arms to destroy it altogether, in order to secure so small a modification of the tax law? If the people think it best, upon full consideration, to levy this tax, can they not so instruct their Representatives in the several districts? If General Grant is elected so as to give confidence in the stability of the Government and the continued peace of the country, we can exchange our bonds for a long bond bearing from one to two per cent. less interest. This would save to the country from twenty to thirty million dollars per year instead of $12,000,000. We would not only realize in this way more than as much again money, but avoid the charge of incipient repudiation. Why has that not been done already?

If you can tell me why God in his providence has seen fit to afflict this country with such a President as Andrew Johnson, I can answer the question. For three years he has been sitting there, an obstruction to all proper legislation and administration. If we propose a new bond with low interest he calls before him the correspondent of the London Times, and fills him with apprehensions of repudiation to be scattered all over Europe. If we put a tax on whisky, which, if honestly collected, would relieve us of all other internal taxes, he is careful to see that it never goes to the Treasury. He counsels with the bitterest opponents of the war and plots with the bitterest rebels. Their common purpose seems to be to keep the country distracted; to defeat the reconstruction of the South; to advise, prompt, and aid resistance; to encourage mobs and murders to fulfill their prophetic war of races; to keep the finances unsettled and business men in doubt; to worry the men who trusted the Government when they would not and make them unpopular with the people; to magnify the burdens of taxation, and thus confuse the judgment and tire the patience of the people. The more distress, real or imaginary, they can produce in the country the greater will be their chances of political success.

They make the trouble and hold the Republicans responsible for it. With Johnson controlling the Treasury and all the Executive Departments we can do nothing. He can and will and does thwart all our efforts. If the Government now goes into the hands of the southern rebels with only such restraints as their northern allies choose to impose, capitalists will have no confidence in the maintenance of any new contract and will make none.

But it is said, again, that this party would pay off the bonds in greenbacks at once and have done with interest. At present we have no surplus of greenbacks to pay with, and unless taxation is very much increased we will not have for several years to come. Whether the bonds shall be paid in greenbacks or gold is a question for the future. It is not a question for this year or next. It may never be a question. Before we will be able to pay at all, or can be called on to pay, gold and greenbacks may and probably will be of equal value. It may become a troublesome question at some future day; but why anticipate the trouble? Do not the times furnish trouble enough without this?

Yes; but the Democrats would print greenbacks enough to pay off the bonds. That would give us $2,500,000,000 of currency at least; if the bank issue was still outstanding, $2,800,000,000. During the war the Democrats declared that in time it would take a cord of greenbacks to pay for a cord of wood. They would thus fulfill their own prophecy. Such a course would wipe out the bonds; but the public creditors would not be the only sufferers. It would discharge all private debts as well. But like the confederate currency it would have little value except to pay debts, and after that nobody would take it. A debtor might sell a horse for enough to pay for a farm he purchased on credit the year before; but there the traffic would end; all trade would stop; all manufactures would stop; the poor would have no employment, and property command no price. But, after all, it might not effect a discharge of debts either public or private. Suppose the debtors should refuse to take it, and the Supreme Court should decide the law unconstitutional and void. That would bring everybody to specie payments at once. It is well understood that this court will ultimately render such a decision on the present legal-tender law. They only wait a favorable time. Such an avalanche of irredeemable paper might force the decision at once.

As proof of the financial ability of this party we are reminded that in 1861 they left the country free from debt, and that under our administration a debt of $2,500,000,000 has been created. The statement is not quite true. They left the country in debt nearly one hundred million dollars in time of peace, and its credit so low that Howell Cobb, the Secretary of the Treasury, informed Congress in December, 1860, that he was unable, after repeated efforts, to borrow the little sum of $10,000,000. It is true, we have a large debt now; but who caused it? It will be admitted that the debt was created to suppress the rebellion, and the southern wing of the party which now complains of it got up the rebellion to divide the Union. It ought also to be admitted, but I suppose will not be, that the rebellion was prompted and encouraged by a portion of the northern wing. Upon some portion of the Democratic party, as at present organized, lies the whole responsibility of this rebellion. Is it fair, then, to hold us responsible for a debt caused by the misconduct of our opponents?

In 1863 there was a great anti-war riot in New York. To suppress it and repair damages cost the city a large sum of money. Suppose these rioters and their sympathetic friends the next year had formed a party and nominated a ticket to contest with the old officials the possession of the city government, would they have had the cheek to urge as a reason for the change that the debt of the city had been enlarged the year before? During the war the beautiful town of Chambersburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, was burned by the rebels. A large debt was created to rebuild it. Suppose these incendiaries had settled in Chambersburg after the war was over and had finally been placed on the Democratic ticket for local officers, would it have been altogether modest in them to urge the people to select them because the old officers had created this debt? If a discharged cashier, turning thief and robbing your bank, and thus entailing upon it a heavy debt, should, upon his return from the penitentiary, ask to be restored to his old place, and give as a reason that your bank was out of debt when he was discharged, and a large debt had been created by his successor, would you be likely to restore him? And yet the impudence of the New York rioters, the Chambersburg incendiaries, and the discharged cashier would not be greater than that of the late rebels and their northern allies, who ask to be restored to power because their own misconduct has forced the contraction of a large debt.

The talk about relieving the country of its obligations means repudiation or it is a deception. They cannot levy the taxes more judiciously, nor collect and apply them more honestly than anybody else. Their three years trial under Mr. Johnson has not developed any superior character in this direction. They certainly could not negotiate for a low rate of interest to advantage. Capitalists, knowing the debt will always be hateful to a large portion of their party because it must ever remind them of their folly and humiliation, would fear to trust them.

This portion of their party, to frighten the people into total or partial repudiation constantly magnify the burden and decry the ability of the country to discharge it. Why, Mr. Chairman, the amount of our property to-day is $22,000,000,000. Every twelve years it doubles. Our population is forty millions, and doubles every twenty-five years. The increase in the wealth of the country, as shown by an able and accurate mathematician, would pay the whole debt in two years. In twenty-five years from this time our population will be eighty millions, and our property worth $86,414,000,000. To our increased wealth and population the whole debt would be no more than one fourth of it is to us. If, then, they mean repudiation we do not need it, and cannot afford it. If, in any other respect, they claim financial superiority, it is unfounded presumption.

Aside from this question of finance, this party promise nothing except to fight over and fight backwards the political battles of the last twelve years. Is the country prepared to embark in such a struggle? Do we want an Administration which will not only resist all further progress, as Mr. Johnson has done, but undertake to work the country back, act by act and measure by measure, to the days of Pierce and Buchanan? Is any human being to be benefited by it? Would it not be better to choose an Administration which will not only hold fast to the liberty and privileges already secured to the people, but, as time and opportunity permit, move slowly forward on the great Republican doctrine of equal political rights?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, addressed the committee upon the subject of the taxation of Government bonds. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I dislike very much to trespass upon the patience of the committee at this late hour. But I desire to say a few words upon the topics which have been discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. MULLINS. If the gentleman does not desire to go on to-night I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think what I have to say will require more than half an hour. But gentlemen can do as they please about the committee rising.

Mr. MULLINS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BECK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CULLOM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, (at nine o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition and affidavit of Mrs. Sarah Adelaide Scherr, widow of Captain William E. Scherr, asking for a pension.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 15, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. DRAKE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. DRAKE. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up now for consideration House bill No. 941, which was under consideration the day before yesterday. I do not mean, in asking this, to interfere with the morning business, and will give way for that if the Senate will be so kind as to allow the bill to be taken up, so that I may get a chance to have it put through. It is a House bill, with amendments agreed to by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. POMEROY. If the bill is not going to excite discussion I will not object; but if it is going to be debated all the morning hour—

Mr. DRAKE. I do not think it is, and I will give way immediately for the usual morning business if the Senate will allow the Committee on Naval Affairs to have its amendment considered.

Mr. POMEROY. Yesterday morning we lost the morning hour and all the day; and if this bill is going to excite discussion I shall object to its being taken up now.

Mr. DRAKE. I will state for the information of the Senator from Kansas that this is simply a bill in regard to naval affairs that came from the House, and the Naval Committee of the Senate propose certain amendments to it which I do not think will give rise to discussion. We acted on part of them the other day; and all I want is that the amendments may be concluded and the bill go back to the House of Representatives for agreement in these amendments. I do not think any such result as the Senator from Kansas apprehends will follow the allowing of this bill to come up. I beg him not to interpose an objection.

Mr. POMEROY. With the understanding that it is not to be discussed I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate unanimously consent to take up the bill at this time?

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to hear the title of the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps.

By unanimous consent, the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the fourth section, to strike out in line three the words "are hereby" and insert "shall on the 1st day of November next be;" and after the word "repealed" to insert "except as to assistant surgeons;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts and part of acts authorizing the appointment of temporary acting officers in the Navy shall, on the 1st day of November next, be repealed, except as to assistant surgeons.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Committee on Naval Affairs further proposed to amend the bill by adding the following additional sections:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That officers who have been promoted in pursuance of the ninth section of the "Act to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy," passed March 2, 1867, shall be entitled to receive, from the date of such promotion, the same pay, when not on active duty, that they were at the time of being so promoted entitled to when not on such duty, under the laws then in force regulating the pay of officers on the retired and reserved lists of the Navy; and the said ninth section of said act is hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the students in the Naval Academy shall hereafter be styled cadet midshipmen; and they shall be selected and appointed as prescribed in the eighth section of the "Act to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy," passed March 2, 1867, and shall be subject to the laws applicable to the students at said Academy under the style of midshipmen. When cadet midshipmen shall have passed successfully the graduating examination at said academy they shall receive warrants as midshipmen, ranking according to merit; and as such shall have the rank, lineal and relative, and receive the pay now held and received by ensigns. And such midshipmen as have heretofore graduated at said academy, but have not yet become ensigns, shall in like manner receive warrants as midshipmen, of the date of their graduation, and shall from that date be entitled to the rank and pay aforesaid. The number of midshipmen in the Navy shall not be limited by any law now in force, but shall be according to the number of graduates of said academy now holding the rank of midshipmen, with such as may hereafter, upon graduation, become from time to time midshipmen under the terms of this section. And all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this section are hereby repealed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no further appointment of ensigns shall be made; and whenever there shall no longer remain in the Navy any officer of that grade the grade shall be abolished. Future promotions of midshipmen shall be to the grade of master.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed; and the title was amended to read, "A bill to amend certain acts concerning the Navy."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of Army officers, praying for the passage of the bill to fix and equalize the pay of officers and to establish the pay of enlisted soldiers of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying the passage of the bill granting pensions to the surviving soldiers in the war of 1812; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CORBETT presented a memorial of Rev. John Schoenmakers, against the ratification of the treaty with the Osage Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the common council of Lawrence, Kansas, in favor of the ratification of the treaty with the Osage Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report on House bill No. 818, the civil appropriation bill, was yesterday agreed to. I am informed that the legislative clause in the bill in regard to the patent fund was not acted upon in either House, and will create embarrassment. I have not had time to examine it. I ask that the motion to reconsider be entered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report has been sent, with the bill, to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a motion that it be recalled for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORGAN and Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted amendments intended to be proposed to House bill No. 1841; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of George Fuerst, praying to be allowed transportation to Fort Vancouver, Washington Territory, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 310) to incorporate the Georgetown and Washington Canal and Sewerage Company, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following message, memorials, and petition, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A message of the President of the United States of February 19, 1868, communicating a list of the names of counterfeiters pardoned by the President since May 1, 1865;

Memorials of citizens of Louisiana, protesting against the reconstruction laws of Congress; and

A petition of citizens of New York praying an extension of the time of the fifty per cent. clause of the bankrupt law.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 177) regulating the rights of property of married women in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 161) providing that a certain part of the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, shall not take effect until the 1st day of March 1869, which was read and passed to a second reading.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. CAMERON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate twenty-five thousand extra copies of the last agricultural report, and five thousand extra copies for distribution by the Agricultural Bureau.

CORRECTION OF A REPORT.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I rise to a privileged question. I observe in the report in the Chronicle this morning:

"Mr. COLE spoke in favor of the amendment of the Finance Committee, expressing the opinion, however, that the third section, authorizing the interchange of bonds and lawful money, would lead to great confusion in the money market."

Though in favor of the report of the Finance Committee, I expressed no such sentiment as that attributed to me in the latter part of this paragraph. It is seldom that I take notice of what is said concerning me, or reported as from me, in the papers, and I would not now except that this entirely misrepresents my views.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, inclosing a list of the States of the Union whose Legislatures have ratified the proposed fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and a copy of the resolutions of ratification, as called for in the Senate's resolution of the 9th instant, together with a copy of the respective resolutions of the Legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey purporting to rescind the resolutions of ratification of the amendment which had previously been adopted by the Legislatures of those two States respectively, or to withdraw their consent to the same; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report to Congress, with the accompanying papers, from the Secretary of State, in compliance with the requirements of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856; which was ordered to lie on the table.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, disagreed to by the House; and

On motion by Mr. TRUMBULL,

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the House amendment to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. VICKERS.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 618) legalizing certain locations of agricultural college scrip therein designated; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation, over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CATTELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the Manufacturers' National Bank of New York to change its location; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1431) granting a pension to Emmelene H. Rudd, widow of the late Commodore John Rudd, deceased, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMERICAN STEAM LINE TO EUROPE.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to take up House bill No. 939.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POMEROY. I only wish to say that this is an effort to establish an American line of steamships. It is giving that line in part what we have been giving to foreign lines in years back. I suppose every member of the Senate has read this bill, and I think it is easily to be understood. For some years past we have been giving to a European line all the postage that was earned. To two of the lines that we have employed we have given over five hundred thousand dollars a year, to the Cunard line nearly three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and to the Inman line $200,000. This is what we have been paying for the last three years on the average. It was thought a year ago that we might establish an American line and not give them any more than we are giving European lines. This company applied for a subsidy something like the Pacific line, but as the committee thought it was inopportune to press that question the House of Representatives have finally sent us a bill giving them no subsidy, but simply securing to them for a term of years the postages accruing on the letters that they carry, to the amount of $400,000 a year. That sum is to be sequestered by the Post Office Department, and to be paid out for the services of this company according to the terms of the bill. There is no liability of the Government beyond that. There is no indorsement of the bonds. There is no liability beyond what is received from the postages on the letters they carry, and when they amount to over four hundred thousand dollars the balance goes to the Government, and in no event in future years can they get over four hundred thousand dollars, but they can get the postages to that amount, to be held by the Post Office Department, and paid out annually in discharging the interest of the bonds that the company are allowed to issue, the Government not guarantying the bonds, not becoming security for the payment of either principal or interest, but only holding the postages as a security for the interest on the bonds the company issue.

I know it is the morning hour, and every Senator dislikes at this time to listen to extended remarks; but as this bill has passed the House of Representatives unanimously and been reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I hope it may pass at once.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I wish to say that upon this subject of aiding in the establishment of American lines of sea-going steamships, there is no one who has a deeper interest in favor of such establishment of lines than myself; and my course upon this bill, whatever it shall be, is guided by the interest I feel in the accomplishment of that end, and not by opposition to any particular scheme, except so far as that scheme opposed may be in the way of the establishment of proper lines. I was unfortunate in not being in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which I am a member, when the committee concluded to report this bill, though I was in the committee on other occasions when it was considered. I may say here that I would not have consented to its being reported. I do not know to what extent it had the indorsement of the committee. Perhaps the honorable chairman of the committee [Mr. RAMSEY] can state that.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think it met the approbation of a quorum of the committee then present.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like, in the first place, to have the bill read as printed for the Senate. It is not very long, and its reading will not take much time. After it has been read I will proceed with what I have to say.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I believe that it is a disgraceful fact to this nation that there is not an American steam line upon the Atlantic ocean. Whatever aid should be required from the public Treasury to establish such a line or lines in my opinion would be a good investment; but the plan, according to which the bill proposes to provide for the establishment of a line, is one that does not meet my approbation. Let us see what that is.

The plan proposed in this bill is that the company shall be guaranteed for a period of twenty years in a claim upon the weekly or semi-weekly postages, both the inland and sea postages, until such period as the sea postages alone shall make up the necessary amount, upon the credit of which bonds to the amount of between four and five million dollars are to be issued by the company, for which the bill provides that the Government shall be in no wise responsible, but they are required to be registered at the Post Office Department, and countersigned by the Postmaster General, or head of that Department, which, if done, is to be done for the purpose of giving them credit in the world's markets without fixing any responsibility upon which that credit is to be based. That is the credit derived from that particular source; I mean the official indorsement. Now, suppose this company should fail and these bonds should depreciate in the market and remain unpaid, which is not, I apprehend, an impossibility, what would the state of the case be? Bonds floating around the markets of the world, registered, registered in the Post Office Department of the United States of America, countersigned by the head of that Department—

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator may not be aware that that is not the provision of the bill. They are not to be countersigned by the Postmaster General. That is not in the bill. This is the provision:

For the protection of the holders of such bonds they shall be severally registered at the Post Office Department, and certified by the chief clerk of the Department, without liability.

And that is to be put on the bond.

Mr. CONNESS. That is precisely as I have stated it. The chief clerk in the Post Office Department is the official exponent of the Postmaster General. The point I was making is this: that if these bonds are discredited we shall necessarily be discredited on their account if we do not pay them, notwithstanding the provision that we are not to be made responsible for their payment.

I object to that point. I object, also, to the guarantee or the lien that is established for twenty years in behalf of this company upon the inland and sea postages. The postages of this country, the laws relating to them, should be left free. There should be no answer made to us here when we propose to reduce the postage, as I hope we shall do so soon, to the lowest possible amount, that there are bonds issued on the faith of these postages as now established, and that if we reduce their amount we are responsible necessarily for these bonds if we take their substance or base away. I want no impediment of that kind in the way of postal reform.

In fact, sir, if we are to have an American line or lines to compete successfully with foreign lines in the Atlantic waters, or which shall reflect credit upon the American name and nation, they must have more substantial basis than this. The company or persons who will establish them must be able to build their ships, and their ships must be of the most unquestionable character and quality.

I object to the tonnage specified here. Ships of that tonnage are not of sufficient size for this day and hour in naval architecture and for the carriage of passengers and freight.

But I have stated my principal objection, which is to the plan upon which this line is to be established. There are some details which I might object to, but my purpose is not to defeat the bill, it being near the end of the session, by consuming time. I simply wish it fairly considered and to have the Senate decide whether they are in favor of this plan for the establishment of an American line of steamships on the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I hope that this bill will pass the Senate. It has passed the House of Representatives, and I think it must commend itself to every person who feels a proper pride in having our mails carried in an American line of vessels, and who will examine the act.

There is one peculiarity about this bill, that it asks for no subsidies. It asks the Government to give nothing at all, simply to recognize this line as a line to carry the mails; that is all. By doing that we have a line of American ships carrying our own mails, the ships to be first class, to be constructed under the inspection of Government officers, and to be subject to be taken by the Government in case of necessity for its use. So far, then, as the vessels are concerned, there is every possible guard. Now, all that the line asks the Government to do is to be trustees for the bonds which this line issues; and to hold those bonds and to hold the postages as security for the payment of the interest.

Mr. HOWARD. For what purpose are bonds to be issued?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bonds are to be issued by the company for the purpose of constructing their vessels. There is no liability on the part of the Government. Even the failure to pay these bonds would not involve the Government in any dishonor whatever.

Now, what is the compensation? In 1858 there was an act passed providing that when our mails were carried in an American line the parties carrying them should receive as compensation both the sea-going and inland postage; where they were carried in foreign lines they should only receive the sea postage. This bill provides that this line shall receive the inland and the sea postage until the sea postage amounts to $400,000. When it amounts to that sum then after that they are only to receive the sea postage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Until the sea postage amounts to $400,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir; until the sea postage amounts to $400,000; then the inland postage is no longer to be received. I hope there will be no opposition to this bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Do I understand that this bill provides that the Government shall stand as guarantor for the payment of the bonds?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all; it merely holds the bonds as trustee, not as guarantor.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Government be in any event liable for the payment of these bonds?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. None whatever; it is only as any other trustee, to account for the money in its hands.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator from Michigan will read section four he will find the provision of the bill on that subject.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not a copy by me.

Mr. CONNESS. I will read it. Section four reads thus:

That to insure the construction of the above-mentioned vessels within the time and in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the maintenance of the said line, the said Commercial Navigation Company may issue bonds to such an amount that the entire annual interest thereon shall not exceed the sum of $250,000, such bonds to be made payable at the expiration of the before-named twenty years, and the interest thereof to be made payable semi-annually, the principal and interest of such bonds to be made payable in coin of the United States. That for the protection of the holders of such bonds they shall be severally registered at the Post Office Department and certified by the chief clerk of the Department, without liability for the payment of the interest or principal of said bonds upon the part of the Post Office Department only in manner as hereinafter provided.

That is to say, these postages are made the basis upon which the bonds are to be issued.

And the Postmaster General shall receive all moneys for postage earned by the steamships of said company, and shall apply the same as far as needed to the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the before-named bonds, and shall retain the surplus after paying such interest, and shall invest the same quarterly in the securities of the United States to form a sinking fund, to be held solely for the benefit of the bondholders, and to be applied to the payment of the principal of such bonds. And whenever, and as soon as such sinking fund shall equal in amount the entire principal of said bonds, then from that time forward the interest of said bonds shall be paid out of the income of such sinking fund, and the principal thereof out of the same fund at their maturity. And all postage earned after the time when said sinking fund shall be made up to the amount aforesaid shall belong to and be paid quarterly to the said company by the Postmaster General of the United States.

That is to say, the Postmaster General is to manage the financial part of their business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to make an inquiry. I do not know that I have any opposition to this bill; I rather approve of the principle contained in the bill; but I desire to make an inquiry for information. I find that section three provides:

That the compensation for carrying and transporting the mails by sea, as herein provided, shall be agreed upon, and shall be in conformity with the act of Congress approved June 11, 1858, and shall, in no event or contingency, exceed the sum therein provided, being all postage on letters, newspapers, and all other matter transported by or in the mails carried by said navigation company, shall belong to said company, and shall be paid to said navigation company quarterly, or applied to their use or benefit, as hereinafter provided.

According to that section, as I understand it, the postages that are received are to be applied to pay the company for transporting the mails to the amount of $400,000 a year. That is the way in which they are to be paid, and the postages constitute the fund out of which the payment is to be made. Now, section four provides that these postages, if I understand the bill, shall be applied in another and a different way. That provides that—

The Postmaster General shall receive all moneys for postages earned by the steamships of said company, and shall apply the same as far as needed to the payment of the semi-annual interest upon the before-named bonds.

The difficulty that occurs to my mind is that the postages are appropriated for one purpose in one section of the bill and appropriated for another purpose in another section. It may be, however, that I do not understand the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand it to be this: the Commercial Navigation Company is the party with whom the contract is made; they issue the bonds; they are to receive the compensation for carrying the mails in postages; the Post Office Department acts as trustee, receives and holds for them the postages which compensate the Commercial Navigation Company for carrying the mails; but instead of paying that money to the company the Department holds it and pays the interest on the bonds of the company. That is the whole of it.

Mr. POMEROY. Holds it to pay the interest on the bonds in part, and the balance is held as a sinking fund.

Mr. MORTON. I am for this bill. I am in favor of building up American shipping. That is my general feeling. But I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question touching the construction of the third section in relation to the compensation. It provides that the company shall receive the postages according to a certain act of Congress approved in 1858. The provision is that they shall not receive more than is allowed by that act. That I suppose is a general act fixing the price of ocean postage, is it not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That act provides that where the mails are carried in an American line, that line shall be entitled to receive the sea postage and the inland postage, and that where the mails are carried in a foreign line that line shall only receive the sea postage. This third section provides that this company shall receive the sea postage and the inland postage until the sea postage amounts to $400,000 a year, and that after that it shall be restricted to the sea postage and shall not receive the inland postage.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that; but my question goes to this point: whether this general act of 1858 fixes the rate of sea postage, and whether if a subsequent act should be passed making postage cheaper at the end of five or ten years this compensation would be governed by the rate of postage that might be fixed in a subsequent act of Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It has been changed several times since 1858. The contract is made subject to such sums as may be passed on that point.

Mr. POMEROY. We can change the rate of postage at any time.

Mr. MORTON. That is satisfactory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask a question merely for information. I notice that the provision to which the Senator from New Jersey has referred is that when the sea postage amounts to $400,000 or more the company shall be confined to that, as I understand it. Suppose the postage amounts to $300,000, and the inland postage to as much more, then they are to continue to receive the whole amount, I suppose, up to the time when the sea postage alone amounts to $400,000. Is that the construction?

Mr. RAMSEY. The sea postage is twelve cents, and the inland postage but three cents, so that there could not be that equality in the aggregate of the postages that the Senator from Maine supposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely put the question by way of illustration. Is it intended that they shall receive the sea postage and the inland postage, whatever each may amount to, supposing both together may amount to $600,000, until the sea postage goes up to $400,000?

Mr. RAMSEY. The inland postage can at no time be more than one fourth of the sea postage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But if at any time the sea postage itself amounts to double $400,000 they will be entitled to receive it. They are not limited to $400,000 at all events, as far as I can see. I merely want to know what is meant, whether it is meant that $400,000 a year shall be the limit to which they can go. If so, it ought to be expressed.

Mr. NYE. The provision is that whenever the sea postage shall amount to $400,000, the right of the company to receive the inland postage shall cease. The bill fairly gives to them the sea postage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be right; I am not objecting to it; but I ask if in the course of ten years from the present time the sea postage alone should amount to double $400,000 is it the intention of the bill that they shall receive the whole? Is it also the intention of the bill that if the sea postage and the inland postage together amount to $600,000, so that the sea postage itself does not quite come up to $400,000, they shall receive the whole until it does come up to $400,000? If this be the meaning of it it does not limit them to $400,000 altogether.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I think this bill should pass, because I think that American postal matter should go in American steamers rather than in British steamers. We have been paying out for years to the amount of $500,000, the whole amount of the subsidy, to the Cunard and to other steamers by the postage which we have paid to those steamers. It will be an absolute saving to the Government to establish this American line of steamers, because the entire cost to the Government in the way of postage will be only $400,000 a year, while the amount which we pay out now to English steamers is $500,000. Then there is an indirect advantage, which will be very great, resulting from the establishment of this line of steamers. The Cunard steamers run to $1,300,000 annually in the way of freights. A large portion of that will come to this American line if it is established. It now happens that when an American vessel goes into one of the docks at Liverpool or any of the English ports, they put into half-tide basins, as they are called, where they are exposed to damage, and they have to run their own risk. The English lines immediately put into some other harbor near by one of the first-class English vessels, and under the notice in the English harbor of the entrance of this American vessel put the entrance of the English vessel; and they put down the price of freightage to about two thirds what the American vessel can carry it for; and in that way American vessels are not able to get freight from the English harbors. The English vessel which takes the freight does not suffer the loss; the Cunard, the Inman, and the Bremen line of steamers divide the loss on this freight; and so American navigation suffers by the establishment of the English lines, and the subsidy to them is paid out of the American Treasury in the way of postage.

Then, sir, there are large numbers of emigrants now waiting for passage in Germany and in different parts of the islands of Great Britain who cannot come to this country because they have no means of conveyance. It has happened that within a little period Americans have chartered vessels and sent them over to England and Bremen to secure these passengers, and immediately advertisements have been put up all about the city that they were unseaworthy in order to prevent the emigrants from taking passage with American lines of steamers. Let us have an American line of steamers, and we shall then be able to bring these emigrants to this country; we shall be able to take freightage from Europe; we shall be able to carry our own mail matter under the American flag, and in time of war it will not be exposed to the enemies of the country.

Mr. MORTON, of Vermont. Mr. President, I am decidedly in favor of establishing a line of American steamships to transport some portion of the American mails, passengers, and American freight. I think it is almost disgraceful that it has not been done heretofore, and in doing this I think we ought to do it in a way and manner which will satisfy the country for some considerable period of time. The bill as presented, however, in my judgment, covers much too long a time. Twenty years in the progress of improvements for steamships is a long period, and to grant a monopoly for that length of time to a single line of steamers I think would be attended with some inconvenience. Especially we should be likely to find at the end of the term that there had been great advances and improvements during that time, so that we could either obtain the service for a less price, or obtain a very much better service for the same price. I shall therefore move several amendments which I will now indicate.

In the second section, in line five, I would strike out "five of," before "which," and in lines six and seven strike out the words "and two others of not less than two thousand tons each." If we are to pay for a first-class service here we do not want to place it in the power of this company to at once inaugurate and perpetuate a second class service. I know that some of the enemies of this company charge that the company are immediately going to buy a couple of inferior vessels and put them upon the service. I do not believe that that is their purpose; but I want to place it out of their power to do that or anything else less than we have a right to expect. If we are to grant this large amount of postages for their benefit and for a long series of years, amounting to millions of dollars, let us at least have the first-class service we bargain for.

While I am on the floor I will indicate some further amendments which I think ought to be made. It should be made clear in the third section, what is meant by the provision in regard to the postages. Ordinary readers will understand it to mean that the company are to have only $400,000 a year of the postages. I think that is quite enough, for this is to give the company, as I understand, a monopoly of the business; but if it were not enough I would be willing to increase the amount. Any company that carries the mail of the United States has great prestige. I would therefore move to impose a limit that it shall be confined to $400,000.

Then, in all places when "twenty years" are mentioned, I would move to substitute "ten years." Twenty years is altogether too long a period—two thirds of a generation! Then to section six I shall propose a proviso by which we shall secure first-class service. If we are to give this contract to this company we do not want any "slow coaches" on the line; they must equal other lines engaged in the same kind of business. My proviso to the sixth section will be that if for the period of three months they shall fall below the average rate of speed, shall make slower voyages than other steamships sailing between the same points, the act shall in that event be null and void.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Vermont will look at the first section he will see that it provides that these steamers shall be first class sea-going steamships.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know there is that general provision but there is no way of enforcing it. I propose, if we pass this bill, that we shall do the business in earnest. I am earnestly in favor of having an American line, but I do not want to have an American line and have it inferior to and distanced by any foreign line.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. The first section provides that the contract shall be "for a term not exceeding twenty years;" and the second section gives the Postmaster General "power to modify such agreements from time to time as may best promote the object in view."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would quite as soon trust the wisdom of Congress as the wisdom of any Postmaster General. I propose that we shall fix the matter according to our own discretion.

Mr. POMEROY. And the eighth section says that Congress may at any time hereafter during the period of twenty years terminate or abandon the contract.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know; but if we make this arrangement for twenty years, and we should undertake to terminate it before that time, they would ask us to make them some compensation for damages. I do not propose to leave it so that there will be any contingency about damages, and twenty years is too long a time for any mail contract to run.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask my friend from Vermont whether he would be willing that the United States should make a contract with this company or with anybody else, and then terminate that contract before the time limited for its expiration, and not compensate them for the injury thereby done?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I certainly would not, and therefore I propose to have it fixed at ten years, so that there shall be no question of damages about it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In fixing a contract of this kind where parties are going into an investment of millions, time is of the very essence of its whole value. Nobody would go into this expenditure of four or five million dollars for a contract of a few years. I think the bill as it stands in that regard is as correct as it can be made:

Congress may at any time hereafter during the period of twenty years, terminate or abandon any contract of the United States with such company, and having a due regard to the accrued rights of the said company, alter, repeal, or amend this act.

Then, as to the other suggestion of my friend—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish what I have to say. He is making a longer speech by way of interruption of me than I proposed to make myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is regularly before the Senate, being the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. NYE. I hope the honorable Senator who has that bill in charge will allow it to be passed over informally for a few minutes, and I think we may get a vote on this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. If it is the intention of those who make themselves the peculiar friends of this bill to resist amendments reconciling it to what we have done in other cases, and to what seems to some of us at least proper to do, they cannot pass it in a few minutes.

Mr. NYE. I do not know what the honorable Senator from California means when he talks about "the peculiar friends of this bill."

Mr. CONNESS. I will explain—

Mr. NYE. I am no more a peculiar friend to this bill than I am to any other. I have witnessed for long years the dwarfing and dwindling of our commerce until I have seen that not a mail goes from our country under the American flag; and, in that respect, when I see that the postages alone will pay for the investment, and start and sustain and maintain a line of steamers under our own flag, I do feel a "peculiar interest" in having that state of things brought about. I have no other interest than that.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator from Nevada need not at what I said have gone off into a pet. It would be very far from me to impute to that honorable Senator, or to any other Senator, such a sense to the word I used as to need the expression of any indignation at all. I meant, what I was going to say, if the Senator had permitted me, those who are in favor of passing the bill without amendment, nothing more. I am in favor of its passage if Senators will consent to its proper amendment, and not otherwise.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask that the Indian appropriation bill be laid aside informally until we come to a vote on this bill.

Mr. HOWE. If the vote could be taken, I would not object, but it has already been intimated that there are amendments to be moved.

Mr. POMEROY. It is so late in the session that I think it important to dispose of this bill when we have it before us. I feel no more interest in it than I suppose every Senator does who is concerned for the public interest, but it was placed in my charge by the committee, and I have tried on that account to secure its passage.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he does not think he will expedite the measure by laying it aside, and having a conference with those gentlemen who wish to amend it. There seem to be differences of opinion prevailing about the bill at present, and a little conference among Senators perhaps would reconcile those differences.

Mr. POMEROY. The simple proposition whether this contract shall run for ten or twenty years can be settled by a vote very soon. There is only one way to settle it.

Mr. HOWE. With how long a time will the Senator be satisfied?

Mr. POMEROY. I should presume thirty or forty minutes would be sufficient.

Mr. HOWE. Then if there be no objection in any other quarter I shall consent that the appropriation bill be laid aside informally for half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the consideration of House bill No. 939 will be continued for half an hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, a monopoly of the mails of the United States to Europe introduces a new system, and it is one which any company can afford to offer liberal terms in order to obtain. It is a matter of some question whether this system is a better one than to give to all vessels the postages which might accrue on the mails they carry. I, for one, am strongly in favor of establishing a line of American steamships, and I do think there ought to be some party in favor of the interests of the United States and not all upon the side of the navigation company; that we should see to it that we obtain first-class service; and the amendments which I propose I think will secure that, and then, if there should be, ten years hence, such improvements, such changes as may require a different system, we shall have it within our power to make a new contract. Certainly, ten years is a long time for any one company to have a monopoly of this business. It is twice and a half as long as any land-service contracts are given out, and it would seem to be long enough for any sea service. I move, in the first place, in line fourteen of section one, to strike out "twenty" before the word "years" and insert "ten."

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that will not be agreed to. The Senator from Vermont seems to apprehend that those who are in favor of this bill are not in favor of the American Government, but are in favor of some company. I apprehend—and if I had not have so thought I should not have reported the bill—that this bill is for an American line in the interest of the American Government. Of course it is not simply for carrying mails; there is a system of emigration connected with it which will be of great interest to the country, and I confess that that section of country which I try here in part to represent is more interested in that feature than in simply carrying the mails.

The Senator from Vermont is always an American and for American interests, especially on questions of tariff and trade between this country and other countries. I thought this was peculiarly in that interest, and it was surprising to me that the Senator from Vermont should not have so considered it. The Senator must be aware that for an American company to start out and raise from five to seven million dollars and get into successful competition with the companies that are subsidized by the British Government, requires no ordinary energy and no ordinary capital. To guard against a continued monopoly, to be complained of by American citizens, such as the Senator suggests, those who drew this bill were led to insert in it a provision that at any time during the twenty years Congress may terminate or may abandon the contract, or amend or repeal the act. They can require such additional speed or security as the interests of the service may require. We do not lose our control over it.

We give, we think, in this bill enough to encourage a company to organize; and give them standing and character sufficient to raise some capital, and, within one year, to put seven steamers on the ocean. It is no ordinary enterprise. It is an enterprise of magnificent proportions. The Senator from California knows very well what the Pacific line have been required to do, and how they have labored, and the obstacles they have had to overcome; and that with a subsidy of five millions hanging over them—that is $500,000 a year for ten years. This company, without a subsidy guaranteed of that character, but having precisely what we give the foreign lines, now propose to do the same thing; and I cannot see why we should not, at least, allow them to try the experiment. I know very well that we hereafter, in the course of ten or twelve years, require greater speed, different kinds of vessels; but that whole subject is within the control of Congress.

At a hint from the Senator from New Jersey, I will not say any more. I see he wants to vote, and, as I believe the Senate understand the measure, I will be contented to abide by the vote.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, Mr. President, we are not going to vote until this question is discussed a little. We have had some precedents in this business, and I am only a little astonished to find gentlemen so ready to travel out of the line of the precedents established. We have subsidized two lines of steamships; one is the line to Brazil for ten years; the other the line between San Francisco, Japan, and China, for ten years. In the one case we pay $150,000 per annum for the first-named service; in the second case we pay for twelve round trips a year $500,000 per annum for a distance exceeding six thousand miles per trip; a round trip doubling that reaching about thirteen thousand miles. This is a very considerable subsidy if it be reduced to $400,000, and I should be willing to vote them more than that. But why shall we leave the track of these precedents, I ask the Senator from Kansas?

It is very properly stated by the Senator from Vermont that twenty years of time is now a great period. Why shall we mortgage the postages of the United States for twenty years? Is it necessary for the purpose of establishing this line? The Senator from Kansas says that it is to be established against subsidized lines. That is not true, sir. There is but one subsidized line, and that subsidy is now about to be withdrawn, and will be withdrawn. The Senator shakes his head. It is to be withdrawn, sir; and some of the most successful lines now crossing the Atlantic receive no subsidy from any source. Among these are the Bremen line and the Inman line; the Inman line never received a subsidy. But I am not arguing against a subsidy because I would put an American line beyond the peradventure or question of success; but I am not in favor of voting the postages of this country for twenty years.

The Senator says that the last section provides that we may alter or amend or repeal this bill at any time; and what does it provide for otherwise in another section? That bonds for twenty years for between four and five millions of dollars shall be issued by this company based upon the postages. Suppose we change the act before that time, shall we not be responsible to the holders of those bonds? Of course we shall be.

I hope, sir, we shall not change in this respect the rule that has been established. Ten years of time is long enough. I would sooner vote $800,000 of postages for ten years than $400,000 for twenty years. Who would not? I think it would be very bad statesmanship to refuse to vote double the amount for half the time. The navigation of the Atlantic has changed and is changing very rapidly. Within the last two years there has been a mighty change. Why is this? The whole American nation in the last five years have taken to traveling. In the last two years the travel has doubled and quadrupled; and it will go on at that rate because there is no country in the world the population of which are so well off, so able to travel, as that of ours, and navigating the Atlantic ocean is no longer a problem of success.

But, Mr. President, if the friends of this bill are disposed to fix upon us a monopoly of the postages for twenty years with bonds to be issued based upon them, so that we are to be made responsible, then I, for one, object to the passage of the bill in toto, and propose to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, striking out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Fessenden, Harlan, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sherman, Tipton, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Drake, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Ross, Stewart, Wade, and Welch—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, McDonald, Norton, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, and Yates—21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know that the next amendment is so important; but still I think we ought not to permit any of these vessels to be of so low a tonnage as two thousand tons. All the vessels that are engaged in this business are of much larger tonnage, and if we are to make this line a respectable line, and one that is to grapple in competition with other lines and be a success, the ships all ought to be not less than three thousand tons burden. I therefore move in line five of section two to strike out the words "five of," and in lines six and seven to strike out "and two others of not less than two thousand tons each;" so as to read: "seven first-class sea-going steamships which shall not be of less than three thousand tons each."

Mr. NYE. I despair entirely of having anything passed here that will be of the least benefit. Every effort that has been made to establish a line of steamers, when the proposition comes before Congress, is a foot too long or a foot too short or too narrow for somebody. One man wants ships of two thousand tons and another of three thousand tons. So it goes on until I have come to the conclusion that it is the settled determination of the legislative power of this country that there shall never be another ocean steamship that has the countenance and support of the Government under our own flag. There has been a line of steamers established lately across the Atlantic by efforts made in the city of Baltimore, and yet it does not carry the American flag except when it enters our port. It sails under a foreign flag. Our own stars and stripes are doomed to banishment from the great ocean, because there is no sort of plan upon which a majority of Congress can be found to agree which will provide for an American line.

Now, sir, the project before the Senate as presented in the bill reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was simply this: this company proposed for the postages for twenty years to establish a line of steamers consisting of seven ships, which could not cost in the market, as is well known, built in this country, where the bill obligates them to build them, less than $6,000,000. That is a large outlay, an outlay that but very few men will undertake. Now I ask my ever-ready mathematical friend from Vermont to see what $400,000 for twenty years will come to.

Mr. CONNESS. Ten years.

Mr. NYE. Twenty years; I am talking about the bill. Now, sir, with this encouragement, without the possibility of bringing the Government into liability for one penny, this company offer to undertake this work allowing the power to be reserved to cancel or abolish the contract at any time, first with the Postmaster General, and second with Congress.

Sir, what does the history of the past show in regard to this matter? We once had one of the best lines of steamships that this country or any other ever saw. It was driven from the ocean by foreign Powers and by individual exertions here. The history of the past shows that those experiments have been failures where the Government voted millions of dollars to uphold them. Why were they failures? In the first place the outlay of the Collins line was too great, and in the next place they were run on the most extravagant plan possible, and subsequent invention, subsequent discoveries in science, have shown that ships of the same size can now be run for much less money. Hence these people are ready to undertake this work.

There are two classes of service that this line want to perform; the first is the mail service and general passenger business, and the next an immigrant line. These lighter ships of two thousand tons will answer for the immigrant business. In this connection let me say to my friend from Vermont that the three thousand-ton ships that this company propose to put upon the line will carry more passengers, are wider and deeper and broader than the four-thousand-ton ships at British measurement, of which the Cunarders are a fair sample. The three thousand-ton ship by our measurement has more surface measurement, carries more tons, has more room than a ship of four thousand tons British measurement. The Senator from California laughs with incredulity, but if he will look at the measurements of the two countries he will find that what I say is correct. I speak from the book.

But now my friend from Vermont is not satisfied with that. He wants to knock these two-thousand-ton ships out of this bill. "He is not satisfied with cutting down the term of the contract to ten years, but he wants to make it obligatory on the same company that take it for ten years to build a thousand tons more on the two ships, after he has already crippled and hampered them. I insist upon it that we might as well say once for all that we do not want or will not have a line of American steamers across the Atlantic ocean. Sir, it is a shame to the nation, it is a shame to the representatives of the nation, that this condition of things has been tolerated so long. We have sat quietly by and seen ship after ship driven from the ocean until the stars and stripes are a curiosity to-day in the greatest commercial emporium of the world, New York, and there is not a mail that goes from our shores that does not go in foreign bottoms.

Sir, I am earnest about this matter, and I hope my honorable friend from Vermont will not be too tenacious about his amendments. If we pass the bill now we can amend it next year; but I insist upon it, and I ask the honorable Senator from Vermont and the honorable Senator from California, for God's sake let us get once, and in this year, one American flag floating over an American vessel in which an American heart will feel pride as an American citizen steps on its deck to travel to a foreign country.

Mr. CONNESS rose.

Mr. NYE. My friend from California will be patient for a moment.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope I do not disturb the honorable Senator.

Mr. NYE. No; you do not disturb me; but you look as though you wanted to speak so bad that it bothers me a little. [Laughter.]

I insist upon it that the original bill ought to be passed. It is a great and liberal undertaking on the part of these contractors to attempt to do that. My opinion is that they will find themselves troubled when they attempt to do it; but I sincerely hope that this bill will pass, and that the honorable Senator from Vermont, when he has knocked ten years off from the existence of the contract, will not attempt to put two thousand tons more upon their vessels.

I have witnessed for years the failure of efforts to aid in the establishment of a line of American steamers, and the reason is that somebody always wants somebody else subsidized. If it is a line from Maine that is proposed, somebody wants a line from Boston; if it is a line from Boston some one from New York wants a line from New York; and so we go on and all find themselves beaten at last; and the sad, sickening, disgraceful spectacle is presented to us squarely in the face that we have not to-day afloat an American steamer that carries our mail. Sir, I want not only to see individuals but our property and our mails under the protection of our own flag.

Mr. CONNESS obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call up a privileged motion which is lying on the table—the resolution fixing the time of adjournment.

Several SENATORS. Not now.

Mr. SUMNER. Not to day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we ought to fix the time. The state of business is such that I think we can do it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That resolution can only be taken up at this time by common consent. I do not know that it has any privilege over any other question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to suspend all other business for the purpose of taking it up.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe the Senator cannot take the floor from me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not know that the Senator had the floor.

Mr. HOWE. I think I must call for the order of the day. I do not see that it is likely to have a vote on the bill which was called up by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CONNESS. I am as anxious that that bill shall pass as anybody, so that it is passed in the right form; but I think if we have a little time we shall perhaps agree in regard to it. I have an amendment to propose, which I think will reconcile what I will call again the friends of the bill to the amendment that has been made. I will endeavor to occupy as little time as possible.

Mr. POMEROY. I see there is such opposition to the bill that it will necessarily take some time. I am only sorry that it is not for a line of steamships in the Pacific seas, and then it would go through.

Mr. CONNESS. That is an entirely gratuitous speech which the honorable Senator from Kansas makes, and it is an unworthy one, too, in my opinion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The half hour for which the regular order was postponed has expired, and the unfinished business of yesterday is now regularly before the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1431) granting a pension to Emmeline H. Rudd, widow of the late Commodore John Rudd, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the vacancy upon the Committee on Foreign Relations caused by the resignation of Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, be filled by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. DOOLITTLE was appointed to supply the vacancy.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 818) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, and having laid on the table a motion to reconsider the vote thereon, it was out of the power of the House, except by unanimous consent, (which had been refused,) to return to the Senate, pursuant to its request, the resolution of the House agreeing to said report.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 631) amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges and to establish them as post roads;"

A bill (H. R. No. 818) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 567) relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance; and

A bill (H. R. No. 605) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869, and for other purposes.

WEST POINT AND CORNWALL ROAD.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 761) to construct a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing, all in the county of Orange, State of New York, to report it back without amendment. This is a bill of only ten lines, which passed the Senate on a former occasion, and I should like to have it put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point to use the labor in the employ of the United States Government at that post, when not otherwise employed, in building and constructing a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing in the county of Orange, the road to be located under the direction of the superintendent, over land now belonging or hereafter to be ceded to the Government of the United States for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 678) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows, namely: strike out all of said amendment after the word "laws" in line eight; and the Senate agree to the same so modified.

L. M. MORRILL,

GEO. F. EDMUNDS,

T. A. HENDRICKS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

B. F. BUTLER,

WM. LAWRENCE,

A. G. BURR,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Perhaps I ought to state to the Senate the effect of this report. It simply requires pensions to be paid from the pension fund. The House required the fund known as the naval pension fund to be covered into the Treasury; they now recede from that and leave the fund as now provided by law. That is the substance of the report.

The report was concurred in.

BRIDGES ON THE MISSOURI RIVER.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, which was to add to the bill the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, a corporation created by the laws of the State of Kansas, to build a bridge over and across the Missouri river at St. Joseph, Missouri; and all the rights and privileges conferred by sections one, two, four and five, of this act are hereby extended, so far as they are applicable, to the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, and conditions contained in said sections are hereby made applicable to said company.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1420) directing the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed to hear evidence and determine the right of W. H. Cox, deceased, late a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery, to a pension in the same manner as if he was still living, he having died of disease contracted while a prisoner of war at Andersonville, Georgia, and if found to be entitled to a pension, then the same from the time of his discharge till death to be paid over to his father, Charles D. Cox; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 296) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1078) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses, of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1869.

The next amendment was on page 63, line fifteen hundred and twenty-eight, to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty-five;" so that the clause will read:

For the purchase of cattle for beef and milk together with clothing and food, teams and farming tools for Indians in California, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to offer various amendments to this bill. The Clerk has a printed copy. He can read them.

The Chief Clerk read the first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was in line eleven, after "agents," to strike out "$99,000" and insert "$116,550;" so as to make the appropriation for the pay of superintendent of Indian affairs and of Indian agents $116,550.

Mr. HOWE. I would propose to the Senator to omit that amendment now until the other amendments on which that depends are acted on.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well; let it be passed over for the present and let the next be read.

The Chief Clerk read the next amendment, which was in line sixteen, under the heading of "Superintendents of Indian Affairs," after "California" to insert:

One for the State of Nevada, one for the Territory of Arizona, and one for Montana and Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighteen to strike out "one" and insert "three;" so as to allow three Indian agents for the tribes in Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-three to strike out "four" and insert "six;" so as to allow six Indian agents for the Indians east of the Rocky mountains.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-eight, after "Wisconsin," to strike out "one" and insert "three;" so as to allow three Indian agents for the tribes in Washington Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifty-three the following:

For temporary clerks to superintendents of Indian affairs, $5,000.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe there are eleven superintendents of Indian affairs. The Department say that it is necessary to furnish clerks to some of these superintendents, not for the entire year, but for a portion of the year. It is obligatory on the superintendents to keep the accounts of the Indians, especially in Washington Territory and Oregon and California, where the Indians now are farming to a very considerable extent, doing a large business, and I understand from the Department that it is necessary for the superintendent, there being but one to each of these States and Territories, to have, a portion of the year at any rate, a clerk. The Senator will find with the estimate of the Department in Senate Executive Document No. 62, which he has before him, about the middle of the second page:

Pay of temporary clerks for superintendents of Indian affairs, $5,000. This item is omitted in the bill. It is utterly impossible for superintendents to perform their duties with dispatch without the assistance of clerks.

I will state to the Senate that in looking at former appropriation bills I find that this appropriation has been for a number of years made. The business of superintendents is increasing, and very largely increasing, as the Indians become more civilized; that is, they have clerical duties to perform which they had not formerly. I can only state what the Department say in regard to it.

Mr. HOWE. It is introducing a new item of expenditure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not by any means. It has been made heretofore.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will pardon me, it is not new. It was left out I suppose accidentally by the House in the original bill. This is a service that must be had. The superintendents are compelled to travel a part of the time around the different agencies, and while they are away, the correspondence has to be taken care of, and during part of the year, therefore, they must have some clerical help.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator understand that this is an ordinary appropriation?

Mr. HARLAN. I think so. I think it is estimated for and appropriated regularly.

Mr. HOWE. I do not so understand it; but I may be wrong about it. If it is supposed to be necessary for the service, of course the money must be appropriated, but I was not able to see the necessity of it myself. I shall submit, however, to the vote of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was in lines fifty-four and fifty-five, after the words "pay of interpreters" to strike out "$20,400" and insert "$29,200."

Mr. HOWE. This amendment calls for an additional appropriation of over eight thousand dollars for the pay of interpreters. I will ask the Senator from Missouri if he supposes that additional sum to be necessary?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Department, in reference to this appropriation say, as follows:

"Pay of interpreters changed from $29,200 to $20,400, being a deficiency of $8,800. It is necessary that each agent and sub-agent should have an interpreter, and where one agent has charge of more than one tribe it is necessary to have one for each tribe. There are seventy agents and sub-agents, consequently there should be that number of interpreters. Only sixty-three are asked to be provided, which number is certainly not too great."

I believe that that gives a salary of $500 to interpreters west of the mountains, and a salary of $400 per annum to interpreters east of the mountains, and there are sixty-three asked for, which, at the prices I have named, amounts to $29,200, the amount I asked for. I am exceedingly anxious to reduce the expenses of the department, but I cannot understand how it is that this item of $20,400, contrary to all the precedents on the subject, should have been adopted. I do not understand that interpreters can be employed at such prices as to enable the department to get along with that amount of money. If I saw that it was possible to do so, I should not ask to increase it, but my impression is that the department do not ask for more than they ought to have. Surely qualified interpreters cannot be employed for a less sum of money, and the Senator will see at once the number that is required. I refer him to page 2 of the remarks of the department on the subject of this bill as it came to the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifty-five:

For presents to Indians, $5,000.
For provisions for Indians, $11,800.

Mr. HOWE. I must ask for an explanation of that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that it has been usual in years past to make a small appropriation, and put it in the power of the Department at certain times when it is supposed that something in the way of an amicable feeling may be encouraged with Indian tribes, to use a small amount of money in making presents. It has heretofore been appropriated, and the Department ask that it should be done now. As a general thing I am not very favorable to making these presents; but the Department thinks that it will facilitate their operations to have a small sum appropriated.

The $11,800 asked for provisions ought certainly to be appropriated. I can state to the Senate what I understand to be the object of that appropriation. Sometimes it becomes necessary for superintendents or agents to notify Indians to appear before them, and sometimes Indians from other tribes visit them, and on occasions of that sort it is absolutely essential during the time of the visits to support the Indians that come. It is a very small amount of money, and I suppose it can be profitably used. Something of course ought to be had for occasions of that character. The Senate will see at once that occasions may arise where peace commissioners make visits from one tribe to another, where it is necessary to make expenditures, where the Department ought to have some fund at its discretion to pay these expenses. As to the presents, I care but little about that item.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose substantially both appropriations are for presents. Whenever the Indians are called to a conference with the agents or officers of the Government, it is on the business of the Indians themselves, and they are always able to travel. The means of locomotion, being provided by themselves, are always at hand. They are never at a want for such facility. It appropriates just so much money for which there is no just accountability, and I think the sooner we drop off these expenditures, which are not required by any law, not required by any treaty, and which I submit with all respect are not required by any necessity of the service, the better. Come down to the contracts existing, and abide by those, and make new ones when these existing ones are found inadequate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 4; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. HOWE. There is evidently a disposition to agree to this amendment. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs himself says that one branch of it is not necessary. I do not think either is necessary. I hope the Senate will not insist upon an appropriation on which both committees are at least indifferent or disagree. I hope the Senate will not force any money out of the Treasury.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose, in order to compromise the case between the two committees, it would be well perhaps to withdraw that part of the amendment which relates to presents and let the other go, if that will be satisfactory to the Senator. I have no desire to press against his wishes the first part of the amendment; but the latter portion of it the Senator will see from the explanation I have made may be very necessary. I suppose if the money is not needed by the Department it will not be used, but will remain in the Treasury. There are occasions when this money might well be used beneficially to the Government, and I think that that portion of the amendment anyhow ought to be adopted. I will withdraw the first part of it, "for presents to Indians $5,000," and renew the amendment "for provisions for Indians $11,800." Both these appropriations have been made regularly from the year 1836.

Mr. HARLAN. I am perfectly amazed that anybody who has any converseance with this subject should object to this little appropriation of $5,000 for presents to the Indian tribes numbering some three or four hundred thousand, with whom we are constantly in communication. Take, for instance, a case where the Indians steal a white woman or child and carry it off. Friendly Indians go and steal it back, and the agent has to recognize this service and give the Indian who released the white child or white woman a few dollars in silver to encourage this fidelity to the Government. It is a branch of the service in which it is impossible to get along without an appropriation. Somebody will have to spend the money; and if you do not appropriate it, it will have to be taken out of the salaries of some of the employes of the Government.

Mr. RAMSEY. Is this an appropriation of $5,000 for presents for all the superintendencies in the country?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Is there no other appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. HENDERSON. None other.

Mr. RAMSEY. Then I am surprised that the Committee on Appropriations should hesitate a moment about it. How can a superintendent of Indian affairs treat with Indians unless he has the power to give them a little tobacco and flour and powder and things of that kind when visiting them? How is he to effect anything? Mere reasoning with them, as you would among Senators here, will not effect anything. They sometimes, as the Senator from Iowa very properly says, render very great service to us, and it is desirable to encourage such service, and we must reward them in some way. When a large body of Indians are to be treated with, they must be fed of course; you must have an ox at least, a couple of barrels of flour, and a box of tobacco, and by this means you effect a great deal, save an expenditure of much money in some other way, possibly avoid war, and save trouble. These little presents made in due and proper time may be very efficacious in that way. The Indian department from the beginning of the Government has had to use money in this way. Five thousand dollars, as the Senator from Iowa says, for three or four hundred thousand Indians is a very small matter indeed. If they were concentrated in a small territory it would be different; but they are scattered over the whole continent, there are some half a dozen or dozen superintendencies, and of course each superintendent will require a portion of the money to expend among the Indians under his charge. It is a very small thing, and I do not think the Senate ought to hesitate a moment about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question again on this amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that I shall have to yield, if the Senator from Minnesota is sure that these tribes are not as reasonable as the Senate. I do not know but that $5,000 may be necessary to keep a few hundred thousand of them in peace and amity with the people of the United States. But when it is seriously argued here in the Senate that $5,000 serves any good purpose in keeping peace with all the Indian tribes between the two oceans, I can only reply that that idea may answer in the Senate, but it would be laughed at in any Indian lodge between these two oceans. I do not think we are buying captive women back with this money. I do not believe that that is the way our authority is maintained. I do not know, I never have seen any account of the manner in which this $5,000 is disbursed. It is said to have been regularly appropriated since 1836. The Senator from Missouri thought it was not essential; the Committee on Appropriations thought it was not essential; but other Senators seem to think it is indispensable. I shall submit to the vote of the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I mentioned the word "woman" to which the Senator has just referred because I happen to know personally of a case of that kind within the last three years. One tribe of Indians captured a woman on the frontier and took her off to the mountains. The officers interested some friendly Indians in an attempt to recover her; and they sent out some runners for her, and finally negotiated a pony or two and brought back the captive woman, and the President of the United States ordered that fifty silver dollars should be given to the Indian who had sold his ponies to the other tribe for this captured woman.

Mr. HOWE. Did it come out of this fund?

Mr. HARLAN. Out of some such fund. Where else did it come from?

Mr. HOWE. The President had no control of this fund.

Mr. HARLAN. He controls all these miscellaneous disbursements, if he chooses. It is for such purposes that these little appropriations are called for and are necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. The last vote we had disclosed the fact that we were without a quorum. I do not think that we can go on until there is a quorum. It was announced by the Chair that we were without a quorum. How are you going to get over the want of a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was announced by the Chair that there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. POMEROY. The only evidence that there is a quorum here is that a quorum votes. That is the evidence to the Chair; and when the Chair says that there is no quorum voting the presumption is that there is no quorum here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now sees a quorum present.

Mr. POMEROY. The Chair's judgment that there is a quorum does not alter the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which was in lines fifty-six and fifty-seven to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$10,000;" so that the clause will read:

For buildings at agencies and repairs thereof, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines fifty-eight and fifty-nine, to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$36,500;" so that the clause will read:

For contingencies of the Indian department, $36,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighty-nine, after the head line "Apaches" to insert "Kiwis and Comanches."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from line ninety to line one hundred and six, inclusive, in the following words:

For third of forty installments, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, according to the terms of the second article treaty October 17, 1865, $10,000.

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the transportation of goods, provisions, &c., purchased for the Apache Indians, according to the terms of the same article of same treaty, $2,000.

Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians of the Upper Arkansas river:

For third of forty installments, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, according to the terms of the seventh article treaty of October 14, 1865, $40,000.

For transportation of goods, provisions, &c., purchased for the Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians of the Upper Arkansas river, $10,000.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For the first of thirty installments provided to be expended under the tenth article of the treaty of October 21, 1867, concluded at Medicine Lodge Creek, in Kansas, with the Kiowas and Comanches, and under the third article of the treaty of the same date, made with the Apaches, the amount herein appropriated to be in lieu of the third of forty installments, to be paid to the Kiowas and Comanches under the fifth article of the treaty of October 18, 1865, and in lieu of the second article of the treaty with the Apaches of October 17, 1865, $56,000, or so much thereof as may be needed to comply with the requirements of said treaties.

For the construction of an agency building, according to the fourth article of said treaty, $3,000.

For the construction of a warehouse and store-room for the use of said agent, $1,500.

For the building of a residence of a physician to said Indians, $3,000.

For the salary of a physician, $1,500.

Mr. HARLAN. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs on what estimates the sum of $3,000 is put in for the residence of a physician? Is it a mere conjecture that it will cost that amount, or has some estimate been made?

Mr. HENDERSON. It is the amount specified in the treaty, the treaty made at Medicine Lodge Creek last fall by the peace commissioners, and all these items are the precise amounts stated in the treaty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines one hundred and thirteen to one hundred and thirty-two, inclusive, in the following words:

Comanches, Kiowas, and Apaches, of Arkansas river;

For the last of five installments, being the second series for the purchase of goods, provisions, and agricultural implements, per sixth article treaty 27th July, 1863, $3,000.

For expenses of transportation of the last of five installments of goods, provisions, and agricultural implements, per sixth article treaty 27th July, 1863, $1,000.

Comanches and Kiowas:

For third of forty installments, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, according to terms of the fifth article treaty of October 18, 1865, $40,000.

For transportation of goods and provisions purchased for the Comanche and Kiowa Indians, in accordance with the fifth article of the treaty of October 18, 1865, or so much thereof as may be necessary, $5,000.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Cheyennes and Arapahoes:

For the first of thirty installments provided to be expended under the tenth article of the treaty of October 28, 1867, concluded at Medicine Lodge Creek, in Kansas, the amount to be in lieu of the third of forty installments stipulated to be paid under the terms of the treaty of October 14, 1865, $40,000; or so much thereof as may be necessary to furnish the articles named in said first-named treaty.

For the construction of an agency building, according to the fourth article of said treaty, $3,000.

For the construction of a warehouse and store-room for the use of said agent, $1,500.

For the building of a residence of a physician to said Indians, $3,000.

For the salary of a physician, $1,500.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for a division.

The affirmative being called for, nine Senators rose.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suppose the object of the Senator from Vermont is to ascertain whether there is a quorum present. I suppose there is really no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The poorest evidence of that is the fact that Senators do not rise to vote for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. If there is a disposition to act on the bill at all I suppose we might as well ascertain whether there is a quorum, to gratify the Senator from Vermont. There is no doubt about a quorum being present if Senators will vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the record to show it.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 31, noes 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to, and a quorum present. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The next amendment was to insert after the one just adopted:

For surveying exterior boundaries of selections of land to certain persons related by blood to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, under provisions of fifth article of treaty concluded with said Indians, October 14, 1865, $4,000.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the Senator, if he insists on that amendment, state the reasons for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Department ask this appropriation for the purpose of surveying some lands which in the treaty of 1861 we agreed to give to certain half-breeds. I will read the fifth article of the treaty with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes made in 1861, and then a letter of the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which will show perhaps as well as any statement that I could make, the condition of the case. The fifth section of the treaty provides:

"At the special request of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians, parties to this treaty, the United States agree to grant, by patent in fee simple, to the following named persons, all of whom are related to the Cheyenne or Arapahoes by blood, to each an amount of land equal to one section of six hundred and forty acres, namely: To Mrs. Margaret Wilmarth and her children, Virginia Fitzpatrick and Andrew Jackson Fitzpatrick; to Mrs. Mary Keith and her children, William Keith, Mary J. Keith, and Francis Keith; to Mrs. Matilda Pepperdin and her child, Miss Margaret Pepperdin; to Robert Poisal and John Poisal; to Edmund Guerrier, Rosa Guerrier, and Julia Guerrier; to William W. Bent's daughter, Mary Bent Moore, and her three children, Adia Moore, William Bent Moore, and George Moore; to William W. Bent's children, George Bent, Charles Bent, and Julia Bent; to A-ma-che, the wife of John Prowers, and her children, Mary Prowers and Susan Prowers; to the children of Ote-se-o-se, wife of John T. Sickles, namely: Margaret, Minnie, and John; to the children of John S. Smith, interpreter, William Gilpin Smith, and daughter, Armana; to Jonny Lind Crocker, daughter of Ne-sou-hoe, or Are-you-there, wife of Lieutenant Crocker; to — Winsor, daughter of Tow-e-nah, wife of A. T. Winsor, sutler, formerly at Fort Lyon. Said lands to be selected under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, from the reservation established by the first article of their treaty of February 18, A. D. 1861."

The Acting Commissioner says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by reference from you on the 20th ultimo of a letter addressed to you by General John B. Sanborn, dated the 17th ultimo, requesting that patents may issue for selections, described in his letter, to the half-breeds, entitled under the fifth article of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe treaty of 1865, (see pamphlet Laws, second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, treaties, p. 143,) and upon which you direct a report of the views of this office. In reference to the same I would respectfully say that I doubt the practicability of having patents issue in the absence of surveys.

In your letter to this office of October 23, 1867, you authorized this office to direct Colonel Albert G. Boone to make the survey of the exterior boundaries of the tracts for these half-breed selections. A draft of a letter to him, in accordance with the instructions in your letter of the 23d of October last, was prepared on the 25th of the same month, but the question of funds to defray the expenses of such surveys was raised, and the letter was not sent to Colonel Boone. He being present in this city the draft of letter was shown to him, and he has treated the draft as a letter received by him, and has addressed a letter to this office in reply thereto, dated the 20th ultimo, copy herewith, from which you will observe that he estimates the amount that Congress should be requested to appropriate for these surveys at $4,000.

It is important that these treaty stipulations should be carried into effect without delay. The Union Pacific railway, eastern division, will probably pass through the reservations from which these selections are to be made, and if the lands are not previously patented to the half-breeds, trouble will probably arise, and they will fail to secure the land they desire. I therefore respectfully recommend, in case you should concur with this office in the view that it is impracticable for patents to issue in the manner suggested by General Sanborn, that you request of Congress an appropriation of the sum of $4,000, in order that Colonel Boone can proceed to make the half-breed selections, in accordance with the terms of the treaty.

A form of estimate is herewith inclosed, and the letter of General Sanborn is also herewith returned. It is provided in said fifth article of the treaty of 1865 that said lands shall be selected from the reservation established by the first article of the Arapahoe and Cheyenne treaty of February 18, 1861, (see Statutes-at-Large, vol. 12, p. 1163.) In view, therefore, of the fact that many of the half-breeds entitled to selections under said treaty are settled and have made valuable improvements upon the lands they desire to have patented to them, as there may be delay in the appropriation for the survey of these selections, during which time the railway company referred to may procure legislation granting them lands on the reserve from which these half-breed selections are provided by treaty to be made, I respectfully recommend that the President be requested to direct that this reserve be withdrawn from sale until these selections are made.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. MIX,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary of Interior.

Mr. HOWE. Now, if the Senate will listen to me I can tell them in a few words just what this question is. In the southern part of the Territory of Colorado, bordering on New Mexico, in 1865 we purchased an Indian reservation, and in the treaty we stipulated to give to the persons named in that article, some fifty or sixty of them, a section of land apiece. It is far removed from our settlements and far removed from our surveys. This is a proposition to appropriate $4,000, which, under the direction of the Indian department, shall be expended by some surveyor going away out there disconnected from the lines of existing surveys, and surveying out these locations. I object to it, because these half-breeds are comfortably settled there; their lands cannot be sold until they are surveyed, and when they are surveyed, when our surveys reach them, or when the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who superintends this branch of our service, is in a condition to survey them in connection with our regular surveys, then their titles can be perfected. Inasmuch as they are in no sort of danger it seems to me that it is decidedly better not to make this survey until it can be made in connection with the regular surveys.

Mr. HENDERSON. In order that the Senate may know what they are voting upon, I will state that in 1861 we made a treaty with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, under which they gave up the entire Territory of Colorado, and perhaps a portion of what was then New Mexico, reserving to themselves a small reservation down at the mouth of the Purgatory river. I do not remember the extent of the territory reserved to them, but it was laid out on the maps; and as the Senator from Wisconsin says, it is beyond the region of surveys, though a very fine country, an agricultural country. In 1865 we made another treaty with the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, by which we purchased from them this territory at the mouth of the Purgatory river, agreeing to give them a country south of the Arkansas river; but we agreed in this treaty of 1865 that we would give some fifty or sixty of the half-breeds of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes each a section of land, and that we would survey it for them. These half-breeds are living on the land, and are now farming there. They are uneasy because we have granted lands to certain railroad companies, who will ultimately survey their lines right through these lands. If the railroad companies file their plats, and the alternate sections given to the companies, when they come to file them, shall fall upon the lands occupied by these half-breeds, I cannot see that the railroad companies will not hold them. Why is it that a white man cannot go and locate upon a portion of these six hundred and forty acres and hold it by pre-emption? An Indian cannot do it. There is no right to the Indian to hold under the pre-emption laws, and none for him to hold under the homestead laws.

The Indian half-breeds are there farming and farming quite extensively, and they are uneasy. They are fearful that when the surveys are made under Government authority other persons will seize upon their lands and will hold them; and what they want now is to have a survey of the exterior lines of their six hundred and forty acres each, so that it may be marked out and patents issued to them by the Government of the United States. As the Senator from Wisconsin says, there will be some little difficulty about it. The only way it can be done is to extend a base line from Arkansas or Kansas out, survey it out, and upon that base line to locate these surveys. There will be some little difficulty attending it, I admit. If the Senate think the surveys cannot be properly made in that way, they can refuse the appropriation. They now understand the facts, I apprehend, and they can do as they like.

I can see that the Indians may be robbed of their lands. We have agreed in the treaty to give the half-breeds the lands and assure them to them, to survey them for them, and to patent the lands to them. Now we cannot give them patents unless we know the lands patented. We must describe them, or else there will be no protection to the Indians at last. The Indians gave up all, I say, of Colorado, including all the gold and silver mines of that country, reserving only a small place, and they even gave that up in 1865, reserving only these fifty or sixty sections for their half-breeds. We agreed to survey them and patent them to them. If we do not do that the probability is the Indians will lose them after having made valuable improvements; and that is one difficulty of the Indians now. They are afraid to make improvements for fear others will come along and reap the rewards of their labor.

Mr. HOWE. Let me add one word. If I supposed there was any sort of danger of these parties losing their lands, I should be as anxious to have the survey made as the Senator. They ought to have the lands and must have them; but nobody can get these lands until the President patents them, and he certainly is never going to patent these lands to anybody in defiance or disregard of the obligations of that treaty.

One other word as to the matter of survey. Suppose this appropriation is made and a surveyor goes out and surveys these lands; it is true he may form a connection by surveying through from the point at which our surveys now stop in Kansas, or wherever it is, so that these lands could be described in the patent as other lands are described. But if that can be done, it can be done by the Commissioner of the Land Office with the moneys already in his hands. We have appropriated from twenty to thirty thousand dollars for surveys in Colorado this year. He has money enough if you will allow him to make the surveys, and I think he is the better party to direct all surveys, and he has money enough to do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is aware of the very great complaint at the Land Office now about appropriations for surveys, and very great complaints among the people in the West in reference to them. They say sufficient appropriations have not been made to carry on the surveys. There is sad complaint there now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to submit a report from the committee of conference on the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received.

INTERNAL TAXES.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the meter system is retained?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; the House of Representatives agree to the Senate amendment on that point substantially as we had it.

Mr. NYE. How is that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue prescribes the kind of meters, but the distillers are required to get them. It takes away from the Commissioner the power of procuring them.

Mr. NYE. Is the distiller bound to get them before he distills?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is all left to regulation.

Mr. NYE. I understand it will take years to supply the distillers with them.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all left to regulations as under the present law.

Mr. NYE. I think the whole meter system is a very great humbug, and the advantage of it a great deal more delusive than real.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any Senator desires to know what disposition has been made of any particular amendment I will answer. I may state generally that the amendments of the Senate have been almost entirely concurred in, with a few modifications that have been made. I will not stop to explain the amendments unless some Senator has a question to ask in regard to particular items.

The report was concurred in.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs, for consideration at the present time, a bill (S. No. 186) providing for the sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which there will be an opportunity for objection.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section for authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make sale at public auction of the lands, tenements, and water privileges belonging to the United States at and near Harper's Ferry, in the county of Jefferson, West Virginia, except as hereinafter provided, in such parcels as shall, in his opinion, be best adapted to secure the greatest amount of money therefor on a credit of one and two years, taking bond and security from the purchaser or purchasers for the payment of the purchase money. But no such sale is to be made until the time, terms, and place thereof shall have been published in one of the principal newspapers in each of the cities of Washington, New York, and Cincinnati for sixty days prior to the day of sale. The proceeds of the sale are to be applied by the Secretary of War as follows: first, in defraying the expenses of making the sale; second, in refunding to the United States the principal sum of purchase-money paid for the lands, tenements, and water privileges by the United States, and for the erection of buildings thereon; and third, if any surplus remain, he is to deliver the same to such agent as the Legislature of the State of West Virginia shall appoint to receive the same; but upon condition that such surplus shall be received by the State of West Virginia, to be set apart, held, invested, used, and applied as a part of the school fund of that State, under and by virtue of, and in manner and form as provided in section first of the tenth article of the constitution of West Virginia, and for no other purpose. And on making such sale of the lands, tenements, and water privileges, or any part thereof, the Secretary of War is empowered and required, on receiving the purchase-money in full, to execute all necessary deeds therefor to the purchaser or purchasers thereof, on behalf of the United States. The second section authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to convey by deed to Storer College, an institution of learning chartered by the State of West Virginia, all those certain portions of the aforesaid property, namely, the buildings, with the lots on which they stand, numbered thirty, thirty-one, and thirty-two, also building numbered twenty-five, with enough of the lot on which it stands to give a breadth of ten rods on High street, otherwise known as Washington street, all of said buildings and lots being situated at Harper's Ferry aforesaid, being the same which have heretofore been assigned by the War Department to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, for educational purposes; and also to convey by deed to the proper persons all such other lands and buildings, portions of the aforesaid property, as have heretofore been set apart by the proper authority for religious, charitable, and town purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object provided the gentleman will amend his bill by striking out a portion of the bill, so as to provide the proceeds of this property shall go into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will allow the gentleman to offer it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall not withdraw my objection if that is not incorporated in the bill.

Mr. HUBBARD, of West Virginia. I want five or ten minutes to debate the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot yield if it gives rise to debate.

WHARVES IN OSWEGO HARBOR.

Mr. CHURCHILL. I ask unanimous consent for leave to the Committee on Commerce to report back a joint resolution.

There was no objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Committee on Commerce direct me to report back House joint resolution No. 296, giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York. The committee found no objection to its passage, but many reasons why it should be passed. I am instructed to move a proviso to the joint resolution, that it shall be subject to the approval of the engineer of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, is as follows:

Joint resolution giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York.

Whereas the common council of the city of Oswego, in the State of New York, by resolutions unanimously adopted April 7, 1863, and May 12, 1868, in pursuance of the authority granted them by the Legislature of New York, in the charter of said city, have given permission to the owners of lots 11 and 12, also of lots 13, 14, 84, and 82, and of lots 15, 16, 17, and 18, in Fortification block, number two, in the first ward of said city, to construct wharves in front of said lots, seventy feet in width, and extending northerly so that the north end of said wharves may be on a line with the north line of the Ontario elevator pier, but not less than two hundred and fifty feet distant from the nearest point of the United States pier, which wharves will extend into the navigable waters of said harbor; Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the assent of the United States be, and the same is hereby given, so far as Congress has power to give the same, to the owners of the lots above-mentioned to construct said wharves in accordance with the terms of said resolutions, subject, however, to the approval of the engineer department of the Army.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHURCHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

W. H. COX, DECEASED.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back House bill No. 1420, directing the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed to hear evidence and determine the right of W. H. Cox, deceased, late a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery, to a pension, in same manner as if he was still living, he having died of disease contracted while a prisoner of war at Andersonville, Georgia; and if found to be entitled to a pension, then the same from the time of his discharge till death be paid over to his father, Charles D. Cox, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I will give a brief explanation of this bill. W. H. Cox, a healthy young man of about twenty years of age, residing with his father, Charles D. Cox, in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, the town in which I reside, on the 16th of February, 1864, was enrolled and sworn in as a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery. That the regiment to which he was attached was ordered to the front, and on the 2d of June, 1864, at the battle of Coal Harbor, Virginia, the said W. H. Cox was taken prisoner by the rebels, conveyed to Andersonville, Georgia, and there confined as prisoner of war for about ten months. Then, being released, was taken to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, at which place he was, on the 8th of August, 1865, honorably discharged from Government service in pursuance of a telegram from Adjutant General's office dated May 12, 1865. That he returned to his father's, in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, and being, in consequence of his treatment in rebel prison, broken down in health, and found by his physician to be incurable, made application on the 14th of June, 1866, for a pension; but before the evidence was completed, to wit, on the 9th of July, 1866, died, so that all proceedings before the Commissioner, in consequence of his death, were suspended. The object of this bill, Mr. Speaker, is to authorize and require the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed to secure evidence and determine whether said W. H. Cox was entitled to a pension in same manner as if he was still living, and if he decide that he was so entitled, then the same, from date of his discharge till death, be paid to his father, Charles D. Cox, who wants to apply that money toward paying for a plain monument to mark the grave of his son, who lost his life in the cause of our country. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this bill may pass by a unanimous vote.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MILLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Hughes, of the United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was reported. It authorizes the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the aforesaid commanders to the active list with the rank they may be entitled thereon.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Allow me to offer a joint resolution.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield to my colleague on account of his indisposition.

REMISSION OF DUTY ON STATUARY.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 342) to admit free of duty certain statuary; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that the statue representing the figure of Victory, intended to surmount the monument in memory of Pennsylvania soldiers who fell in the Mexican war, now about being erected on the capitol grounds at Harrisburg, being in marble cut in Italy, and which will soon be ready for shipment, shall be admitted free of duty.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEYOR GENERAL IN UTAH.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of concurring in the amendment of the Senate thereto, the bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, to establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, unless we take up the bills from the Speaker's table in their regular order.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill extending the preemption and homestead laws of the United States over the territory of Alaska, establishing a suitable number of land districts therein, and providing for the appointment of registers and receivers therefor, and of a surveyor general for said territory.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, is this the regular order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had left the Hall after calling for the regular order.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I did so, but I did not withdraw the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be within the Hall if he insists on demanding the regular order.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I do insist.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution is not before the House.

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bill pending at the adjournment yesterday (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] to add to the bill various sections. Pending that motion the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SHANKS] moved to reconsider the vote by which the House disagreed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope it will be reconsidered; it will save $40,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope it will not be reconsidered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior, the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Surgeon General of the Army, the chief of the Bureau of Medical Surgery of the Navy, and the chief engineer of the Army, shall constitute a commission, which shall be known and designated as the "Commission of Charities for the District of Columbia."

Mr. SPALDING. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. SPALDING. The Committee on Appropriations do not recommend these amendments.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman object to the amendment?

Mr. SPALDING. I do, and the majority of the committee object to it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman if he will allow me to have a paper read—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should be glad to have this matter open to debate.

The SPEAKER. Before it has been ordered to be engrossed?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Has the bill been engrossed yet? I object to it if it has not.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. MAYNARD called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 84, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ames, Bailey, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Calkins, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Covode, Dockery, Elia, Ferriss, Fields, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hinds, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hunter, Judd, Knott, Loughridge, Marshall, McCarthy, Mercier, Moore, Mullins, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pomeroy, Sawyer, Scofield, Shanks, Trowbridge, Elihu B. So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SPALDING and Mr. GARFIELD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 35, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Roderick R. ard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchin, Koontz, George V. Stevens, Taffe, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Wood, and Woodward—83.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question being on the third reading of the bill,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the bill in full.

The bill was read.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. SPALDING called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

An act (S. No. 567) relating to the Freedmen's Bureau and providing for its discontinuance.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 352, to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, and agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. VICKERS, as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate requested the House to return to the Senate its resolution of concurrence in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 818, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes, for the purpose of making a motion to reconsider the same.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SCHENCK presented the credentials of David Heaton, claiming to be a Representative-elect from the second district of North Carolina; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

IMPROVEMENT OF MILWAUKEE HARBOR.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following report from the Committee on Commerce; which was laid on the table:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of the city of Milwaukee for reimbursement for certain expenditures on the harbor of that city, with accompanying documents, report that they have postponed the further consideration thereof until the first meeting of the committee in December next, and have referred the same to a subcommittee consisting of Hon. T. D. ELIOT and Hon. P. SAWYER, with instructions to ascertain the facts and to report at such meeting.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate of the United States:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 15, 1868.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate its resolution of concurrence in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 818) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, for the purpose of making a motion to reconsider the same.

The SPEAKER, The House has agreed to the report of the committee of conference on this bill, and the motion to reconsider has been laid on the table. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that it is not within the power of the House to comply with the request of the Senate, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. A message will be sent to the Senate stating that, under the rules, the House is unable to comply with the request.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAWSON. The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of David Heaton, claiming a seat in this House as a Representative from the second district of North Carolina, have directed me to report that they have examined the credentials and find them in due form of law; and they therefore recommend that he be admitted to a seat upon taking the oath of office prescribed by the act of 1862.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DAVID HEATON presented himself at the Speaker's desk and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I call for the regular order.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 13th instant, in the following words, namely:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to this House copies of all treaties made by the peace commissioners with the several tribes of western Indians during the last and present years."

In reply I have to state that all the treaties referred to, which have been reported to this Department have been laid before the President and by him transmitted to the Senate for its constitutional action thereon, and that none of said treaties are now in the possession or under the control of this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. H. BROWNING,
Secretary.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker House of Representatives.

The communication was laid on the table.

FUNDING BILL.

Mr. MOORHEAD. There is so much pressure upon me that I will withdraw my demand for the regular order of business.

Mr. POLAND. I will yield, then, to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 207, for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States in order that it may be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

RELIEF OF DRAFTED MEN.

Mr. BOYER. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means House bill No. 421 amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men."

Mr. MULLINS objected, but afterward withdrew his objection.

The bill was read. It provides for the repeal of so much of the second section of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men," approved the 28th day of February, A. D. 1867, as provides that said section "shall apply only to claims received at the War Department prior to its passage;" provided that all claims under said second section of said act shall be presented and filed within two years from the date of the final passage of this act and not afterward.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does that give anything to the District of Columbia?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want the District of Columbia included.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order to this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I object.

Afterward the objection was withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOYER, from the same committee, also reported back the following as having been provided for by the general bill just passed; and the same were laid on the table:

An act (H. R. No. 186) to extend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men," approved February 28, 1867;

An act (H. R. No. 463) to amend an act for the relief of certain drafted men, approved February 28, 1867;

Memorial of Henry Tibby, of Ohio, for the return of commutation money;

Memorial of J. W. Kirker, praying for the passage of an act for return of commutation money; and Petition of J. W. Jack, praying for return of commutation money.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am directed by the Committee on Reconstruction to report back the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1853 for the removal of certain disabilities from persons therein named. The Senate strike out eight names and add some others. The committee are of the opinion that the amendments are proper and reasonable. I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. The pardoning of rebels is so important that I ask the names be reported.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not ask all these names be read if we have some information of who they are. Who is Mr. Moore?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The report came from the Committee on Reconstruction; his name is in the original bill.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Dyer is an old rebel; I would like to know something about him.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman is on the Committee on Reconstruction, and ought to know as much as the rest of us.

Mr. BROOKS. They do business so fast it is impossible for me to keep up with them. There is one Beatty in the list; is it the poet Beatty?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is very good reading; I hope it will all be read; we want to know all these men who have been born again. [Laughter.]

The Clerk resumed, and concluded the reading of the names.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This is a substitute for the House bill, and requires a two-third vote. The Journal should show that it passed by a two-third vote.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 20, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Archler, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blair, Boies, Bontwell, Boyden, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Churchill, Cook, Cullom, Davies, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Fox, French, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Haight, Hamilton, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McKee, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Nicklack, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Phelps, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Randall, Raup, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernum, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen R. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and the Speaker—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arnell, Barnes, Brownwell, Cary, Cobb, Coburn, Eldridge, Golladay, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Julian, Loan, Mercur, Nicholson, Orth, Taber, Thomas Williams, and William Williams—20.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnum, Leaman, Beek, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Burr, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Covode, Dewesse, Dodge, Eckley, Eggleston, Eia, Ferry, Finney, Gravely, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Maynard, McClurg, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Newcomb, Nunn, Perham, Polsey, Price, Prayn, Robinson, Ross, Scofield, Selje, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Aaron R. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Wood, and Woodward—71.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. JULIAN on account of sickness; also leave of absence to Mr. BARNES till Monday next.

LEAVE TO PRINT A SPEECH.

Leave to print a speech on irrigation, intended to have been made last evening in Committee of the Whole, was granted to Mr. DONNELLY. [See Appendix.]

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. POLAND obtained the floor on a question of privilege, being the contested-election case of Switzer vs. Anderson, but yielded to

Mr. JULIAN, who asked unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object if it gives rise to debate.

The bill was read. It recites that the public reservation known as the Hot Springs reservation, in the State of Arkansas, is now held and occupied without color of title by various persons, whose claims have never been acknowledged by the United States Government, and that the public interest and humanity require that said springs be made available for public use, and the welfare and settlement of the State will be promoted by the sale of lands adjacent thereto; and provides that upon the passage of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be surveyed, platted, and laid out into streets, blocks, and lots, or parcels of ground of such form and area as will best facilitate the construction of a town, a certain portion of the public domain known as the Hot Springs reservation. The bill makes further provision in regard to the appraisement, &c., of the lots and parcels of ground.

Mr. BROOKS. Unless the gentleman from Indiana insists on the reading of that long bill I tell him now that I shall object, and I object on the ground that it refers only to "loyal" persons, which means Republicans, and excludes all Democrats.

Mr. JULIAN. If the gentleman objects I have no power to press the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Before the gentleman from New York makes his objection, I would like to have read an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that the amendment may be printed and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BROOKS. I object.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House this morning adopted the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN,] directing the appointment of a committee to inquire into the disbursement of the contingent expenses of the House. My object is to amend the resolution so as to direct the Committee on Accounts to make the investigation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that motions to reconsider entered now may possibly not be reached if Congress shall adjourn next week, as seems to be probable.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then the motion to reconsider had better be disposed of now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] yield for that purpose?

Mr. RANDALL. If he yields he must yield the floor finally.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I insist on the regular order. It is time this gentleman, Mr. Switzler, was admitted to his seat or rejected.

The SPEAKER. It depends on the gentleman from Vermont, whether he calls up the report of the Committee of Elections or not.

Mr. POLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROOMALL. All I desire to say is that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who offered the resolution, is satisfied that the proper committee is the one I have mentioned, the Committee on Accounts. I see no objection to its going to the regular standing committee, in preference to a select committee to be raised.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I did not in offering the resolution propose to censure any committee of the House. I do think that an examination is necessary, and that it ought to be had. If the House thinks it better to send the matter to the Committee on Accounts I am perfectly satisfied. I do not court a select committee so that we have an examination.

Mr. BROOMALL. All I want is that the examination shall be in the regular way. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate into the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House for the years 1867 and 1868, with power to send for persons and papers where the same can be done without expense to the Government.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now move to strike out the words "a committee of five be appointed" and insert "the Committee on Accounts be directed."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman if it has not been their duty for the last two years?

Mr. BROOMALL. No; it has not. The Committee on Accounts have had no power of inquiring into what I understand to be the irregularities. They have desired it, but it has never been conferred on them by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. What are the irregularities.

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not know; I never heard of them till this morning.

Mr. RANDALL. Common rumor says they extend to very large amounts. I hope, therefore, that if the Committee on Accounts undertake the job they will do it thoroughly.

Mr. BROOMALL. The Committee on Accounts are in the habit of doing their duty conscientiously.

Mr. RANDALL. They ought to have done it for two years.

Mr. BROOMALL. They had no power.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Have the committee asked for that power?

Mr. BROOMALL. During the last Congress the committee tried upon various occasions to get the floor, but failed to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. They are a privileged committee.

Mr. BROOMALL. No; they are not a privileged committee as to such matters.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Accounts are not privileged to report at any time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to say that the Committee on Accounts have been in the habit of investigating these accounts; and yet he says they have not had the power for two years. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman what he means?

Mr. BROOMALL. I understood my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] to imply that the committee might not investigate this matter. I replied to him that the Committee on Accounts were in the habit of doing their duty fully and conscientiously.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the object is to have the contingent fund of the House fully investigated the Committee on Accounts can do it more fully than any special committee that can be organized. The only practical question, I conceive, is whether we have sufficient confidence in their honesty and capacity. If I had sufficient confidence in them to believe that they would go to work and make this investigation honestly and faithfully, I would vote for their amendment; if I had not, then I would vote against it. I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the gentleman has pledged himself in advance to vote for it.

Mr. BROOMALL. If I thought there was a member in this House who really had not enough confidence in the honesty of the Committee on Accounts to be willing to permit them to examine and report upon a matter of this sort, I would before night get out of the position of the chairman of that committee.

Mr. NIBLACK. I beg leave to assure the gentleman, as this matter has come before the House, that some of these irregularities are by common rumor and report charged to some extent at the door of the Committee on Accounts itself. They therefore assume to do what is to them a very delicate task. It is charged that in their examinations they have done nothing more than make merely formal examinations, taking the statements that are submitted to them without further examination.

Mr. BROOMALL. All that is new to me, and I do not think any member of this House will venture upon making any such charge as that. No committee of this House has ever worked harder and tried more to get at truth, justice, and exactness than the Committee on Accounts. If any gentleman wants to be satisfied whether or not I state the truth, he can have access to all our records at any time, and can attend our sessions at any time.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the committee propose to report at this session?

Mr. BROOMALL. I presume we will; we will if we can. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, there being, upon a division—ayes eighty-three, noes not counted.

The main question was then ordered.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. BROOMALL, to substitute the "Committee on Accounts" for a "select committee."

Mr. RANDALL. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and upon a division there were seventeen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing, from the President of the United States, was delivered to the House by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary.

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the bill providing for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas.

Mr. ARCHER. I renew the objection.

UNITED STATES CONSULAR SYSTEM.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:
I herewith transmit to Congress a report, with the accompanying papers, received from the Secretary of State, in compliance with the requirements of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," approved August 18, 1856.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, July 15, 1868.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the bill of the Senate No. 207, for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, in order that it may be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection was made, and the bill was taken up and read the first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—SWITZLER VS. ANDERSON.

Mr. POLAND. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections upon the contested-election case of Switzler vs. Anderson, from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That George W. Anderson is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Resolved, That William F. Switzler is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, at this period of the session, and especially in this temperate, I do not propose to take very much of the time of the House in discussing the question that is raised by these resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections. Any gentleman upon this floor who has taken interest enough in this case to read the report of the committee which has been before the House for several months, a report which is very full and elaborate, will have learned more about the case than I should be able to tell him in the short time which I propose to occupy; and, as to any gentleman who has not felt interest enough to read the report of the committee, I can hardly expect he will take interest enough to listen to what I shall have to say upon the subject.

This case, Mr. Speaker, presents something a little unusual, I might almost say remarkable. A very large majority of the Committee of Elections belong to the dominant party in this House—the Republicans—and this committee unanimously, with one exception, have reported against the sitting member, who also belongs to that party, a gentleman whom we all regard as a valuable member of this House, and whose association with us we should be glad to continue if we could find that he was legally elected. The committee, I say, are, with one exception, unanimous in this report. This exception is the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. McClure,] and I cannot but believe that if he had been as free from personal and political bias in reference to this case as were the other members of the committee he would have concurred with us in the result to which we arrived.

This case is in somewhat narrow compass. The ninth congressional district in Missouri comprises ten counties. At the election held on the 6th of November, 1866, for member of Congress, in all the counties of the district except the county of Callaway, George W. Anderson received 4,876 votes, and William F. Switzler received 4,698, making a majority for Anderson of 178 votes. The county of Callaway gave Anderson 163 votes and Switzler 1,463 votes. If the vote of this county had been added to the others Switzler would have been elected by a majority of 1,122 votes over Anderson. This case turns wholly upon the question whether the vote of the county of Callaway should have been counted. The secretary of State, who, by the statutes of Missouri, is the proper officer to open the returns and count the votes, or to use the precise language of the statutes, to cast up the votes given for members of Congress, took it upon himself to say that there had been no legal registration in this county of Callaway, and therefore he assumed the responsibility of throwing aside the vote of this county, and thus giving the election to his political friend, the sitting member. Whether the secretary of State had any legal right to go behind the return and say that the vote of that county should not be counted is one question. Another question is this: admitting he had not the right, is there sufficient in the evidence introduced in this case to show it is the duty of the House to disregard the vote of the county of Callaway so as to give the election to the sitting member? There is something certainly very curious in this case. The secretary of State took it upon him to reject the vote of Callaway on the ground there had been no legal registration of the votes of that county; upon the ground there was such a state of violence, not open violence, but such concerted or secret violence, such fear and intimidation on the part of the registrars in that county, that they were not able to do their legal duty in registering voters; and therefore the vote of that county was to be thrown out. It is conceded the registration in that county and the voting in that county was as peaceable as any registration or any voting in any county in New England or any county in the Union. There is not a particle of evidence there was an act of violence or even an act of threatened violence either in the registration or in the voting. Yet the majority for the contestant is to be set aside upon the ground there was intimidation, there was fear in that county; that it was impossible for the registrars to do their duty and there was no registration.

This is a queer state of things, a strange state of things, when it was conceded before the committee by the sitting member and his counsel, and the proof may be looked over ever so carefully and there is not a particle of evidence to show there was anything but quiet during the voting in that county. Still that vote is to be thrown aside.

It is proper I should allude for a moment to the law of Missouri in reference to registration. In the first place, the Governor of the State is to appoint a superintendent of registration in each county. The superintendent of registration in each county is to appoint registrars in the various election precincts whose duty it is to make the actual registration. The Governor of the State by whom the superintendents were appointed was a member of the same political party with the sitting member. The superintendent of registration in the county was of the same political party with the sitting member. Every single district registrar, so far as the evidence shows anything about it, was the political friend of the sitting member. The entire machinery of this registration was in the hands of the political friends of the sitting member, and yet the secretary of State of Missouri took upon himself to say, and I say by entire usurpation of legal power, without having any kind of authority for it, he took it upon himself to say this registration was so illegal, so fraudulent, so affected by the power of violence, by intimidation because of threats of violence, as to throw aside the vote of this county. Now, sir, it is very singular, with the entire machinery of this registration, the entire control over the registration of that county in the hands of the sitting member, that such a complaint should lie in the mouth of the sitting member, or the members of his political party.

As the superintendent of this registration the Governor appointed for the county of Callaway William H. Thomas, and Thomas appointed the various district registrars. There is no question each one did not proceed in due legal form to perfect the registration, or that copies were not made and duly certified. In accordance with the laws of the State of Missouri the superintendent of registration and the registrars of the various districts, the superintendent being the president of the board, were to assemble to revise the registration of the district. When this was done, when this registration was supervised by this board, the copies of registration having been duly certified to them by the district registrars, then it became the duty of this superintendent to furnish a copy of the registration to the secretary of State of Missouri. A copy of the registration was duly certified and placed in the hands of Superintendent Thomas, and was carried by him to the capital of the State, where the secretary of State had his office. There, the evidence shows, the matter was discussed between the secretary of State, Rodman, and superintendent of registration, Thomas, whether there was not some mode by which the vote of this county of Callaway might be got rid of and leave the majority in favor of the sitting member. Thereupon this William H. Thomas, the superintendent of registration, appended to the registration of the county this certificate:

"I hereby certify that the above and foregoing list of registration is a correct copy 'as furnished me by the officers of registration' for the various election districts in and for Callaway county, Missouri."

That was a proper and legal certificate, and there ended the duty of Mr. Thomas as the certifying officer of registration of that district. But in pursuance of this arrangement between Mr. Rodman and the secretary of State, he went on to add something entirely beyond his legal power as a returning officer, and something that was entitled to no weight with the secretary of State or with the Committee of Elections or with this House, as evidence in relation to the validity of the registration. The residue of the certificate is as follows:

And I hereby further certify that the registration law in its letter and spirit was not carried out in any one of the election districts of said county; that such a system of intimidation and threatening was carried on by the disloyal, and those opposed to the law, as to deter loyal men from undertaking the registration in most of the election districts, and was consequently intrusted to men who most shamefully disregarded the law.

In the few districts where men could be had who were willing to register according to the law, there was such intimidation and threatening used as to deter those who were willing to make objections to those they knew not to be entitled to registration as qualified voters, and, as a consequence, the law could not and was not carried out, as the certificates hereto appended show.

Given under my hand this December 12, 1866.

WILLIAM H. THOMAS,
Supervisor of Registration for Callaway
County, Missouri.

In addition to this, Thomas procured three certificates or statements, one signed by H. S. Turner, who was appointed as registrar for Round Prairie township, and served one day and then resigned; another signed by James E. Turley, who was the registrar of Bourbon township, and another signed by John Yount, the registrar of Cedartownship, stating in substance what is stated by Thomas in his certificate.

Now, in the first place, Mr. Speaker, the committee report that this was no legal evidence whatever. These men were not certifying officers for any such purpose as to make statements of this kind. They had simply the power by statute to certify to the registration. When it was completed they could certify that that was a legal registration, and they could also certify to copies of registration. But any statements beyond that they had no official power to certify, nor had the superintendent of registration himself any more power to certify facts to the secretary of State than had the district registrars to certify them to him.

I do not apprehend that it will be contested by the sitting member or by his friends, but that the secretary of State went entirely beyond his power when he undertook to go behind the returns and upon this evidence to decide whether there was a legal registration or not. But I conceive that it is not very important whether I am right or whether the committee are right in relation to this or not, because even conceding that the secretary of State had power to go beyond the returns, it is very clear that this House have no right to go behind them. But if the facts disclosed in the evidence before the committee in this case were sufficient to show that there was such a state of affairs, of violence and intimidation in that county as to prevent a fair and honest registration, why, then, I concede it would be entirely within the power of this House to determine that the registration was illegal and that the vote of the county ought not to be reckoned in determining who was elected from this congressional district. So that it becomes important to consider the power of the secretary of State in this matter except as showing the purpose, the intent, the animus that existed on the part of this secretary of State and this returning officer, Thomas, when they undertook to mutilate the registration of this county and to blur and blot it for the purpose of inducing the secretary of State to throw the vote of the county aside, and give the certificate to the sitting member instead of the contestant who was elected.

MR. LOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: whether there is any evidence in the record that any registration was made by the board of registrars of the various townships in that county presided over by the supervisors of registration and certified to by them to the secretary of State, as required by law?

MR. POLAND. I am very happy to answer the inquiry of my friend from Missouri. In the first place, the statute of Missouri provides that after the appointment of these district registrars, and after they have performed their duty in making the registration in the various election precincts, it shall be their duty to come together and act as a board of registration, and the superintendent of registration is, by law, to act as president of the board. Now, if there were no evidence on the subject the legal presumption would be that the officials did their duty. Wherever there is no proof one way or the other the legal presumption is that the officers of the law did their legal duty. But appended to the registration of each of these election precincts there is a certificate of this sort:

I, Isaac D. Snedcor, officer of registration in and for the first election district in and for the county of Callaway and State of Missouri, do hereby certify that the foregoing list of registered voters is a true and perfect copy of the register of qualified voters in said election district, as ascertained and determined by the board of appeals and revision sitting for that purpose in and for said county.

Given under my hand this 27th day of October, A. D. 1866.
ISAAC D. SNEDCOR,
Officer of Registration.

To the registration of each township or election precinct there was a certificate signed by the registrar in precisely those identical words.

Mr. LOAN. One word in this connection. I will state that I have diligently examined this record and that I can find in it nowhere any evidence that these officers did perform the duties devolved upon them by law, and as far as I am concerned I do not believe they ever did that thing.

Mr. POLAND. I cannot yield for a speech.

Mr. LOAN. I believe there was no such board of registration held, and that there was no revival of the lists and no copy of the registration forwarded to the secretary of State. The certificate of Mr. Snedecor just read, not being authorized by law, furnishes no evidence to the committee or to the House that any such board was held. Now, I ask the gentleman to state to the House whether that board of registration was held, and whether they supervised the registration and certified it to the secretary of State as required by law? Those are points I want answered.

Mr. POLAND. As I said before, if there was not a particle of evidence on the subject the legal presumption would be that these officers of the law did what the law made to be their duty. That is a principle that applies to public officials everywhere in relation to their official conduct, as everybody knows who knows anything about law. The familiar maxim is Omnia presumuntur rite esse acta. So I say that if there is no proof upon the subject the fact is to be taken to be so. But more than that, here is this certificate. The district registers certify that the revival took place and that they returned copies of the registration to the superintendent of registration of the county. And the superintendent of registration acknowledges this by his own certificate. He says:

"I hereby certify that the above and foregoing list of registration is a correct copy as furnished me by the officers of registration for the various election districts in and for Callaway county, Missouri."

That is the certificate of superintendent Thomas himself. He certifies that they are correct copies as furnished him by the officers of registration for the various election districts in and for Callaway county.

Mr. LOAN. The answer to that is that not being authorized by law it is of no force here or elsewhere.

Mr. POLAND. I say that not only the legal presumption but the legal evidence is that these several district registrars met as a board of appeal and were presided over by the superintendent, Mr. Thomas, and that the registration of each one of these election precincts was revised and corrected by the board of appeal. There is all the evidence which the law can furnish upon the subject. This record of registration could not have been legally completed without that. The only legal evidence that that was done was to be the certificates of the officers; because the law provides that they shall make such certificate, and that the certificate shall be evidence of the fact. So I say there is all the legal evidence that is necessary, and all the law can furnish in relation to the revision of the registration of that county. Therefore I say that the attempt of Mr. Thomas to slur over this registration by putting on this outside certificate, and especially when he took that registration and entered upon it, against several hundred names, that this man was a bushwhacker, that man was a rebel sympathizer, &c., he did what he had no right to do, and what the secretary of State for Missouri had no right to regard.

But this Mr. Thomas seems to be the very soul of this case on the part of the sitting member. He not only got the secretary of State to throw aside this registration upon his certificate, but he is the great witness relied upon by the sitting member, before the Committee of Elections, for the purpose of proving the fact he has put in his certificate. What do they claim here? That there was an illegal and invalid registration; that there was such a system of fear and intimidation that these registrars felt themselves in such peril that they dared not to go on and do their legal duty. He not only certified this county out, and got the secretary of State to disregard it, but he is the principal witness by which the sitting member undertook to establish the fact before the committee, and to have us find it and report it to the House.

Now, I will recur for a moment to the testimony in relation to this matter as to the fact, without taking any more time to discuss the legal question as to whether the Secretary of State had any right to do as he did do, to throw out the returns from Callaway county. Let us now come to the fact itself, as if the secretary had counted the vote of Callaway county; as if the case between those parties was reversed; as if Switzer had received the certificate of election, as he ought to have received it, and his seat was contested by Mr. Anderson, who is now the sitting member. Is it established that there was such a system of intimidation and fear in Callaway county that there could not be and was not a legal registration of voters? Now, as I said, the important witness, the principal witness on the part of the sitting member to establish this, is this same William H. Thomas. The only evidence introduced for the purpose of showing a disregard of the provisions of the law by any of the district registrars is that of William H. Thomas, as to the registration in Fulton township, of which J. D. Snedecor was registrar, and appointed by Thomas. Thomas testifies that he was present and saw Snedecor register a number of persons. He says:

"I thought his whole movements were contrary to law, in this, that he subscribed the names of the applicants instead of their subscribing their own names as the law directs; and that he merely asked them if they could take the oath, instead of administering it; and that he totally failed to administer the additional oath given under the attorney general's instructions, by which to ascertain the true qualifications of applicants. I protested against the proceeding as being illegal, became disgusted, and left the office."

That is the only evidence there is in the case in relation to improper conduct on the part of any district registrar. On the other side Snedecor, the registrar of that district, says there was no person registered who did not take the oath. That, perhaps, deserves some explanation. Every man who applies for registration in Missouri is obliged to take the test-oath, the strict test-oath prescribed by the Missouri statute. He cannot even be allowed an examination before the registering officer until he has first taken that test-oath, which any gentleman who will take the trouble to read it will find to be a very strict one. Mr. Snedecor says that no man was registered who did not take that oath. He says:

"There were about twenty-five—not exceeding twenty-five—of the first who registered to whom I explained the oath, and asked them if they took the oath, and upon being answered that they did, I had them subscribe their names."

Now, I apprehend that there is no lawyer in this House who will say that this was not a legal administration of an oath. I am not aware that any statute in force in Missouri, or anywhere else provides the form of administering the oath. The laws merely provide for an oath; and when a man appears before the proper officer and the oath is explained to him, and he subscribes it, the officer duly certifying that he took the oath, that I take it is a legal administration of the oath. According to my apprehension, there is no propriety in sticking about forms. Whether the person taking the oath shall hold up his hand or kiss the book is not a matter of statute regulation; it is a matter of usage everywhere.

Now, in relation to this registration in Fulton township, and as to whether there were irregularities there, the evidence is that of Thomas upon the one side and of Snedecor, the registrar, upon the other; and so far as appears in this case there is quite as much ground to believe that Mr. Snedecor is an honest and truthful man as that Mr. Thomas is such a man. I know nothing of Mr. Thomas, except as he appears in this case, but there certainly is very great ground for doubt in relation to the truth of the statement of Mr. Thomas when he testifies in relation to this registration in Fulton township; and there is not a particle of evidence that while he sat on this board of appeals he ever raised the slightest objection to the registration in this township or in any other.

Mr. LOAN. I cannot believe that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] would intentionally make any statement not strictly correct, and I ask him to read the testimony of Mr. Garner in regard to this man Snedecor, and the character of the men who registered, and then I desire to know whether he undertakes to indorse the character of Snedecor in comparison with that of Mr. Thomas or anybody else.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I cannot go into all the details of the evidence. It is several months since the case was examined by the committee and this report presented to the House.

Mr. LOAN. The gentleman was speaking of Mr. Snedecor as a man who stands fairly before the House upon the evidence presented, and I want him to refer to the evidence of Mr. Garner, which will show—

Mr. POLAND. My friend from Missouri will have abundant opportunity to present to the House the facts about Mr. Thomas, and about all parts of this case.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to inquire whether any of these men, notwithstanding they were registered, had participated in the rebellion.

Mr. POLAND. Very few. There is evidence that perhaps half a dozen of those who were registered—I think not more than that—were disloyal persons and ought not to have been registered. Upon this registration Mr. Thomas, before he delivered it over to the secretary of State, made various minutes and memoranda, and on page 4 of the report of the committee we present a copy of an entire page of this registration, with the comments made upon it by this Thomas, superintendent of registration. This is a specimen:

"Agee, James H., enrolled disloyal in 1862.
 "Allen, James G., enrolled disloyal in 1862.
 "Atkinson, C. O., enrolled disloyal in 1862; required to take the oath of allegiance.
 "Atkinson, J. A., required to take oath of allegiance.
 "Bailey, William H., disloyal, rebel sympathizer; refused to take convention oath as clerk of court, now county clerk elect.
 "Barnes, T. S., enrolled disloyal.
 "Bartley, Joseph D., has been in rebel or bushwhacking service; registered in Fulton, lives in St. Aubert.
 "Bicket, Martin, enrolled disloyal.
 "Beavan, Charles, enrolled disloyal.
 "Beavan, John T., enrolled disloyal.
 "Becker, Engel, enrolled disloyal.
 "Bedding, Thomas H., enrolled disloyal; registered in Fulton, lives in Round Prairie.
 "Bellana, George W., enrolled disloyal.
 "Bennet, Willis D., enrolled disloyal; required to give bond of $1,000.
 "Berry, John G., enrolled disloyal.
 "Berry, Samuel H., influential rebel sympathizer.
 "Blackmon, James, been in rebel army. (H. S. Turner, witness.)
 "Blackmon, James A., rebel sympathizer, notoriously disloyal. (H. S. Turner, witness.)
 "Blackburn, Thomas, enrolled disloyal; under bond of $2,000; stated on oath he could not take the oath as juror at circuit court.
 "Blagg, William D., enrolled disloyal; took Judge Ansell's two horses in 1861; said they were for Porter."

Mr. Thomas, in his testimony, says that he copied some of these memoranda from some military record, or a copy of a military record that he had found, which does not appear to have been made under any authority of law, or to be authenticated in any form. Hence, I say there is no evidence, except as to a very small number of persons, that those registered as qualified voters were really disloyal.

But to come to the evidence particularly as to the question of intimidation, whether there was such a state of feud and intimidation in that county that the district registrars dared not do their duty. I have already referred on the part of the sitting member to the evidence of Thomas, the man who certifies the vote of this county out in the first place, and now undertakes to swear it out. I have referred to him. Then there is the testimony of James E.

Turley; and I ask to take a little time to read the testimony of this lion-hearted Turley, this man who says he could not do his duty because he was intimidated. I wish gentlemen to listen; for, saving the testimony of Thomas, it is the most minute testimony on the part of the sitting member to show there was fear and violence on the part of the registrars, so they could not do it. Here is a good picture of the man and a good picture of the state of things, and a good picture of the pretenses upon which the vote of this county was thrown out by the secretary of State. James E. Turley, the registrar for Bourbon township, whose statement or certificate to the secretary of State has before been referred to, was called as a witness by the sitting member, and was asked as follows:

"Question. In signing the certificate to your registration for Bourbon township, did you believe that the law was faithfully carried out?"

"Answer. I did then, sir; and if I had to do it again would do just as I did then; but I heard after I signed the certificate things which if I had known when I registered I would not have signed the certificate.

"Question. Was there not a system of intimidation in the county at the time?"

"Answer. There was against me, sir. I was intimidated by fear of being interrupted."

On his cross-examination by the contestant, he was examined as to the grounds of his fear, and what was said, and by whom, and as he is the only one of the registrars who claims to have been prevented by fear from doing his proper duty, his testimony on that subject is worthy of attention:

"Question. What did the people say that scared you?"

"Answer. When you (the contestant) spoke in the court-house, you asked if the supervisor was present, and when told that he was not, you then asked if any registrars were present, and he told them that we were in a very delicate situation, and to be careful."

"Question. What other persons said anything to scare you?"

"Answer. James K. Sheely made another very frightful remark to me."

"Question. When and where did Sheely make the remark, and what was it?"

"Answer. It was after I was appointed, in front of his office, in Fulton. He said if this registration law was carried out according to Radical rule there would be five hundred law suits in Callaway county."

"Question. Did not you carry out the registration according to the Radical rule?"

"Answer. I do not think I did, as I had to skin between two parties, as it was rather a zigzag course, liable to a suit from either party."

"Question. Were there any suits brought against you?"

"Answer. Not that I know of."

"Question. What other persons scared you by remarks?"

"Answer. Jeff. Jones made remarks in a speech here that scared me."

"Question. What did Jones say?"

"Answer. Jones advised the people, soldiers and all, to open polls of their own, and hold an election in spite of the registration."

"Question. Was not Jones's advice not to resist the registration law?"

"Answer. I did not understand it; but he advised them not to register at all, but to hold polls of their own at the election."

"Question. What other persons made frightful remarks to scare you?"

"Answer. Well, sir, I will take Mr. Hockaday as the next man, as he struck more terror to my heart than anybody else. Mr. Hockaday got up the day Mr. Jones spoke and read a document, one clause of which was that 'we will put down the Radical party so that they will never destroy any other nation as they have done this.'

"Question. Was not that document a resolution ratifying the action of the Philadelphia convention?"

"Answer. I don't know."

"Question. What other persons frightened you?"

"Answer. It was M. Y. Duncan, of Audrain county."

"Question. What did he say?"

"Answer. He said just what you said; only he went further and said that if any man came forward and took the oath of loyalty, and the registrar refused to register him, he was liable to prosecution."

"Question. Are these all that scared you?"

"Answer. These were all the important ones; there was some neighborhood chat of minor importance."

H. S. Turner, whose certificate to the secretary of State has been quoted, was appointed registrar for Round Prairie township, and after registering one day resigned the position. He was asked:

"Question. What were your reasons for so doing? [resigning.]

"Answer. I found I could not execute the law properly."

"Question. What were the difficulties you had to contend with?"

"Answer. A great many refused to be questioned as to their qualifications."

"Question. Those whom you registered, did they refuse to be questioned?"

"Answer. A good many did, sir."

"Question. Did you believe from your knowledge of the township at the time that a proper registration could be made under the law?"

"Answer. I did not, sir."

"Question. Were persons whom you knew to be disqualified demanding to be put on the list as voters?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

I have taken the trouble, Mr. Speaker, to read the testimony of this witness at length because, aside from Mr. Thomas, this lion-hearted Turley is the great witness of the sitting member. Now, sir, is it not perfectly ridiculous for a sober and serious man to undertake to say this officer of registration was prevented from doing his duty; that he dared not do his duty; that he dared not include men who were entitled to registration; that he dared not register men who were entitled to vote, and all this upon the ridiculous pretense we have here? Is there any man here, any man upon this floor, upon this side, who, to serve a political friend, or with any idea of serving his political party, will stand upon so ridiculous a ground as this?

Then we have the testimony of J. J. P. Johnson, who said:

"I think there were some who said they would have a free election or a free fight."

Next we have John Yount:

"Were threats made against officers of registration?"

"Nothing, except lawsuits; they said around they would have a free election or a free fight."

"Were objections made to those registering?"

"No, sir; some told me they were afraid to act as witnesses. Witnesses said they would not attend, and I did not think it safe to risk it myself."

Abram Snithen testified as follows:

"I thought it not safe to object to registration. They said if they could not vote others should not."

William H. Thomas said:

"It was the general talk throughout the country among the disloyal that they intended to have a free election or a free fight; and they intended to register anyhow or have a fuss over it. That kept men from going to the place of registration and laying in objections."

J. S. Henderson, of Fulton, was applied to to be registrar, but declined, and was asked for his reasons:

"I did not wish to register the township."

"Did you believe you could properly enforce the law?"

"I did not know that I could not; but didn't wish to have any conflict with the inhabitants. Thought it would be an unthankful and unprofitable business to enforce the law."

Then, on the other hand, John Vinson, registrar of Nine-Mile Prairie, says there was no opposition or interference with registration; not threatened and heard of no threats by anybody; everything was quiet.

Thomas H. Beeding, of Round Prairie, heard of no threats, and does not think persons would have been in any danger by appearing and making objections. He heard Turner say he had no fears; but people did not like the way he questioned them.

A. B. Maupin, registrar of Round Prairie, was not threatened or interfered with; does not think persons would have been in danger of insult or violence who made objections; heard nothing of the kind.

T. J. Ferguson, registrar of Cote Sans Dedain, was not threatened or interfered with in any way.

L. B. Hunt, registrar of Aux Vasse, was not threatened or intimidated or in any way interfered with in making the registration.

John Yount, registrar of Cedar, was threatened only with lawsuits. Some men said if they were not registered there would be a lawsuit about it; but they never brought any.

John K. Boyd, of Round Prairie, says the registration was quiet, peaceable; no disturbance; does not believe persons would have met any difficulty by objecting to persons registering.

George A. Moore, registrar of St. Aubut, was not threatened, intimidated, or interfered with in any way in registering.

M. T. Moore, of Cedar, does not know or believe there was any threats or intimidation used to retard or interfere with registration.

Morgan B. White, of Nine-Mile Prairie, says the same; was present every day; never saw it more quiet.

Martin Baker, of Bourbon, says the same in substance.

Rawdon H. Hood, of Liberty, was present at registration; it was quiet, and orderly; heard of no threatening or intimidation; registrar said he had met no difficulty.

John Wilson, of Cedar, says the registration was quiet and peaceable; heard of no threatening or intimidation; men were not deterred from voting or making objections.

James W. Overton, of Cedar, says so far as Thomas's certificate applies to his town it is false.

William King, sheriff of the county, was a good deal among the people during the canvass; heard of no threatening or intimidation to interfere with the registration law, except some men said if registrars did not carry out the law they would sue them; heard Turley say twice after the session of the board of appeals that he had got along as well as any registrar in the county, and his books did not show a scratch.

Isaac D. Snedcor, registrar of Fulton, had no difficulty; registration was quiet and orderly; says Thomas's certificate is false as to his township.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I said in the outset, all that is conceded. They do not deny it on the other side. It was conceded by the gentleman who argued the case before the committee for the sitting member, and who I suppose will make a speech in reference to the case before the House, that there was no violence and no appearance of violence. It all resolves itself into a certain fashionable color a few years ago called invisible green. It was violence that nobody saw. One piece of evidence that is relied upon on the part of the sitting member to establish this, is the state of things that existed in that county during the war. Several witnesses have testified that the general sentiment of that county during the war was disloyal. They estimate, I think, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred persons in that county who were rebel sympathizers. There is no pretense that it is shown in the testimony that there was any such proportion of the people of the county who were guilty of any disloyal acts, but it is claimed that they were rebel sympathizers. That has come to be, not only in the political, but in the legal world of Missouri, a very important phrase.

Mr. LOAN. I ask the gentleman if he does not understand that the law of Missouri disfranchises rebel sympathizers?

Mr. POLAND. Yes, sir; I do. That is the law of Missouri. Whether wisely or unwisely they undertook to say that people shall not vote merely upon matters of conscience and opinion. The committee have not undertaken to decide here that the State of Missouri did wisely or unwisely in passing such a law. It is the law of Missouri and we have not undertaken to gainsay it. But when you undertake to apply this in practice, when you undertake to get witnesses to estimate the number of persons who sympathized with the rebellion and who cast their votes, the result will be that they will estimate just as many such persons as voted against the candidate of their choice. Practically that is the result of such a law as this which undertakes to exclude men from voting on the ground of having sympathized with the rebellion, not for illegal acts, but for entertaining wrong opinions. The witnesses that you call on one side or the other will limit their testimony to the number that voted for or against their choice.

Mr. LOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be willing to take the contestant's estimate of the number of rebel sympathizers and the number of loyal men in that county?

Mr. POLAND. I have nothing to say about that.

Mr. LOAN. I am willing to take his statement.

Mr. MULLINS. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Poland] has said that there were men there who sympathized with the rebellion, whose hearts were set on rebellion, but who did not take any active part in the rebellion. Now, admitting that their hearts were set upon rebellion, how much more would it take to make rebels of them?

Mr. POLAND. I do not think the gentleman and myself will differ about that. I stated the other day here in the House that I was as willing to vote for the man who fought for the rebellion as for the man who prayed for it. But the difficulty is that when you undertake to throw out the vote of a county or a township upon the estimate of somebody as to the number of persons there who entertain bad opinions, every man will estimate that number according to the number who vote with him or against him. That is the great difficulty of going into the consciences of men and taking their standard of belief as the test of their right to vote. That is the practical evil of such a system. I do not say that the Legislature of a State may not say that a man shall not vote because he entertains improper or erroneous opinions upon any subject. But I say that practically, when you come to the case of a contest between representative men of different parties, and to the question of who are entitled and who are not entitled to vote in a township or county, if you undertake to decide that question upon the basis of men's consciences and opinions, that estimate will be made just as the exigencies of party require.

Mr. LOAN. The contestant in this case has made his estimate, and it is upon the record of this case as evidence. Will the gentleman place that estimate before the House?

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman is satisfied with it?

Mr. LOAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLAND. I say this: the estimate of the number of persons in that whole county who sympathized with the rebellion, as really put in evidence, is wholly upon the part of the sitting member. According to the opinion of this witness a very large majority were of that class. He does not leave more than two hundred and fifty or two hundred and eighty persons who entertained such proper and loyal sentiments as would entitle them to be voters.

Now, as I have said, and I have undertaken to give some reason for it, that species of evidence is entirely unreliable; no sort of dependence can be placed upon it. The Committee of Elections upon this subject have undertaken to mete out equal and exact justice. There was one case before them previous to this, which was decided by the House—the case of Birch vs. Van Horn of Missouri. Between twenty five hundred and three thousand persons voted for Birch, more than enough to give him the election. And he had plenty of witnesses who were ready to swear that in their opinion those persons did not entertain such disloyal sentiments, and had not been guilty of such disloyal acts as, by the law of Missouri, would preclude them from being voters. But the committee said they could not take any such general estimate at all. If a man relies upon the fact that persons had been registered who were not entitled to be registered, then he must show who those persons were. We say now that we cannot go upon any general estimate. We decided in that case that Mr. VAN HORN was entitled to his seat, although there was no evidence on his side, and there were abundant witnesses on the other side who were willing to testify that in their judgment more than twenty-five hundred men had voted for Birch who were not disloyal. We struck out all that testimony in that case, and we apply the same principle in this case to a man of our own party, whom we would be glad to retain on the floor of this House if we believed him to have been elected.

But the theory of the sitting member proves altogether too much. It is said that this fear was so universal and all-pervading that it need not be put in evidence, that everybody knew it without being told. Now, sir, a recurrence to a very few facts will show how fallacious this is. In the first place, the vote of this county fell short by eight or nine hundred votes of that which was cast in 1860.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BENJAMIN obtained the floor.

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] will yield to me a moment I desire, as the contestant in this case may, in a certain contingency, desire to address the House, to move that he be permitted, if he should desire it, to do so under the rules of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN next addressed the House. Before the conclusion of his remarks he yielded for the transaction of other business. His speech, when concluded, will be published entire.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 631) amendatory of an act approved July 26, 1866, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of certain bridges, and to establish them as post roads;" and

An act (H. R. No. 318) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes.

COMMITTEE ON EMIGRATION.

Mr. CHANLER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That Rule 74 be amended so as to add to the standing committees to be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, and to consist of nine members, a Committee on Emigration; said amendment to take effect after the close of the present session of the Fortieth Congress.

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House from and after the close of the present Congress:

RULE.—It shall be the duty of the Committee on Emigration to take into consideration all propositions relative to emigration to or from this country as shall be presented, or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1284) to change and more effectually secure the collection of internal taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and to amend the tax on banks.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 678) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed House bill of the following title, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 761) to construct a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing, all in the county of Orange, State of New York.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,
S. HOOPER,

WILLIAM E. NIBLACK,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN SHERMAN,
JUSTIN S. MORRILL,

C. R. BUCKALEW,

MR. DELANO. I hope the gentleman will explain the action of the committee of conference.

MR. SCHENCK. I have every disposition to give whatever explanation gentlemen may ask in regard to this report. I propose to call for the previous question on the adoption of the report; but I am ready to answer any question gentlemen may ask in regard to particular amendments.

MR. PETERS. How about the tax on banks?

MR. SCHENCK. The committee agree to strike out all that part of the bill in conformity with the amendment of the Senate, being entirely satisfied no bill could pass the Senate at this session which contained a provision in regard to banks, such as the House agreed to.

MR. KOONTZ. What action was had in reference to the payment of storekeepers?

MR. SCHENCK. They are to be paid by the United States.

MR. UPSON. What about special agents?

MR. SCHENCK. That stands in this condition: the Senate amended the provision in regard to supervisors of revenue limiting the number to twenty. It has been agreed to extend the number to twenty-five, their territorial districts to be made up by composing those districts of judicial districts.

The next section, which provided for repealing any law authorizing the appointment of general agents and special agents, stands with this addition. We also repeal the appointment of inspectors with the exception of inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars; and instead of any of these officers we authorize the appointment of not exceeding twenty-five detectives at any one time, the number now being unlimited, who shall be assigned to duty in the different divisions of supervisors. The whole appointment of those officers, who have roving commissions to enter districts and interfere with local officers, has been swept away.

MR. SCOTFIELD. Has the whole tax been removed from petroleum?

MR. SCHENCK. The distillers and refiners of petroleum or mineral oil are to pay the same price as other manufacturers. The House conferees agreed to the Senate amendment with an amendment to make it clear they should pay the tax other manufacturers did, which was not before clear in the Senate amendment.

MR. SCOTFIELD. No tax per gallon?

MR. SCHENCK. No tax except on sales.

MR. GARFIELD. What has been done in regard to the removal of spirits in bond and in regard to bonded warehouses generally?

MR. SCHENCK. The system adopted by the House remains. There is to be no removal in bond and only drawback allowed to the amount of sixty cents per gallon. There are some few verbal amendments to make the matter clear and precise, but there is no change in principle.

MR. GARFIELD. In the same connection I desire the gentleman to state what time is allowed for the removal of spirits now in bond?

MR. SCHENCK. On that question there was a compromise between the committees on the part of the two Houses. The House having required the removal in six months from the present bonded warehouses by the payment of tax thereon, of all spirits that might be now deposited there and the Senate having extended the time to twelve months, a compromise was made by fixing nine months as the time within which the spirits must be removed under penalty of forfeiture.

MR. BECK. I desire to ask what will be the loss to the revenue by the striking off of the tax on petroleum?

MR. SCHENCK. The original tax on petroleum having amounted to some four or five million dollars when it was fixed at twenty cents, and having been reduced to ten cents, I should think the reduction would amount to more than two million dollars. That amount would be lost except for the fact that we get rid of all the machinery which was kept up for this single article similar to that which prevails in relation to distilled spirits. This was the only remaining article upon which such a tax was collected in that way.

I will say in this connection that so far as a part of this machinery is concerned—the inspectors of oil—the payment of the inspectors' fees was made not by the Government, but by dealers in oil; but we get rid of a very great abuse so far as that is concerned. The committee found that in the allowance of a certain amount per gallon to these inspectors, as their fees for gauging and inspecting oil, they were in many parts of the country, especially in New York and Brooklyn, receiving many thousands of dollars per annum. In one instance they were equivalent from month to month to $56,000 a year.

MR. KOONTZ. I would inquire if the conference committee have fixed the same amount of special tax to be paid by distillers as was fixed by the House.

MR. SCHENCK. That remains as before. It is due to the House I should say that the Senate having reduced the tax upon the sales of wholesale dealers in liquor to one fifth of one per cent., putting them on the same footing as other dealers, whereas the House had made it three per cent., we succeeded in getting a compromise by which wholesale dealers in liquor are to pay on their sales one per cent., which is five times as much as the Senate had agreed to.

MR. GETZ. I wish to inquire whether the phraseology of the section defining what shall constitute a distiller has been relieved of the ambiguity which it was alleged to contain, under which brewers were fearful they might be classed as distillers.

MR. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; there is a phrase introduced to prevent its application to producers of fermented liquors.

MR. O'NEILL. I will ask the gentleman again, do I understand that these twenty-five inspectors or detectives are in the place of all the present inspectors and detectives?

MR. SCHENCK. No; the gentleman does not quite understand it. At present the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is permitted to employ, upon such terms as he pleases, and pay out of any appropriation made for that purpose, an unlimited number of detectives. I am speaking of the present law. There are four classes of inspectors by the existing law: first, general inspectors, of whom there are some two hundred and fifty-five, I think, altogether; second, inspectors of distilled spirits; third, inspectors of oil; and fourth, inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars. The whole number of these four classes of officers, including special agents and general agents, amounts to about seventeen hundred. We get rid of the special agents and revenue agents, of which I think there are eleven general agents, ten under one law and one under another, and some forty-two or forty-four special agents provided for by the existing law. We also repeal the law providing for general inspectors, amounting to some two hundred and twenty-five in number, and provide, instead of the five hundred inspectors of spirits or thereabouts, that there shall be a gauger and storekeeper paid by the Government and under the reach and control of the Government instead of these inspectors of spirits who now belong to the distillery. The inspectors of oil are of course got rid of by the repeal of the tax on oil. There remain, therefore, none but the inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars. All of them, sixteen or seventeen hundred officers, are got rid of, with the exception of some one hundred and fifty or two hundred who have been employed as inspectors of tobacco, snuff, and cigars by the substitution for them of supervisors of revenue, and not exceeding twenty-five detectives, who may be employed throughout the United States, and the gaugers and storekeepers under the control of the authorities of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman inform the House how many in number the officers have been reduced by this bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. More than one half the number have been got rid of, I should say, and I think a very much better system has been adopted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman include in that the number who have been substituted?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; after allowing for all the substitution I should say that the whole aggregate number will be less than one half what it was before, the names and duties being in some degree changed, but the actual number largely reduced.

Mr. BECK. One other question. By section twelve of this bill it is provided that two dollars per day shall be paid by all distillers fermenting over twenty bushels of grain, and so on in proportion; and that any distillery that shall suspend work shall pay two dollars per day during the time the work is suspended. Now, is it intended that they shall pay two dollars per day whether they are running or not?

Mr. SCHENCK. In regard to that matter we have agreed to adopt the language employed by the Senate, "except Sundays;" they are not charged for Sundays. We also agree to the amendments of the Senate, and substitute the word "stopped" for the word "suspended." Now, if no other gentleman desires to catechise me any further, I will call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. ROSS. Can the question be taken separately upon the part in relation to the tax on banks?

The SPEAKER. It cannot; the report must be considered as a whole.

The report was then agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONDITION OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] a question in view of the probable adjournment of this session, in which we are all so much interested. I would inquire of him what business there is now before the Committee of Ways and Means?

Mr. SCHENCK. The principal business before that committee of a public character is the funding bill, which has passed the Senate. We have bestowed considerable consideration upon that bill; and as the House referred it to us to-day, we hope to be able to report it back to the House in forty-eight hours with whatever amendments we may desire to have made to it.

PRINTING THE TAX LAW.

Mr. BECK. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] the propriety of moving that there be printed of the tax law a sufficient number of copies to inform the people of the country about the law.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think that is a very good suggestion. The report of the committee of conference having been agreed to by both Houses, it only remains for the President to sign the bill for it to become a law. I therefore move that twenty-five thousand copies of the tax bill, when it shall have been approved by the President, be printed for the use of members of this House, in pamphlet form, with an index, to be prepared by the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law.

LAND OFFICE IN UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table which will undoubtedly become a law. Some unimportant amendments have been made to it by the Senate. Those amendments ought to be concurred in for the purpose of putting the necessary appropriations in the deficiency appropriation bill, which is now in the Senate, and will be probably acted on there to-morrow. I ask unanimous consent to take it from the table for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same.

The amendments were read as follows:

On page 1, in line seven, strike out "shall" and insert "have."

On same page, in line seventeen, after "land," insert "of the United States."

On same page, in lines twelve and thirteen, strike out the words "to which the Indian title is or shall be extinguished."

On same page, in line ten, strike out "and" where it first occurs after the word "lands" and insert "of the United States."

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT FORD.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at the present time the bill (S. No. 550) for the relief of Robert Ford.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time. It appropriates the sum of $814 to Robert Ford, in full payment for his time and services as a teamster in the quartermaster's department of the Army from May 1, 1862, to August 1, 1864.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTS PAYABLE IN COIN.

On motion of Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 180) relating to contracts payable in coin, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SUITS AGAINST RAILROAD CORPORATIONS.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1423) to provide for bringing suits in the courts of the United States against railroad corporations where a portion of the line is in several States; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means, for consideration at the present time, the bill (H. R. No. 1416) making certain regulations as to the public debt.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which there will be an opportunity for objection.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind, shall be allowed to any person for the sale or negotiation of any bonds or securities of the United States disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent, other than some proper officer of his Department, to make such sale or negotiation of bonds and securities, are to be repealed.

The second section provides that all authority under any existing law to issue bonds, Treasury notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of the United States shall cease and determine. But nothing herein is to prevent the conversion of Treasury notes known as seven-thirties into the five-twenty bonds, nor the conversion of compound-interest notes into the three per cent. certificates of temporary loan, nor the issue of bonds as subsidy to railroad companies, as provided by law.

The third section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall publish monthly a detailed statement of the public debt at the close of each month, in which statement all bonds and other obligations of the United States issued from the Treasury Department, payable after the year in which such statement is made, including the amount of seven-thirty Treasury notes convertible into five-twenty bonds, but not including the amount of subsidy bonds issued to railroad companies, are to be classed as the "funded debt;" the United States notes and the fractional notes issued for circulation as money, are to be classed as the "currency debt;" the three per cent. certificates of temporary loans are to be classed as the "temporary-loan debt;" and all debt that is past due, or that will be payable within the year, stating the same in detail, are to be classed as the "matured debt," and the interest is to cease on such matured debt when it becomes due, and the same is to be paid on presentation at the Treasury. Such statement is also to contain the amount outstanding of subsidy bonds issued to railroad companies; and the amount of coin, the amount outstanding of gold certificates, and the amount of currency in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I cannot understand that; it is too long, and I object.

Mr. LAFLIN. I wish to state that my colleagues, Mr. VAN WYCK and Mr. VAN AERNAM have been detained from the House to-day by illness.

INTERNAL REVENUE SYSTEM.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Chairman, when the tax bill was before the committee for examination and discussion some time ago I desired to give my views in relation to it, but there seemed to be such uncertainty about the passage of any bill unless the House acted promptly that I determined to content myself with my votes upon the various amendments as presented. The bill passed the House, however, has been to the Senate, and passed with amendments, and there is now no reasonable doubt but that it will become a law, and I feel justified in taking a few minutes time in saying what I think in relation to the general subject of taxation, and especially the tax on spirits.

The burdens of taxation now resting upon the people are so heavy that they are calling upon us for relief. Our duty is to give it if in our power to do so consistent with public safety, public credit, and national honor. There has seldom been a time when business has been so depressed. Thousands of the best and most enterprising men of the land are struggling against the waves of misfortune, and are in danger of being swallowed up in the depths of financial ruin. They are looking toward Congress and expecting help. Can we give it? If we can, shall we give it? If we can, and fail, we shall fail to perform a duty for which we should be held accountable to our people. One of the means of relief is the passage of the tax bill. I was in favor of revising the whole revenue law, and was therefore against laying aside the original bill reported to the House by the committee, for the reason that in my judgment it is unwise for the Government at present to require the collection of any more revenue than is necessary to meet the current expenses of the Government and pay the interest on the public debt. By going over the whole system we could have lightened the tax in many particulars, and to that extent relieved the people of burdens. I was for going on with that bill for this reason. I was for going on with it for another reason. Men are not specially fond of paying taxes at any time. The people are disposed to put off that duty about as long as the law will permit when taxes are light and the burdens easy. And they are sure to object and procrastinate when the burdens to be borne are not equitably distributed among all the people. When one man is called upon to pay and his neighbor is excused because his property may be in a different shape, (the one and the other equally able,) the man who is able to pay may well be pardoned if he complains that he is not treated fairly, and he enters his protest.

Justice is an indispensable element in the tax laws as well as every other, if you will have them enforced and receive a cheerful response from the people. The American people are ready to answer to the calls of the Government whenever made upon a fair showing of necessity, and when made to all upon the solid basis of justice. The revenue law, in my judgment, might be greatly improved and made much more equitable in its operation and bearing upon the various classes of industry in the country. For these two reasons I regret that it was not the judgment of the House to go over the whole subject. While the burdens are piled up almost mountain high, and while trade and commerce and all the varied employments of the people are so depressed and are struggling to pass through the present crisis, which amounts almost to a panic, I am unwilling to pile them up higher for the sake of having it to say that this nation, just out of a great war, is rapidly paying off the public debt.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the debt were paid. I wish that it had been so ordered that we had never been called upon to incur it; but, sir, it is upon us; it was incurred in a war for national existence, and we must deal with the subject as we find it. Our public debt amounts to about twenty-seven hundred million dollars. The annual interest upon the public debt amounts or is estimated for the year ending June 30, 1869, to be $129,678,078 50. I am unwilling to do very much more at present than raise sufficient money to pay the interest as we agree and to meet the current expenses of the Government honestly and economically administered. Let the people recover from the shock of battle; let prosperity again prevail; let commerce regain its wonted energy and life; let the people have time, and with it will come an ability to pay that which to-day would paralyze and prostrate the people. The Government has been in too great haste to pay off its debt. The war closed in the spring of 1865, and since that time we have paid $300,000,000 of the public debt; in which time also an army of nearly a million of men had to be mustered out and paid off, and all the other varied and extraordinary expenses incident to the closing up the war had to be met.

A hundred millions a year since the close of the war has been taken from the people by duties and internal taxes in addition to the extraordinary expenses, as I have said, and in addition to the interest, and paid toward liquidating the principal of the debt of the country. Sir, it is proof sublime of the capacity and latent power of this great and free people, and an example worthy to be heralded to all the nations of the earth; but, sir, I think it, to say the least, is unwise for us in the future to continue to tax and strain the energies of the people for the purpose of producing such results; and I am, therefore, for the present in favor of giving the people as little to do in the payment of taxes as possible, consistent with honor and a healthy condition of the country, until they get upon their feet again and get to business. Then, Mr. Chairman, when we have determined to raise no more money than we actually need, and have determined to raise what we do need by the enactment and enforcement of laws just and equitable, then the next great business for us is to see that the taxes provided by law to be paid by the people shall be honestly collected, and honestly paid into the Treasury by the officers and agents appointed for that purpose.

It may be easy to pass just laws in which all the people would cheerfully acquiesce if properly enforced, but when they are not properly enforced or if enforced so far as to collect the tax from the people, and then violated by a failure to pay over to the Government, it is not surprising that the people complain and murmur.

But, sir, when it comes to the question of enforcing or executing the laws Congress is powerless. It is our duty to enact, it is the duty of the Executive to execute. With this plain duty before each of the two branches of the Government what are the facts? At the outset good officers of the Government are removed on account of political opinions, and men put in their places because they profess to agree with the Executive.

Then after various demonstrations in various ways calculated to demoralize the public service we have the sad spectacle in this land, the great glory of which is that it is a land governed by the people's laws, of the chief Executive, the highest officer of the nation, the man whose special duty under the Constitution is to see that the laws be faithfully executed, violating the law, and yet protected in his action by the high tribunal which alone can remove him from office.

Who can expect that his appointees, with commissions signed by him, with his example before them as a guarantee of protection, will discharge their duties with fidelity to the interests of the people and in accordance with the law which alone should be their guide?

I do not charge that the persons holding position under the President are all dishonest. Some of them I know are faithful to their duty; but, sir, in view of the example set by the President it would not be strange if many of his subordinates should follow his example and set the law at defiance when for corrupt or other motives it seemed desirable to do so. And, sir, I assert that the corruption that seems to prevail among the revenue officers and custom officers of the country, and which has well nigh depleted the Treasury within the last two years, is mainly chargeable to the course pursued by the President of the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in relation to the tax on spirits. When I came here at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the tax on whisky had been raised to two dollars per gallon. It had come up by a series of steps from twenty cents, I believe, until it got to two dollars.

The reports of the Commissioner then showed that instead of the revenue from that source increasing as the tax was increased the amount was materially diminished. My judgment then was that the tax was too high. It was too high to insure large revenue, and too high, having in view the interests of western people, where the larger part of the grain out of which spirits is or should be manufactured. I thought then that it should be reduced to one dollar per gallon. It was urged, however, by those having the subject specially in charge, that the two-dollar tax had not had a fair test, and the Government would be able to do better after the supply on hand when the tax was raised was used up, and by a heavy tax on spirits and tobacco other interests could be relieved. With these statements, and others of a similar character, those in favor of a high tax were able to keep it at two dollars. So we have gone on from year to year until the amount of revenue from spirits has run down from about thirty millions a year to $13,000,000; and there seems at last to be a conviction here, and everywhere else, that the tax will have to be reduced soon or we shall get no revenue at all from that source.

It is humiliating, sir, to be compelled to admit that we are driven to this point by the rascals in the country. And I very much fear, sir, that its reduction will not insure the honest collection of the tax that we shall agree upon, however stringent we make the law in providing for its collection.

The judgment of Congress now is to place the tax at fifty cents per gallon and require its collection at the still or distillery warehouse. We can do no less than try this plan and hope for good results. Fraud in connection with this interest must be stopped somehow. Unless it is we had better repeal the law entirely and get back to the days of free whisky, and let the distilleries run.

But, sir, I desire to offer some suggestions touching this subject, showing the effect of high taxation of spirits upon the general economy and welfare of the country.

And, sir, I am glad to state that a gentleman of my own district, a man of wealth and business, and high character, and who has not been engaged in the business of manufacturing or dealing in spirits, has furnished me the facts and figures which I shall use in this portion of my argument. The greater portion of the distilled spirits which pays no tax is made in an illicit manner and with imperfect machinery. It is a well known fact that such a still, run in the dark and secret, cannot produce as great a quantity of spirits from a given quantity of grain as will the large establishment with perfect machinery worked in an open and scientific manner. The object of the dishonest man, secretly engaged in defrauding the Government, is to escape detection and get as much money in his pocket as he can quickly as possible. In his haste and fear he fails to get as much spirits from a bushel of grain as the large distiller can make; besides, the slops with which to fatten beef and pork running from the illicit still are an entire and absolute waste.

There is supposed to be made about seventy-five million gallons of spirits each year. It is estimated, I believe, that distilleries properly run can make about three and a half gallons of spirits from a bushel of grain. If this is so, in the manufacture of seventy-five million gallons of spirits about twenty-one and a half million bushels of grain would be consumed. It is not supposed that an illicit distiller could produce more than two and a half gallons from a bushel of grain. If so, in the illicit distillation of seventy-five million gallons of spirits thirty million bushels of grain would be consumed—making a difference of about nine millions in the amount of grain consumed; the difference being an entire loss to the wealth of the country. To this loss must be added the amount of slops thrown away. It is said the slops will make half as much beef and pork as the corn itself if fed to the animals, but if it will make one third as much then it is equal to a loss of over seven million bushels of grain, making a total loss to the country equal to about fifteen and a half million bushels of grain, which, at the lowest calculation, would be worth, according to the ruling prices in the country, about twelve million dollars.

These figures are made upon the assumption that the spirits are all made in an illicit manner; the evidence is that the greater portion is so made. The exports of grain from this country during the year 1867 did not amount to more than ten million bushels. Thus it will be seen that the waste from illicit and fraudulent distillation of spirits amounts to more than all our exports of grain, and of course is felt by all who consume a bushel of grain or a pound of meat, and by all those who contribute in taxes to the support of the country.

Every honest business in the land demands that the distillation of spirits should be conducted openly and honestly, like other business conducted by honest men; that the taxes legally imposed upon such products should be paid, and that when paid it should find its way into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take up the time of the House longer. I trust this bill will become a law very soon, and that when it does we may hear of better results in the collection of the revenue from spirits and tobacco, and that we may soon be able to relieve entirely all the other branches of industry from taxation, and rely upon custom duties and tax on spirits and tobacco to pay the interest on the public debt and meet the current expenses of the Government.

Since the close of the war, notwithstanding the enormous expenditures incurred in paying off and reducing the Army, notwithstanding the fact that we have reduced the public debt $100,000,000 a year, and have paid in bounty to the soldiers millions of dollars annually, and to the pensioners millions more, and have paid the interest on the public debt, and raised money necessary to support the Government, yet we have every year lightened the burdens upon the people by the modification of the tax laws. The first year after the war closed we repealed taxes which had amounted to $60,000,000; the next year $40,000,000, and this year we have already relieved the people by the repeal of taxes which last year amounted to $90,000,000. We might still go further, and still have a surplus, after meeting all just demands due, to be applied in discharge of the principal of the debt.

Mr. Chairman, with all the burdens for the last few years resting upon the people they have gone forward enjoying a reasonable degree of prosperity. With a little encouragement, by wise and prudent legislation a degree of prosperity will soon prevail all over the land, which will double the aggregate wealth of the nation and enable us to provide for the payment of the debt without oppressing the business of the people. Then let us adopt such a policy as will produce such results.

Mr. BROOMALL addressed the committee on general political topics. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. PAINE spoke on the New York Democratic convention, its candidates and platform. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, Mr. PIKE, and Mr. STONE addressed the committee on the taxation of the United States bonds. [Their speeches will be published in the Appendix.] Mr. STONE, before concluding, yielded to Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CULLOM reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally, had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, (at ten o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also instructed to report back a bill (H. R. No. 788) to regulate the appraisement and inspection of imports in certain cases, and for other purposes, with an amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say in behalf of the minority of the Committee on Finance that when the bill comes up they will ask leave to make a minority report.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like the chairman to state that the committee are divided.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment reported is by a majority of the Committee on Finance.

COMMERCIAL LAWS EXTENDED TO ALASKA.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 619) to extend the laws relating to customs, commerce, and navigation over the territory ceded to the United States by Russia, to establish a collection district therein, and for other purposes, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back with amendments, and recommend its passage. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow it to be put on its passage now. It is a bill extending the revenue laws over Alaska, and it is a matter of necessity, and must go to the House. Therefore I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage at once.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the laws of the United States relating to customs, commerce, and navigation, shall be extended to and over all the mainland, islands, and waters of the territory ceded to the United States by the emperor of Russia by treaty concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, 1867, so far as the same may be applicable thereto. By the second section all of the said territory, with its ports, harbors, bays, rivers, and waters, will constitute a customs collection district, to be called the district of Alaska, for which district a port of entry is to be established at some convenient point to be designated by the President, at or near the town of Sitka or New Archangel, and a collector of customs be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall reside at the port of entry and receive an annual salary of $2,500 in addition to the usual legal fees and emoluments of the office. But his entire compensation is not to exceed $4,000 per annum, or a proportionate sum for a less period of time. The third section provides that ports of delivery not exceeding six in number may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury at such other points in the district as, in his opinion, the interests of the revenue may demand, for each of which a surveyor shall be appointed by the Secretary, who may, at his discretion, be by him clothed with any part or all of the official powers of a collector, and required to give bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of his official duties in such amount as the Secretary shall direct; and who shall receive a salary of $2,000, and in addition, when clothed with the powers and responsibilities of a collector, the fees and emoluments of a collector accruing at the port where each surveyor is stationed. And in that case the collector of the district is not to be entitled to the same; but the entire compensation of any such surveyor is not to exceed $3,000 per annum, or a proportionate sum for a less period. The Secretary of the Treasury is by the fourth section authorized to make and prescribe such regulations as he may deem expedient for the nationalization of all vessels owned by actual residents of the ceded territory on and since the 20th day of June, 1867, and which shall continue to have been so owned up to the date of such nationalization.

The President is to have power, by the fifth section, to restrict or regulate or to prohibit the importation and use of fire-arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits into the territory; and the exportation of the same from any other port or place in the United States when destined to any port or place in that territory; and all such arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits, exported or attempted to be exported from any port or place in the United States and destined for such territory, in violation of any regulations that may be thus prescribed; and all such arms, ammunition, and distilled spirits, landed or attempted to be landed or used at any port or place in that territory, in violation of those regulations, are to be forfeited; and if the value of the same shall exceed $400, the vessel upon which the same shall be found, or from which they shall have been landed, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and cargo, are to be forfeited; and any person willfully violating such regulations is, on conviction, to be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, or imprisoned not more than six months. And bonds may be required for a faithful observance of such regulations from the master or owners of any vessel departing from any port in the United States having on board fire-arms, ammunition, or distilled spirits, when such vessel is destined to any place in the territory, or, if not so destined, when there shall be reasonable ground of suspicion that such articles are intended to be landed therein in violation of law; and similar bonds may also be required on the landing of any such articles in the territory from the person to whom the same may be consigned.

The sixth section provides that the coasting trade between the territory and any other portion of the United States is to be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great districts.

By the seventh section it is to be unlawful for any person to kill any otter, mink, marten, sable, fur-seal, or other fur-bearing animal within the limits of the territory, or in the waters thereof; and any person guilty thereof will, on conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding $100 for each offense, one half of which will be for the use of the informers. The President is to have power to issue to individuals or incorporated companies annual licenses, by virtue of which such individuals or corporations may lawfully kill or cause to be killed, under such restrictions and regulations as the President may prescribe, such number of otters, minks, martens, sables, fur-seals, or other fur-bearing animals as shall be by such license specially authorized, and no more. And the President is empowered to prescribe all necessary regulations, and to require from persons and corporations licensed, or to be licensed, bonds with sufficient security, conditioned upon a faithful observance of all general or special regulations prescribed; and any license so granted is not to be assignable, but shall be effectual only for the person or corporation to which it shall have been issued, or an agent of the same duly authorized in writing, and shall be and become forfeited and void upon any violation of the regulations.

By the eighth section, until otherwise provided by law, all violations of this act, and of the several laws by it extended to the territory and the waters thereof, committed within the limits of the same, are to be prosecuted in any district court of the United States in California or Oregon, or in the district courts of Washington, and the collector and deputy collectors appointed by virtue of this act, and any person authorized in writing by either of them, or by the Secretary of the Treasury, is to have power to arrest persons and seize vessels and merchandise liable to fines, penalties, or forfeitures under this and the other laws, and to keep and deliver over the same to the marshal of some one of those courts, which are to have original jurisdiction and may take cognizance of all cases arising under this act and the several laws by it extended over the territory so ceded to the United States by the emperor of Russia, and shall proceed therein in the same manner and with the like effect as if such cases had arisen within the district or territory where the proceedings shall be brought. According to the ninth section, in all cases of fine, penalty, or forfeiture, mentioned and embraced in the act entitled an act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned, or mentioned in any act in addition or amendatory of that act, that have occurred or may occur in that collection district of Alaska, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized if, in his opinion, the fine, penalty, or forfeiture was incurred without willful negligence or intention of fraud, to ascertain the facts in such manner and under such regulations as he may deem proper without regard to the provisions of the act referred to, and upon the facts so to be ascertained he may exercise all the power of remission conferred upon him by that act as fully as he might have done had the facts been ascertained under and according to the provisions of the act.

The tenth section provides that bonded warehouses may be established under the provisions of the warehousing laws, if authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations, general or special, as the Secretary shall prescribe, at any port of entry or delivery thus established. But all expenses incurred by the United States in connection with private bonded warehouses of any class established under the custom laws at any port in the United States, and for the reception, delivery, custody, and safe-keeping of the merchandise stored therein, are to be reimbursed by the proprietors or occupants of such warehouses respectively, and moneys received by collectors on account of such reimbursement are to be duly accounted for as moneys received from that specific source, and not be considered as storage for any purpose whatsoever.

The Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe all needful rules and regulations to carry into effect all parts of this act, except those specially intrusted to the President alone; and the sum of $100,000 is appropriated to carry this act into effect and meet the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs within the limits of the territory. And the ports of delivery established under this act by the Secretary of the Treasury may be, at his discretion, by him discontinued or changed to different localities.

The Committee on Commerce reported amendments to the bill, the first of which was to strike out the third section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out the seventh section of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And be it further enacted, That until Congress shall otherwise provide by law the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, shall have power to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may think proper in relation to the killing and the preservation of fur-bearing animals from indiscriminate destruction.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of this bill whether this amendment strikes out the provision allowing the President to grant exclusive privileges?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir; the whole of that is stricken out, and this provision is put in about fur-bearing animals.

Mr. STEWART. May they not construe this provision as enabling them to give such privileges?

Mr. CHANDLER. This section provides that until Congress shall pass a law regulating the matter, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, may make such regulations as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. STEWART. Why not add "but shall grant no special privileges?"

Mr. CHANDLER. You may put that in if you please.

Mr. STEWART. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

Provided, That no special privileges shall be granted under this act.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury will have to give the privilege to somebody temporarily until Congress passes a law on the subject. If he gives the privilege to everybody it will be no privilege at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. Congress will by law regulate the matter at the next session.

Mr. STEWART. If the amendment be made he will not give a special privilege to anybody, but he may make regulations against killing that will leave it open. There is a company now organized at San Francisco who are the successors of the Russian company. They were very desirous of having special privileges. That company is a very worthy company, and would probably protect the animals as well as any other. I think, however, there ought to be a provision that no exclusive privilege shall be granted to anybody.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not object. The whole measure is a temporary thing.

Mr. COLE. I realize the necessity, because it is very great, of affording some protection to these animals. The Russian Government, before the acquisition of the territory by the United States, made very wise provisions on the subject, giving certain privileges to a company which was then in power in that territory, which resulted in the protection of these animals from indiscriminate slaughter. Unless we adopt some similar plan, there will be great danger of an indiscriminate slaughter of these animals. Unless a privilege be granted to some party or company or companies to exercise supervision over these animals, I do not know how there can be any way to prevent the slaughter of them. If all parties are allowed to go in and kill them indiscriminately, they will be destroyed or driven away from the islands where they resort, and there will be a total loss to the whole country and to commerce of that product. It is clear to my mind that some agency will have to be adopted by the Secretary and the President by which to afford this protection.

I am not speaking on behalf of any particular company, but rather on behalf of all companies who are interested in this, and on behalf of the country at large. I think the amendment had better not be adopted; that the Secretary, with the consent of the President, may be allowed to exercise such means as he may see fit to adopt for the protection of these animals. I think the Senator from Nevada will withdraw the amendment upon this statement of the case. Certainly there must be some agency by which to carry out this plan of protecting those animals.

Mr. STEWART. There is no difficulty in making rules and regulations for their protection, but I should hate to place it in the hands of the President and Secretary, remote from the localities, without the facts before them to exclude any business company that is now engaged in that traffic. I should hate to have that power placed in their hands. I would rather that no special privileges be granted this year; that regulations be made for the protection of the animals, and that Congress may consider the matter, after a careful investigation, at the next session. I think that is the fairest thing to all parties.

There is one company that have invested a very large amount of money in buying ships and are in the trade, and they want special privileges; but the thing has not been sufficiently investigated, and cannot be at this session. There are several others who want special privileges who have not money invested. I think it will be safer to leave the whole thing as it is, with regulations for the protection of the animals, and let Congress be fully advised when any special privileges are granted. The Secretary will not be, in four months, in a position to ascertain so as to do justice, but may send somebody out to examine. To grant special privileges would work hardship to those engaged in the business. I think it would be entirely better for him simply to make his regulations in advance. He can get the material from which to make regulations from the reports of the Russian Fur Company, showing the regulations that the Russians had for the protection of these animals. It will be very easy for the Secretary to get those regulations, and from them to make regulations and send them out there and have them enforced. That country is in charge of the military, and it will be very easy to enforce the regulations. They can be made out in a single day from authentic reports. The Russian Government have the best safeguards that can possibly be put over these islands to protect these animals. Let the Secretary adopt those and have them enforced by the military until next year, and I think nobody will object.

Mr. CORBETT. What the Senator from Nevada complains of has been stricken from the bill on purpose to guard against that, leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury to make such rules and regulations for the protection of these furs as he may think best. If he gives privileges at all they are special privileges. If he leaves it entirely open he may leave it open to people who will not protect the interests of that trade, men who are intemperate, who will go in and commit an indiscriminate slaughter upon these animals. If the Senator from Nevada desires to accomplish that he can say that no special privileges to companies shall be granted. He will have to give special privileges to individuals certainly, unless it is to be left entirely open for every one, and they cannot control it at all. I think the amendment had better be withdrawn and leave the matter to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MORTON. I am in favor of this amendment and opposed to conferring monopolies or special privileges upon any corporation in the way of collecting furs. We have seen the effect of granting monopolies to these large corporations in that part of British America controlled by the Hudson Bay Company, which has literally prevented that country from being settled. But, Mr. President, it is very important that there should be stringent regulations to prevent the destruction of these fur-bearing animals out of season. I would have very much preferred that this bill should contain those regulations, made them a matter of law, and provided appropriate and even severe penalties. I doubt whether regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury will be successful in preventing the destruction of these animals. The regulations ought to be a matter of law, contain penalties to be enforced by the courts, or in such a way as might be provided for.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will pardon me, this is intended only as a temporary measure to prevent the destruction of the animals until Congress can perfect such a law as he suggests. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to this substitute and let it pass. It is merely a provision for four months.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. COLE. I cannot acquiesce in the amendment. Very early in this session I introduced a joint resolution, Senate resolution No. 116, relating to this subject. It is a subject upon which I have been furnished with very considerable information. I know the great necessity there is for protecting these animals, and unless the Secretary or the Government is able to establish some agency to afford protection to them, there will be an indiscriminate slaughter of them. The Secretary can prescribe rules which all companies and all persons can adopt, but I feel quite certain that any such restriction as that which is put upon the bill by the amendment of the Senator from Nevada will result in the complete destruction of these animals. It is necessary that there should be some parties interested, if you please, in protecting them, in order that the protection shall be afforded. I shall therefore vote against the amendment, although the chairman of the committee seems willing to accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question being put, it was declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that. I think it is very important.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the substitute—

Mr. WILLIAMS. Read the whole of the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report to strike out the seventh section of the bill and to insert:

That until Congress shall otherwise provide by law the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, shall have power to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may think proper in relation to the killing and to the preservation of the fur-bearing animals from indiscriminate slaughter.

It is proposed to add to the amendment the following proviso:

Provided, That no special privileges shall be granted under this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, no; let us have a division.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—yeas twenty-seven, noes not counted.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the tenth section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section eleven, line five, to strike out "one hundred" and insert "twenty-five" before "thousand;" so that the clause will read:

And the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated from any unappropriated money in the Treasury to carry this act into effect and meet the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs within the limits of the said territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the eleventh section, to strike out the words "and the ports of delivery established under this act by the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, be discontinued or changed to different localities."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

DIRECT TAX IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 329) to amend the fourteenth section of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes." This joint resolution simply extends the time for assessing and collecting the residue of the direct tax in the late insurrectionary States, until the 1st of January next. It is a House resolution, and if it is to pass at all it ought to be passed now. I therefore ask that it be put on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the fourteenth section of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes," so as to extend the operation thereof until January 1, 1869.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 352, to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That it recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same amendment, as follows: strike out the word "and" after the word "first" and insert the words "and third" after the word "second;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment adding thereto the following words: "and in any such case it shall be the duty of the President to make such designation without delay;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

LYMAN TRUMBULL,

GEORGE VICKERS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,

JAMES F. WILSON,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah and to establish a land office in said Territory, and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 550) for the relief of Robert Ford; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 113) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the British-built brig Highland Mary.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 424) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain drafted men," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 355) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river, upon the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas;

A bill (S. No. 550) for the relief of Robert Ford;

A bill (H. R. No. 202) to create the office of surveyor general in the Territory of Utah, and to establish a land office in said Territory and extend the homestead and preemption laws over the same;

A bill (H. R. No. 1853) for the removal of disabilities from certain persons therein named; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 113) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the British-built brig Highland Mary.

LOYAL CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS.

Mr. THAYER. The Committee on Indian Affairs have under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1876) for the relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, and have directed me to report it back without amendment. I ask to have it considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to adopt and ratify the compromise and agreements entered into and executed on the 20th and 21st of April, 1863, between the legally authorized representatives of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, and the legally authorized representative of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, claimants under the forty-ninth article of the treaty of April 28, 1866, between the United States and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, as a full and final settlement of all claims under that article of the treaty. And the amount as stipulated in these agreements to be paid to the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw claimants, namely, to the Choctaw claimants the sum of $109,742 08, and to the Chickasaw claimants the sum of $150,000, is to be paid by the Secretary of the Interior to the claimants out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States belonging to or held in trust for these nations of Indians; but in case there is not a sufficient amount of money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to or held in trust for these nations of Indians to discharge their respective obligations to the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, claimants, or in case the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians shall request it, then the Secretary of the Interior is to sell such bonds or other securities held in trust by the United States for the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians as may be necessary to discharge their respective obligations to the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw claimants as stipulated in the compromise and agreements referred to; but no bonds or securities are to be sold for less than par. No payment is to be made nor bonds delivered under the provisions of the act except in every case to the person actually entitled in his own right to receive the same; nor is any contract or power of attorney relating to the same to be regarded or held as of any validity unless signed and executed after the passage of the act.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to add a proviso to the section authorizing the sale of bonds, providing that the bonds of the State of Indiana held by the Government shall not be sold. The State of Indiana has a large claim against the Government, and it is agreed by virtue of a bill which passed the Senate some days ago that such an amount shall be deducted from the claim of the State against the Government as shall be sufficient to satisfy the bonds held by the Government against the State. That arrangement will be defeated if these bonds should be sold; and as there is no necessity for selling the bonds of Indiana, the Government having plenty of other securities, I desire to have the sale of the Indiana bonds prevented by a proviso. I therefore move to add to the bill:

And provided also, That the bonds of the State of Indiana held by the United States shall not be sold under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time; and the question being put on its passage, it was declared to be passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Since that bill has been reported I understand that some objection has been made to it, and I prefer that the Senator from Nebraska should let it lie over for a short time. In fact, one of the attorneys for the Choctaws and Chickasaws just now called on me and stated a very important fact, that the Choctaws and Chickasaws have made no agreement whatever which will justify the bill. The claim has been examined under an old treaty and a report made. In fact, Congress had nothing to do with it. It was a question entirely with the Secretary of the Interior, and if he ratified the report of the commissioners under the treaty, that made the claim valid against the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and their funds must necessarily be taken to pay the claim. It was an agreement in the treaty with the Choctaws and Chickasaws that the claims of the loyal Indians should be examined and a report made to the Secretary, and if the Secretary reported that the claim was proper upon an examination of the testimony, then, of course, the money should be paid. There was a long contest after the report was made, and the Secretary refused to confirm it. It stood, however, for a year or two, and legislation has been asked from Congress, but we have refused persistently up to the present time to take away the rightful jurisdiction of the Secretary or to interfere with it in any manner whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have a word more to say about this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator may proceed. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the bill on which he is speaking has been passed, and that the proper course for him is to make a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rose at the moment to object to its passage, but the Chair did not recognize me. I rose as he was putting the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That being the case, if there be no objection, the Chair will consider the bill as not passed, and the question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I gave my consent to the report of the bill; but the attorney for the Choctaws and Chickasaws tells me within the last few minutes that they do not agree to it. There must be some very serious misunderstanding about it. Instead of ratifying the report of the Secretary of the Interior, who presented the matter to Congress, we refused to do anything at the last session; and since that time I understand that the claimants and the Choctaws and Chickasaws made an agreement as to the amount which should be paid. I think I state it correctly when I say that it is upon that agreement that this bill is predicated. Now, I understand from the attorney of the Indians that they have made no agreement which will bind them to the passage of this bill. It is startling information to me, because I gave my consent to the bill supposing the whole matter was settled, and I have no doubt the Senator from Nebraska was of the same opinion; and therefore we suffered the bill to go through the committee. We had better have some further information on the subject, and I suggest that it lie over for an hour or two, and in the meantime we can make some further investigation. I do not wish to have any misunderstanding about it.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the Senate to give me a few minutes, and I will consent to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, the chairman of the committee. Prior to the war, the Government held over two million dollars in trust, in money and in bonds, belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. After the war commenced, those two nations united with the southern confederacy. Several hundred Indians belonging to those tribes, however, refused to go with the nations into the southern confederacy, or to be allied with it, and remained loyal to the Government of the United States. They were subjected to all kinds of persecution. They made their way into our lines, and several hundreds of them went into the Union service as soldiers. After that was done the Legislatures of these two nations passed acts of confiscation, seizing the property of these loyal Indians. After the war, in the treaty of 1866, it was provided that these moneys which the Government held in trust should be restored to the nations, on condition that they paid these loyal Indians for the destruction of their property. When the time came for carrying out this provision, the disloyal portion of these Indian nations refused to carry out the stipulations of the treaty, and the matter has been hanging from that time to this. Finally an agreement was entered into, and the two nations embracing those who were disloyal, as a matter of compromise, agreed that the funds named in this bill should be paid to the loyal Indians. This bill was passed some weeks since by the House of Representatives, and its pendency here has been known to every agent of these Indians, and to every member of these tribes who was here. Now, why this statement comes in at this moment, when the bill has been before us for weeks, I cannot conceive. I consent, however, to let it go over this morning with a view to inquire into that matter. They cannot allege that it has come up unexpectedly; it has been pending all the winter, and this agreement was entered into by all the parties some time ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By general consent, the vote on the final passage of the bill will be considered as not having been taken. It is now superseded, however, by the unfinished business of yesterday.

BILL RECOMMITTED

On motion of Mr. MORTON, the bill (H. R. No. 1313) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, was recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

PROTECTION OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a special order for one o'clock to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business supersedes the special order.

Mr. CONNESS. I was aware of that by the rule of the Senate, but I very much prefer that the special order should be considered. The unfinished business is the Indian appropriation bill, which will undoubtedly become a law. The special order is the bill for the protection of
